"Heavy water" is a variant of the plain water we know, just as U-235 is a variant of the more common uranium, U-238. It has, however, curiously useful properties in the alchemy of creating plutonium. Therefore at one stage in the bomb project it was determined that large amounts of heavy water were needed.

The job of manufacturing it was given to the Du Pont Co. early in 1943. Meantime the man who had discovered heavy water—and got a Nobel prize for the job—was working on another phase of the bomb project. He was Dr. Harold C. Urey. But, as Urey testified to a Senate committee, the Du Pont Co. was not allowed to discuss the matter with him.

Du Pont presumably did the best it could, but there are indications that it made heavy water by a time-consuming and expensive method which Urey had once used and discarded in favor of a much better one he perfected.

DELAYED BOMB BY 6 MONTHS

The classic example of the evils of compartmentalization shows that this system delayed the critical discovery in the whole subject—the fact that creation of an atom bomb was possible—by some 6 months.

The events described below took place, it should be noted, before the Army was in the project directly. The compartmentalization which obtained had been ordered by the Office of Scientific Research and Development. Its secrecy regulations, however, were in conformity with Army directions.

At Columbia University, Drs. Fermi and Szilard were conducting experiments to determine what was the "critical size" of the various elements that might be used in a bomb.

Szilard had made some measurements of U-235 at the end of 1940, but had never bothered to complete his calculations, since preliminary indications showed that a considerable amount would be needed. He assumed, from what was known at that time about the material, that not nearly enough of the substance could be isolated, inasmuch as the separation was enormously difficult.

At the same time, however, in Chicago, Urey had found a practical way of separating U-235 in sizable amounts—in quantities enough to make a bomb, had he but known what that "enough" was.

NEITHER COULD TALK

But Urey could not talk about his work to anyone outside his project, and the same held true for Szilard.

In England, however, much the same experiments had been going on. And in England, there was no cellular system. Instead, there was what might be called a "community" secrecy system. Everyone working in the field could get all the information regardless of which phase of the work he was doing.

But it was not until mid-1941 that Sir James Chadwick, a leader of the British work, concluded that the bomb was a possibility and told his conclusions to Fermi and Szilard.

The latter quickly whipped out his unfinished notebook and completed the calculations in 10 minutes or so. They confirmed Chadwick's findings on the critical size. Later, when everyone got together, Urey confirmed the findings on the practicability of separating sufficient U-235.

Szilard explained the matter to Congress in this way:

"We did not put 2 and 2 together because the two 2's were in a different compartment; they were not together. That is, the men working on that property of uranium from which they could deduce how much was needed for the bomb had no idea that you can extract light uranium in appreciable quantities."

THANKS TO CHADWICK

Once "two 2's" were put together—6 months later than they might have been, and that only thanks to Chadwick and his colleagues—the Americans were able to go "all-out" on a project to make the bomb, knowing that they were not chasing after a rainbow.

ATOM CONTROL FIGHT CENTERS ON SECRECY—ARMY CITES NATIONAL SECURITY; SCIENTISTS SEEK FREEDOM OF IDEAS

(By Alfred Friendly)

Through Secretary Patterson, War Department officially states two major complaints against the original McMahon bill, providing for an exclusively civilian control of atomic energy. These are:

1. Its provisions relating to the security or secrecy of atomic weapons are "inadequate." The armed services should be given a voice and participation in devising secrecy regulations.

2. It does not provide for proper participation by the armed services in the decisions and administration relating to military applications. Since the atom bomb is the world's most dominant weapon, the Army and Navy cannot be left out in the cold.

Today's and tomorrow's articles take up these points in turn.

NECESSITY REALIZED

Almost no one in the present controversy denies the necessity of the closest liaison with the armed services and a guarantee that they will participate in the formulation of secrecy regulations.

The most vocal proponents of exclusively civilian control, however, declare that the Vandenberg amendment to the McMahon bill, one of whose purposes is to meet these objectives, goes too far and is a bad—an administratively impossible—method for accomplishing them.

The amendment provides that a military liaison board, appointed by the President shall review all decisions and actions—or lack of them—of the civilian commission, and may appeal to the President any conflict which in the board's opinion affects the Nation's "common defense and security."

Opponents of the amendment say that it means, in effect, not military participation, but really military control.

PATTERSON SILENT

Secretary Patterson has not yet expressed his official opinion of the Vandenberg amendment. He has stated that he was in accord with the idea underlying it. But after a preliminary reading of the amendment, he made a tenative guess that it might be somewhat broader than what he had originally requested.

So the controversy continues.

The usual Army view is that the armed services have the techniques necessary for obtaining secrecy and are the best technically qualified to do the job. They point to the excellent record of the Manhattan Engineering District, the enormous Army outfit which built the bomb.

The scientists have two answers to this contention. The first discussed at length in previous articles in this series, is that the "Army way" is to keep ideas so secret that they are sterile, that the repressions are dangerous to national security because they barricade the road to scientific achievement.

The second answer is that while the Army may know the "tactical" aspects of secrecy, only a scientist knows what is a scientific secret and what is not.

ONLY SCIENTISTS KNOW

The Ph. D.'s in physics in the Army are few and far between, it is pointed out. But in the field of atomic physics, who but a skilled scientist can say that this or that piece of information, formula, or experiment will give an expert in a foreign nation the data he needs to help in making an atomic bomb?

The scientists charge that although the Army gives lip service to the principle of free dissemination of "fundamental scientific information," it cannot tell what is "fundamental" or "basic" or "pure" scientific data and what is not.

It is claimed that Maj. Gen. Leslie R. Groves, chief of the Manhattan district, defined for a group of citizens in Chicago "fundamental scientific information" as that which is already known or can be easily discovered. The scientists submit that this makes no sense.

With a few notable exceptions, most scientists were delighted that the Smyth report (the official document on the atomic bomb's production) was released and that it contained as much information as it did. But, they say, if it was the Army's policy not to reveal military secrets, the Army simply proved, by the rules it prescribed on what could be included in the document, that it was incapable of carrying out its own policy.

COULD ESTIMATE BOMB

From the Smyth report, it is declared, a Midwestern teacher of high-school physics was able to calculate accurately the size of the bomb, a top secret item.

Similarly, the Army recently released the exact temperature increase in the Columbia River resulting from the heat produced in the plutonium manufacturing plants at Hanford, Wash.

From this figure at least two scientists who were not connected with the bomb project were able to calculate, apparently correctly, the amount of plutonium being produced, another top secret item.

Concern is expressed that if the Army has a secrecy veto on everything it thinks affects the common defense and security it will simply lay down a ban on releasing any scientific information of any consequence. This would certainly set an international pattern and dry up the flow of information from anywhere else.

SCIENTISTS FLATTERED

American scientists are flattered to know that the armed services consider them on the average better than scientists anywhere else and hence able to keep this country in the lead in any atomic arms race. But the scientists themselves insist they aren't good enough to stand alone.

It's not a question of on the average, they say. It's a case where someone, not necessarily in America, may turn up a once-in-the-history-of-science discovery which, if we don't get it, sinks us. After all, they point out, it was a couple of Germans, Hahn and Strassman, who told the world in January 1939 of the phenomenon of nuclear fission—splitting the uranium atom.

OBJECTIONS OUTLINED

A principal Army objection to the scientists handling secrecy is, bluntly, the belief that some of them are not trustworthy. It is contended that—

1. Some scientists, with the best motives in the world, will leak secrets simply because they are so imbued with the tradition of free exchange of information that they won't keep quiet on a matter vital to the Nation's arms superiority.

2. If the Army doesn't know a scientific secret when it sees one, what reason is there to expect a scientist to know a military one?

3. Most scientists are "liberals"; too many of them have too strong pro-Russian sympathies.

As one high and distinguished officer, representing the views of the Air Force, puts it:

"There never was a case of an American Army or Navy officer selling his country down the river for his personal gain. You can't say this of certain civilians, who played politics, betrayed us, sold us out."

Needless to say, this charge is bitterly resented by the scientists.

"Who the hell made the bomb, and for what country?" they ask. "Did we leak the secret to America's enemies? What about our record?"

RECORD ASTOUNDING

That record is, indeed, astounding.

In 1939 Dr. Leo Szilard, of Columbia University, had in mind some experiments which he felt would be successful and which, if they were, pointed toward the possibility of an atomic bomb. He knew that Joliot, in France was about to begin similar work.

Accordingly, he wrote Joliot suggesting that both of them violate one of the longest-standing traditions of science. He asked for an agreement that both should refrain from making their results public.

An agreement with France proved temporarily impossible, but Szilard, and others effected an agreement with England.

The scientists themselves set up their own committees to pass on the publication of all papers and to withhold those that might let the cat out of the bag. This system operated with complete success and no leaks from 1939 to the middle of 1942, when the Army took over.

The scientists thus claim to be the "inventors" of secrecy on the bomb and to have done as good a job as the Army.

ARMY REPLIES

To which one Army reply is:

"All right, you did a good job when there were only a few of you; when the project got big and involved hundreds of thousands of people, our organization was necessary to keep the secret."

At this point the man in the street is bewildered and understandably so. Taking the noninflammatory arguments of both sides at their face value one emerges with these conclusions.

1. The scientists have a host of complaints about the crippling effect on their work of Army secrecy measures. The scientists say further that their work is made impossible under Army control.

2. The military says that keeping military secrets, particularly on weapons, is one of its basic responsibilities and one which it must perform.

A solution of this conflict does not seem to be impossible. Advocates of the McMahon bill suggest the measure be amended so that military rights and interests in keeping the proper secrets of the atom bomb be guaranteed.

This can be done, they assert, short of giving the military services what amounts to dictation over all atomic matters affecting "the common defense and security."

ARMY VIEWS ATOM MAINLY AS WEAPON—MILITARY MAKES THE POINT THAT BOMB IS ITS RESPONSIBILITY AS ARM OF WAR

(By Alfred Friendly)

Because the atomic bomb is the world's most overwhelming weapon, the armed services take the not unreasonable stand that they must participate actively in its development and production.

Secretary of War Patterson has complained of the original McMahon bill for the control of atomic energy because of a clause which he says "would give a civilian board the function of carrying on the development of atomic energy as a weapon without allowing the Army or Navy any information or participation in what was being done in this military field."

In an interview, Patterson added, "We don't cotton to the idea of having a bomb handed to us some day and be expected to use it the next day without knowing what it is."

POINT WELL TAKEN

In the present controversy over the proper control of atomic energy there are few, on either side, who would argue that Patterson's point is not well taken. The debate is on the extent of the participation, its degree and the method of effecting it.

One proposed method takes the form of the Vandenberg amendment to the McMahon bill, providing for a military liaison board. It would review every action of the Civilian Control Commission proposed in the basic bill. The Military Board, comprised of Army and Navy officers, would have the right to appeal to the President any action with which they disagreed.

In general, the Vandenberg amendment appears to be favored in the War Department. It is, however, bitterly attacked in other quarters on the ground that it gives the armed services complete control of atomic energy and over-riding authority over the Civilian Commission.

One phase of the controversy boils down to the question of what is the armed forces' responsibility with respect to the weapons it uses.

The military agencies state their point very simply: We have the responsibility for obtaining weapons and equipment for the Army, Navy, and Air Forces. We cannot duck that responsibility or unload it on anyone else.

To which the opposition groups reply: Quite true, but you do it—particularly the development and research of new weapons and their production—through civilian agencies.

WORK OF CIVILIAN AGENCY

They submit in evidence the following argument:

The military has never developed a consequential weapon which involved technical and scientific research. During the war this function was specifically assigned to a civilian agency—the Office of Scientific Research and Development.

Although civilian employees of the Army Signal Corps and the Naval Research Laboratory did the early work on radar, the real progress was made under complete civilian direction at the radiation laboratory operated by OSRD at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

SPECIAL BUILDING PUT UP

The proximity fuse was developed at the Bureau of Standards, entirely by civilians.

The Army Ordnance Department prefers the civilian method. It has just built a special building at the Bureau of Standards for maintaining research in the hands of civilian scientists.

To a large extent, the Navy followed the same course. Under Rear Adm. H. G. Bowen, the Navy Office of Research and Invention drives forward an intensive policy of supporting fundamental research in the universities and industrial plants.

FROM PRIVATE INDUSTRY

Although the Air Forces, to be sure, have the responsibility for getting war planes, the objective was accomplished by procurement from private industries. The Civilian National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics has the basic job of primary research.

One high Air Corps general, favoring a strong system of military control over atomic bomb work, nevertheless admitted that "we depend almost entirely on civilian laboratories and industry for research and development of airplanes, except for some work at Wright Field."

There is a crack, which has more truth than humor, about the Chemical Warfare Service, which between the two wars did not depend on civilian research. In that period, it is said, its principal accomplishment was the development of an excellent gas mask for horses.

DEVELOPED BY CIVILIANS

Notwithstanding the superabundant use of the pronoun "my" by the Army's atom bomb chief, Maj. Gen. Leslie R. Groves, the history of the bomb project itself reveals that it was developed entirely by civilians.

Every fundamental scientific fact was already discovered by mid-1942, when the Army took over. The first chain reaction—a guaranty that the bomb was possible—was a scientific certainty before the Army had anything to do with the project. The reaction itself took place in a laboratory only 2½ months after Groves was assigned to the Manhattan Engineering District.

It is amusing but also pertinent to note the development of research on the bomb in England. In its initial stages it appears to have moved more rapidly there than in this country.

SECRECY IN BRITAIN

The British Army had a secrecy policy which barred the use of refugees on important military projects. The refugee scientists, however, were permitted to fool around with atomic investigations since the British army considered them of no military importance.

Thus it was that the three men who were instrumental in reaching the conclusion that a bomb was possible—a conclusion arrived at first in England and subsequently brought to this country—were Drs. Peierls, Frisch, and Simon, all of whom had escaped Germany in 1933.

American scientists' experience here in trying to sell the atomic bomb idea to the armed services indicates no great imagination or foresight on the part of the Army and Navy.

CONTACT WITH NAVY

The first contact was made in April 1939, between the Navy and Dr. Enrique Fermi, Nobel prize winner for his work in atomic fission. The Smyth report (the official document on the bomb project) comments on the meeting with the dead-pan remark:

"The only outcome of this conference was that the Navy expressed interest and asked to be kept informed."

As almost everyone knows, the proposal really got under way because Albert Einstein wrote to President Roosevelt in the fall of 1939, giving a summary of recent experiments pointing to the possibility of an atomic explosive.

ROOSEVELT INTERESTED

Mr. Roosevelt was interested and conferences were arranged between the leading experimenters and the Army and Navy.

At the first one, the handful of scientists present described what they had done and asked for about $6,000 with which to obtain some graphite of high purity. They had concluded—correctly, as it turned out—that this material would be essential in one part of the process.

When they made their request, however, they were treated to a 30-minute lecture by the Army representative at the meeting, Col. K. F. Adamson. He said he thought the scientists were much too optimistic about what a bomb could do. After all, he said, it took at least two wars to determine the usefulness of any new weapon.

MORALE MORE IMPORTANT

Besides, he said, the importance of explosives and weapons in general was usually overestimated. The important thing was really morale.

At the end of Adamson's disquisition, Dr. Eugene P. Wigner, whose manner, voice, and appearance are those of Casper Milquetoast, spoke up. Wigner, of Princeton University, was later to become head of the theoretical physics work on the bomb at the University of Chicago brains center.

If morale is so much more important than weapons, Wigner said, why didn't the Army cut its present budget about in half?

The scientists got their $6,000 quick.

So much for past history. The present concern is for the future.

RESEARCH MUST GO ON

In the hellish contingency that America becomes involved in an atomic arms race, it is essential, everyone agrees, that research go forward at the same speed as it did when the present bomb was being developed.

The scientists, joined by the supporters of the McMahon bill, contend that America will lose its position of superiority in the atomic weapons field if the new developmental work is conducted under Army dictation.

To meet Army and Navy needs, they say, let the armed services have the same responsibility and follow the same procurement and development arrangements that now apply to their other new technical weapons.

WAR STILL ITS JOB, ARMY SAYS OF ATOM—PEACETIME USES OF NUCLEAR ENERGY RUN INTO SNAG OF NATIONAL SECURITY

(This is the last of a series of articles on the issue of civilian versus military control of atomic energy.)

(By Alfred Friendly)

What about the peaceful uses of atomic energy?

In the previous seven articles in this series the discussion has been almost exclusively about the use of atomic energy for war. The underlying assumption was from everyone's point of view, the worst one—that the United States was required to make more devastating bombs and at a higher production rate.

The question of the proper form of control of atomic energy should also be viewed in relation to the possibilities of the peaceful use of this great new force.

On the surface, at least, there is no particular argument. Even in Army circles there is complete disavowal of any intention to stick a military finger in matters relating to civilian use of the atom's force.

GUARANTIES BY LAW ASKED

But the situation is not so simple. Partisans of exclusively civilian control argue that despite the announced intentions of the armed services to keep hands off civilian applications, there must be careful legislative guaranties to prevent the Army and Navy from throwing a monkey wrench in the works, purposely or otherwise.

There are three major dangers of the military services crippling the administration of atomic energy for peaceful purposes, it is contended.

The first is that if the military services have what amounts to final decision on all defense and security aspects of the subject, they will interpret every problem as falling within that area. Then, in accordance with their leaning-over-backward and security-minded traditions, they will bottle up in secrecy regulations, information, and material essential to peacetime uses.

SOME EXAMPLES

Some examples are at hand.

In the process of making atomic explosives for use in bombs, in the so-called "piles" where plutonium is made from uranium, there result a number of fission byproducts. These are common elements, but they are highly radioactive. They have no military value and cannot be used as, or in, atomic explosives.

They have, however, enormous peacetime possibilities. It seems clear, in fact, that the first, most immediate, and possibly most important uses of the fission process will come from the utilization of these byproducts in medicine, biological and physiological research, and in industrial testing.

This is because the byproduct materials, and, indeed, any other substances injected into the piles, behave chemically just like any other material of that element or substance, but, having become radioactive, can be spotted through photographs or electrical instruments.

TRACER CARBON

For example, if some radioactive carbon was injected into plant or animal tissue, and replaced the carbon originaly there, the new tracer carbon could be followed and observed wherever it went and in whatever it did.

The possibility of such use was explored intensively long before the war. The problem was that the material was very hard to come by. To create it, the huge and expensive cyclotrons were built. They bombarded elements with atomic particles and made them radioactive. But the atomic piles accomplish this end much more simply and cheaply, do certain things that a cyclotron cannot, and most important, they produce radio-active material in quantities far beyond the possibility of the cyclotrons.

From considerable prewar experience with cyclotron-produced radioactive matter, scientists believe that the tracer materials and others, which amount in fact to radium substitutes, will be of particular value in treatment and research on cancer and other diseases and in making possible X-ray photographs of the interior of industrial materials.

But up to now, in spite of great pressure to obtain these materials, the Manhattan district, the Army's bomb production organization, has apparently released none of them.

INEFFICIENT PRODUCTION

Thus, at the University of Michigan a cyclotron is being put to inefficient operation to produce small quantites of radio-active material to treat leukemia and Hodgkin's disease, when the material needed could be supplied cheaply and in much larger quantity from the Oak Ridge establishments of the Manhattan district.

A second danger that it is alleged would result from giving the military principal voice in decisions on defense matters is that whenever a choice is possible between peace and war uses, the armed services, by nature of their assignment and responsibility, must vote for the latter.

There is a case in point already, although the details are still secret.

Recently there was a decision to be made on the operation of a certain installation, involving a choice between running a plant in such a way as to produce more atomic explosives, or more material for research and peacetime use.

Because the decision rested with the Army and because the Army's first and proper concern is its own strength, the choice was made in favor of more explosives, at the expense of more research and nonexplosive materials.

INTERNATIONAL QUESTION

The third prospective danger concerns the question of international control of nuclear power. Some quarters say that international cocperation will be nipped in the bud if all security decisions rest with the armed services.

It is argued that as long as the control of atomic energy remains with the Army the rest of the world can only believe that America is primarily concerned with its use in the form of weapons.

It will thus be difficult if not impossible, the argument continues, for American negotiators on the United Nations atomic commission to convince the rest of the world that they should not build atomic bombs.

Next, even if an international agreement is reached within the UN for atomic disarmament, but the decision on national security is left to the Army and Navy, it is contended that those services will never endorse the international plan. For, in the terms in which the military services translate the word, "security" means a strong Army and Navy.

JOB OF CONVINCING

Finally, there is the question pointed up in the report, not yet released, made by a special State Department committee on the international control of atomic energy and the outlawing of the bomb. The report is known to propose a system under which an international agency of the UN would own, control, and operate all mines of fissionable material and all primary production plants.

But, to convince foreign nations of the feasibility of this plan, it will be necessary to prove to them two things. These are, first, that uranium and thorium are the only two elements which can be made into, or can make other, atomic explosives; and second, that it is possible to denature these elements so that they can be licensed out to the nations of the world for peacetime purposes, but cannot be made into explosives.

To make such proofs, certain information now classified secret by the Manhattan district must be released. The data does not concern the secrets of making a bomb; they have to do solely with certain facts about atom splitting.

But under the present Army secrecy regulations this information cannot be disclosed. Unless it is made public, the State Department plan, at least, is doomed to failure.

Essay on Food Plank for Peace by Harvey Cumming Chong, of Hilo, T. H., Wins National Contest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON

DELEGATE FROM HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD I include therein an essay on Food Plank for Peace by Harvey Cumming Chong, a Hilo High School boy of Hilo, T. H. This young man is an American of Chinese ancestry. He was valedictorian of the senior class recently graduated from the Hilo High School, Hilo, T. H.

This prize was won in a national contest conducted by Pillsbury's Institute of Flour Milling History. The victory won for him a flying trip to Washington and a 1-year scholarship in college, which he will use to begin predental work at the University of Indiana next fall.

The judges in this contest included Representative CLARE BOOTHE LUCE, of Connecticut, and Senator JOSEPH H. BALL, of Minnesota.

The essay follows:

Food has played an all-important role in warfare and it will be a vital factor in stabilizing and maintaining world peace.

The history of mankind contains the story of man's struggle for life's basic needs, for economic security, and for spiritual freedom. Can we now ignore the importance of the necessities for which man has so long struggled?

In America, where well-fed people can reasonably hope for economic security and freedom, we have developed a peace-loving people.

But living today in this same world, are millions who have never had their appetites satisfied, and who have always been hungry. Why? Mainly because of excess population and the lack of natural resources. This is not necessarily the fault of the people but permanent peace cannot be built unless they can anticipate an improvement of their condition.

American generosity and willingness to share surplus food are admirable but direct relief is not the only foundation for the world peace for which we sincerely hope. Some nations can and willingly do accept unlimited soup-kitchen relief, which should be a temporary necessity, prefacing the task of developing the production of food for unfortunate peoples.

America, through the UNRRA, is to provide "relief" necessary in war-torn areas. This must be done in good grace, without any thought of repayment for our own good as well as for the good of those who receive it.

The needs of those people who have suffered the most must be met quickly and efficiently. If they are ignored, starvation and inevitable diseases will result and chaotic conditions develop that may shatter plans for permanent peace. Hoping for United States aid, an unfortunate said, "We don't need much, but we need a little quickly."

Most people, unless extremely destitute, will resent the acceptance of outright charity. Assistance given to people of ruined countries must be bestowed in such a way as to restore their own constructive energies; that is, to help them help themselves. People needing relief, want, and should be given, not as much bread as seed wheat, not as much milk as cows, not as much food as the facilities to produce it. To enable the destitute to provide their own food are Missouri mules on Yugoslavia's tiny farms, United States purebred bulls throughout Europe, rebuilding herds slaughtered during the war, and American tractors and plows as symbols of our belief that food and reconstruction go hand in hand. In any case, the major portion of work done in the rehabilitation of any country should be done by the people of that country themselves.

The principal emphasis must be on the internal strengthening of devastated countries. This done, we shall have attacked, fundamentally, the perplexing situation of starvation amid plenty in this world of ours, thus laying the foundation for the dearly won peace which is our hope for the future.

Responsibility for Lack of World Cooperation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, just for the sake of keeping the record straight, a statement by Secretary of State Byrnes made recently is very much in order. Mr. Byrnes is having his troubles in efforts to approach and successfully resolve the problems of world peace. There are those in this country who feel that Russia is suspicious of us, and has good reason to be. That sentiment is very much at variance with the facts as they appear to be stated by Secretary of State James Byrnes.

Without going into detail, I think observers generally concede that the postwar problems in occupied territories such as Germany are getting along badly. Responsibility for this rests squarely on Russia and her leaders. If any proof is needed, the newspaper item which I read certainly is conclusive. I quote from an item in the Daily Journal of July 16, published at International Falls, Minn., which reads in part as follows:

BYRNES BLAMES REDS FOR GERMAN CRISIS—U. S. RISKS OPEN BREAK WITH RUSSIA

The United States risked an open split with Russia today in an attempt to force economic unification of Germany.

Secretary of State Byrnes declared last night that orders giving Russia a choice betwen cooperation or "economic paralysis" in Germany will go forward "this week" to Gen. Joseph T. McNarney, American military commander at Frankfurt.

The orders will be to cooperate with any or all of the other occupying powers—Britain, France and Russia—on finance, transportation, communication, trade, and industry.

In a radio report to the American people on successes and failures of the four-power council of foreign ministers of Paris, Byrnes asserted:

"We will either secure economic cooperation betwen zones or place the responsibility for the violation of the Potsdam agreement."

President Truman listened in and telephoned congratulations to the Secretary immediately after the broadcast.

Russia declined at the Paris meeting to go along either on economic measures, guaranties for keeping Germany disarmed for a quarter of a century, or the writing of a peace treaty for Austria. On those points, Byrnes observed, the conference "made no progress at all." He pinned the blame squarely on Russia.

The plunder of Manchuria by the Russian hordes, the plunder of portions of Germany by these same plunderers, and other instances, justify the American people in asking if Russia is acting in good faith in her dealings with the representatives of the United States and other great nations in their attempts to write a treaty of peace which will be fair to the nations of the world.

Veterans' Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES E. McKENZIE

OF LOUISIANA

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I am very much concerned with the treatment, or rather I should say mistreatment, our returned veterans have been receiving. To me, it seems a travesty that these young men and women who did so much and suffered so unselfishly should now be given so little consideration by those who are supposed to administer the veteran legislation passed by this Congress. There is the mustering-out pay; the GI bill of rights, with its vocational training and educational features, hospitalization, readjustment allowance payments, veterans' reemployment rights, and veterans' preference under civil service; priority rights to housing and to purchase surplus war property; insurance benefits and terminal-leave pay for enlisted men. I voted for all of these bills and in doing so I expected, and still expect, that they would be administered for the benefit of the veterans and according to the expressed intent of the Congress.

Regretfully, I must say this is not the case. In many instances the administrators have either maliciously or through bungling and red tape made it almost impossible for the veteran to get the benefits that Congress intended and that are rightfully his.

Why, Mr. Speaker, I get letters and telegrams from veterans who are seeking Federal employment under civil service, but they cannot get any information from the Civil Service Commission or the regional offices as to what jobs are available or when examinations will be held or where.

Every day I get complaints from veterans who are trying to buy surplus war property—trucks, jeeps, draglines, bulldozers, and other equipment. They cannot even find out where the material is located and when they do hear about some they travel hundreds of miles only to find that it was sold the day before or that the sale has been postponed. It is disgusting.

Veterans all over the country are trying to build houses for their families, but before they can get a priority they must spend $50 or $100 or more for a set of plans. They have to compete in the black market for lumber and roofing and paint. They can hardly buy nails at all and plumbing fixtures and wiring are next to impossible to get. Yet they must locate all these things and tell what they will cost before they can even get the priority to purchase these things. It is more of a hindrance than a help.

Many veterans who have gone back to the farms have not been able to get tractors, plows, and the most elementary farming implements. Yet they are urged to raise food. What, I ask you, do they have to raise food with?

Other veterans would like to keep up their Government insurance, and yes, the Government is urging them to keep it up, but when they write to the Insurance Division of the Veterans' Administration to inquire about their premium payments they do not even receive the courtesy of a reply. Many of them get disgusted and drop their insurance. How can they be expected to keep paying on something they cannot find out anything about? Naturally they drop it, but do not feel very good about it.

The same thing applies to hospitalization, and to readjustment allowance payments and vocational training. Schools and colleges that were fighting so hard to keep men and women in college during the war are now turning veterans away by the thousands. Some schools will not even consider veterans unless they attended that particular school as civilians before entering the service. They do not realize that the war lasted nearly 4 years and as fast as a boy became 18 years of age he was drafted into the service? Do they mean that this 4-year crop of youngsters are to be denied the right to a higher education? That is not what Congress intended. Congress meant what it said when it passed the GI bill of rights—Congress meant to take care of our veterans. They have earned these rights and privileges and I say it is high time we demanded that the people charged with administration of these laws either get busy and deliver or get off the job. If they do not do this, then we must immediately enact legislation to remove them and give the job to someone who can and will get results.

As a veteran of the last war I have been actively fighting for veterans' rights for the last 28 years and I intend to keep up that fight for the gallant young men and women who waged and won the war to keep this great country of ours free from the domination of Hitler and his Nazi slaves on one side and the treachery of Hirohito on the other. The free citizens of a free country should reap their just reward.

Reduction of Federal Pay Roll

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, one of the most urgent and important tasks before Congress is the reduction of an overbalanced Federal pay roll which is a carry-over from the enormous build-up of bureaucracies before, during, and after the war.

How can we balance the Federal Budget with such a heavy load of unnecessary personnel?

The following article from the Southern California Council Bulletin published by the California State Chamber of Commerce, indicated the heavy load the taxpayers of California are carrying to pay for the overstaffed Federal pay roll in that State:

THE HIGH COST OF BUREAUCRACIES

One way to balance the Federal Budget is to cut the Federal pay roll in half. At the present time, the Government—exclusive of the Army, Navy, and Air Corps—has approximately three million employees on its pay roll at an estimated cost of eight billions of dollars annually.

The $8,000,000,000, of course, is footed by the taxpayers of the Nation.

In a pamphlet prepared by the Tax Department of the California State Chamber of Commerce, all the facts concerning this huge Federal bureaucracy have been presented in detail. According to this pamphlet, the number of United States employees in 1932 was 563,805. In December 1939 this number had increased to 928,836 employees. In August, 1945—the month in which World War II ended—the Federal pay roll numbered 3,649,769.

At the present writing, almost one year since the end of the war, the number of employees working for the Government numbers 2,873,509—a reduction of only about 800,000. Annual salaries for this number amount to the huge sum of over eight billions of dollars.

According to a report to the Senate by Senator BYRD, of Virginia, the executive branch personnel could be reduced by 2,000,000. He points out that this would still be over 75 percent in excess of the number of employees in 1939, and would allow more than 700,000 additional employees for expansion requirements. Senator BYRD also points out that while the total number of employees has been reduced slightly, the personnel in old-line Government Departments has increased considerably.

Just how this huge Federal pay roll affects the individual taxpayers can be best indicated by the following figures:

There is one Federal worker for every 47 persons in the United States.

It costs every man, woman, and child in the Nation $60 every year to pay the salaries of these Federal employees.

The 3,584,000 people in Los Angeles County pay $215,040,000 in taxes every year just to pay the wages of the 76,000 Federal workers they support.

The 481,000 people of San Diego County pay $28,860,000 in taxes to pay the wages of the 10,200 Federal workers they support.

And even Mono County, with a population of 1,300, supports 28 Federal employees at a yearly tax cost of $78,000.

These are just a few examples of how our huge Federal pay rolls weigh on the pocketbooks of the Nation.

This burden can be eased only when the Federal Government returns to normal operation—and a normal pay roll!

GOP Doorbell Ringers Called Key to Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. GRANT

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to exend my remarks, I include the following description of the Republican Precinct Worker's Handbook—a volume written by Mr. John L. East, of Illinois. This story appeared in a recent issue of the Chicago Tribune:

GOP DOORBELL RINGERS CALLED KEY TO FREEDOM—LEADER WRITES HANDBOOK FOR WARD WORKERS

(By James Doherty)

Republican precinct workers are called salesmen of freedom in a book written by John L. (Bunny) East, Republican committeeman of the fifth ward, which made its first appearance here yesterday. The book is the Republican Precinct Worker's Handbook. Its publication date is announced as July 1.

East is a veteran party leader. Last month he served as permanent chairman of the Republican State convention. He knows all the tricks of the trade and he warns the Republican workers what to expect from Democratic captains, whom East says are remarkably efficient.

MUCH HELP NECESSARY

"No possession that man has is as precious as his freedom," East says in opening the chapter on freedom. "With it he can do anything; without it nothing. We Americans once knew freedom in its full meaning; now we know it only as a word, vaguely remembered."

"And so, if we are once again to achieve what is our birthright, we must turn to the Republican Party. But the top men of the Republican Party, able as they are, cannot accomplish the task alone. Much help is necessary.

"The responsibility belongs to the Republican precinct captain, the man who rings the doorbell of his neighbors. He can sell the Republican platform to his neighbors because he knows them personally.

"The choice of the American voter is quite simple:

"1. Either he votes for free enterprise, which has given him the highest standard of living ever known, or

"2. He votes for Government-controlled economy, which means one-party rule, dictatorship, abolishment of labor unions, and slavery of the people."

ADVICE IS GIVEN

The author gives advice to Republican workers on how to present arguments on this subject, then adds:

"Totalitarian leaders are ruthless. They have to be because coercing a whole society under the pretense of a mandate is a ruthless job. They know that men who hate or envy others are easily united on common ground; therefore they foster envy and hatred. * * *

"Some of the things that happened in Germany 20 years ago are beginning to appear in England and the United States, according to students of history. With this fact staring us in the face, we have the choice of holding fast to the American principle of individual liberty and free competition or accepting the totalitarian state."

HISTORY OF ISSUES

Committeeman East gives a history of the principal issues and policies of the political parties, from the signing of the Declaration of Independence to date. Excerpts on present-day conditions follow:

"The voter is apprehensive of the terrifying mounting national debt, notwithstanding the fact that the radio beguiles him with soothing words. The farmer who made more money by not raising cattle than by raising them knows you cannot get something for nothing. * * *

"Review the Democratic administrations from Andrew Jackson to Harry Truman. You will find that each is characterized by confusion, conflict, strife, stress, and strain in both domestic and foreign affairs. Whenever the Democrats came in, they began tinkering with the tariff, debasing the currency, and increasing the national debt. There is violent name calling, mud throwing, and smearing of all opponents."

PEOPLE ARE AFRAID

"People become suspicious of friends and neighbors. They are afraid. American traditions of government are broken, class is stirred up against class; racial animosities are agitated. The citizens are nervous, jittery, uncertain, and terrified. The four horsemen—violence, hatred, jealousy, and fear—ride again, again, and again.

"In contrast, review life during the Republican administrations. Foreign relations are calm. There is a definite foreign policy which commands the respect of all other nations. Foreign affairs are guided by sane Americans ready to speak for and defend American interests, first, last, and all the time.

"Here is a record of domestic tranquillity. People are contented and happy. They live and get along with their neighbors. Difference of race or creed brings no fears or suspicions."

The Republican workers are told by East that their No. 1 opponent is the Political Action Committee of the Congress of Industrial Organizations—PAC, CIO. He outlines the history of this group, which he says is Communist controlled, and which, he adds, dominates the Democratic Party and enabled its candidates to win in recent elections.

CONTRASTS LABOR RECORDS

The labor record of the Republican Party is contrasted with the labor record of the Democratic Party by East, who states his conclusion:

"In his heart the intelligent laboring man knows that the benefits enjoyed by labor in America today are due to Republican administrations."

Prominent Attorney Discusses Reorganization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN H. TOLAN
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. TOLAN. Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent having been granted me so to do, I am pleased to have inserted in the Appendix the following letter from Attorney Darrell B. Edwards, of Oakland, Calif., upon a very important subject:

OAKLAND, CALIF., June 7, 1946.

Hon. JOHN H. TOLAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN TOLAN: On May 16, 1946, the Speaker read before the House a message from the President with accompanying papers, wherein is presented a plan (in three parts) for the reorganization of certain of the executive agencies of the Government. Plan No. 2 is designed to transfer to the Federal Security Agency the functions of the United States Employees' Compensation Commission and abolishing the Commission. Aside from technical defects in the proposed plan, such as direct violation of section 5 (A) (6) of the Reorganization Act, in that the Commission's present quasi-judicial function authorized by law would be destroyed (a) by the substitution of a single Administrator, and (b) the establishment of an appellant board, both of which would consitute a "greater limitation upon the exercise of independent judgment and expression to the full extent authorized by law * * * than existed with respect to the exercise of such function * * * prior to the taking effect of such reorganization" as the statute affords. Furthermore, there will be no saving of administrative costs, one of the primary purposes of the reorganization legislation.

I should like to call your attention to certain matters relating to the administration of the United States Employees' Compensation Commission which are not in general known. This agency was created in 1916 as an independent workmen's compensation commission in order to relieve the Congress and various agencies of the Government of claims and demands arising from employment-caused disabilities and deaths. In 1916 Congress enacted a full and complete workmen's compensation law for the protection of employees of the United States and in so doing repealed the earlier ineffective act of 1908, which had covered very few employees and provided very limited compensation. The 1908 act was apparently the first workmen's compensation law in the United States. Between 1908 and 1919 the majority of the States enacted workmen's compensation laws to take the place of the earlier employers' liability acts and common-law actions for wrongful injury and death in employment. The 1916 act gave the Federal employees a substantial workmen's compensation law, the general aspects and benefits of which compare favorably with those in most State workmen's compensation laws.

In 1927 the Congress enacted the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, which is administered by this Commission. This workmen's compensation law applies to employees in private employments whose rights formerly were subject to Federal admiralty jurisdiction and to the rules in admiralty for the recovery of damages. Covered by this law are all maritime workers except the master and members of the crew of any vessel. The law covers, chiefly, persons employed on the navigable waters of the United States as longshoremen, ship repairmen, ship servicemen, and other general maritime employments on such navigable waters.

On May 17, 1928, Congress enacted a workmen's compensation law for the District of Columbia, which this Commission administers Such law applies in general to all employees of private employers in the District of Columbia.

The function of this Commission is to administer these workmen's compensation laws, all of which were enacted by Congress to fit the need of particular classes of employers in particular fields of Federal jurisdiction. This Commission's function did not extend beyond the administration of such workmen's compensation laws with the exception of certain ancillary matters directly related to workmen's compensation, such as making safety studies on workmen. Such functions are not similar to any other agency of the United States. So far as I am aware, the Commission's functions are not being duplicated elsewhere in the Government; therefore, that part of section 2 of the Reorganization Act which is designed to eliminate overlapping and duplication of effort of Government agencies would have no application in respect to such Commission.

The cost of compensation benefits for injuries and death account for nearly all the expenditures of such Commission so far as it relates to employees of the United States (postmen, navy yard employees, Federal workers generally). When compared with the amount distributed as benefits, it is relatively insignificant that such administrative costs approximate yearly only about 6 percent of the direct cost of the benefits themselves. In the administration of the workmen's compensation laws, which apply to private employees of private employers (where the benefits themselves are not paid by the United States but by private employers or their insurers), the total yearly cost for administration purposes in relation to the totel amount appropriated by the Commission for all purposes is only 4.6 percent.

As a large part of the Commission's work affects the rights of private employees and the financial obligations of private employers, as well as a large number of casualty insurance companies, such interested parties have a direct interest in the administration of the workmen's compensation laws within the Commission's jurisdiction. I have been informed that the Commission, on numerous occasions, has been commended by private employee and employer groups alike for its fairness in handling cases coming within the jurisdiction of the Commission. I have also been informed that the interested parties—employer, employee groups, including the American Federation of Labor—received assurances that a hearing would be had to give such parties an opportunity to express their opinion upon the reorganization before it was transmitted to Congress. This, through oversight or design, has not been done, and the interested parties have had no opportunity to be heard. Longshoremen in the State of California have long benefited by the fair administration of the Longshoremen's Act by the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, and I am unwilling that the President's reorganization plan be allowed to become law without objection. As you are probably aware, the Reorganization Act of 1945, section 6 (A), provides that "the reorganizations specified in the plan shall take effect in accordance with the plan upon the expiration of the first period of 60 calendar days of continuous succession of the Congress, following the date on which the plan is transmitted to it but only if between the date of the transmittal and the expiration of such 60-day period it has not been passed by the two Houses, a concurrent resolution stating in substance that Congress does not favor the reorganization plan." In view of the foregoing, I urge that you afford by appropriate resolution opportunity for the interested parties to be heard before appropriate committee in the House in opposition to the proposed reorganization, and further that you oppose such reorganization so far as it relates to the United States Employees' Compensation Commission before the expiration of the 60-day period provided for in the Reorganization Act.

I will appreciate an expression of your views in regard to this important matter.

Very truly yours,

DARRELL B. EDWARDS,
Attorney at Law.

The Making of Maine

OF
HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include an article The Making of Maine by Richard A. Hebert which appeared in the Pine Cone, a publication of the State of Maine Publicity Bureau. This story exemplifies the earnestness and sincerity of Maine workers, both during war and peacetime, and tells of their faith and vision as well as their achievements.

The article follows:

Organizing and building are not lost arts in the State of Maine.

With us today, as in the dreams of the Pine Tree State's pioneers and settlers, are the men of vision and bold planning, men who can take the legacy of previous achievements and build an edifice of economic betterment for the enrichment of thousands of their fellow men.

Such is the story of the Bates Manufacturing Co., an organization new in its present form, yet wise and experienced in the accomplishments of its five manufacturing divisions and rich in the promise it holds for the future of the State of Maine.

Consisting of five Maine mills, all established nearly a century ago, and a subsidiary sales organization, the Bates Manufacturing Co. has set a production goal of 140,000,000 yards of cloth this year—every inch of which will be woven in the State of Maine.

The mills, now called divisions, are Edwards at Augusta, York at Saco, and Bates, Hill, and Androscoggin at Lewiston. Employment presently totals around 8,000 persons and in Lewiston alone employee income amounts to 32 percent of the pay rolls of the entire city. Products range from shoe linings to fine dress fabrics and bedspreads.

In a period of American industrial development, which has seen a shift in the textile industry from New England to the South and West, the retention and expansion of textile mills in Maine stands today as a tribute to the faith and inspiration of Maine industrial leaders. Far from the hard-to-down popular conception of such industrial builders and organizers as grasping colossi, their record of service to the economic welware of the Pine Tree State is written in the jobs and opportunities they have created for thousands of Maine citizens over the years.

Such a monument today is the Bates Manufacturing Co. Under the aegis of such men as the late Walter S. Wyman, of Augusta, these five Maine textile mills were acquired by the New England Public Service Co. at a time when the then owners had about decided to give up the fight and liquidate. The severe cotton-mill depression of the late 1920's and early 1930's was more than even the bravest of men could survive.

But Walter Wyman and his associates refused to see a major segment of his State's and a region's economy go down the drain. Rather than see the textile mills and other industrial enterprises dismantled and the machinery and equipment shipped to other regions or junked, they not only held the mills, but raised additional funds to permit to the Manhattan enginering district.

Translated into such human terms as jobs, opportunities, community benefits, and cultural progress for thousands of Maine residents, the grandeur of their contribution to the economic welfare of the Pine Tree State is little short of staggering.

Still later, when a Federal law required power companies to sell their industrial holdings, these men of faith and vision in Maine and New England were not daunted. Sale and reorganization of the five textile mills into one integrated company was consummated last December 15, placing the new Bates Manufacturing Co. in a position of stability and leadership in the Maine textile industry. The importance of this achievement on the economic welfare of some 8,000 workers in three large Maine communities can only be partially appreciated.

Able exponents of this concept of public service through industry are such present leaders of the organization as Robert Braun of Portland, chairman of the board, and Herman D. Ruhm, Jr., president of the company, and the board of directors. Indicative of the strength and diversity of achievements of members of the board, it includes: William S. Newell, president of the Bath Iron Works, shipbuilders; John E. Hyde, vice president of the S. D. Warren Co., of Westbrook, paper manufacturers; Raymond Rubicam, one of the founders of Young & Rubicam, leading advertising agency; Thomas Gorham, treasurer of Bates; Albert T. Armitage, president of Coffin & Burr, Inc., investment bankers, Boston and New York; and Herman W. Wenzell, vice president of the First of Boston Corp., investment bankers, Boston and New York.

Before becoming part of a coordinated organization in 1945, each of the five mills in their own right had earned a reputation for excellence in the textile field.

The Edwards plant at Augusta, oldest in the organization, produces quarter-linings for a substantial part of the country's shoe production. Napped interlinings for women's and children's coats and ski suits, duvetyn for men's work shirts, casket and jewelry box linings are made in great quantities and soon Edwards will be entering the spun rayon field and weaving Aralac for coat linings as well. During the war the mill turned out 22,000,000 yards of herringbone twill for Army use, as well as more than 10,000,000 yards of cloth for rifle patches. Other wartime products included sandbag sheeting, tent cloth and linings for both Army and Navy shoes. Edwards operates 1,500 looms under the capable direction of veteran textile man William J. Lang.

The York division at Saco has been producing grey goods for more than a century. Specializing in the fine-goods field, York also produces broadcloths, lawns, and poplins for women's and children's dress goods, underwear, men's shirts, and sportswear. Some of the newest raincoats being placed on the market, designed by New York's foremost designers, are made of York poplin.

During the war York produced wind-resistant cloth for Army wind breakers, Navy summer uniform cloth, and airplane wing fabric. Arthur Tousignant, long associated with New England industries, is plant manager of the York division, whose 1,858 looms are working 3 shifts to turn out cloth for postwar American demands. A fine cafeteria, air conditioning, and tubular lighting are aids to efficiency and workers' ease.

The remaining three divisions of the company—Bates, Hill, and Androscoggin—are located in Lewiston on the side of a canal of the Androscoggin River, which supplies power for the operation of the mills.

Bates, with its 2,300 employees, is the "home" of the organization. For many years the name Bates has meant bedspreads—spreads for hospital use, jacquard spreads for homes and hotels and the famous George Washington's Choice spread. Today production on these spreads is at an all-time high, and in addition, the Bates division is turning out combed percale sheets and pillow cases, tablecloths and draperies, rayon twills for women's dress goods, and linings for suits and coats.

With over 1,000,000 feet of floor space this mill is under the direction of John Collins as plant manager and has an excellent war record behind it. Virtually every Army and Navy hospital in the world was and is equipped with Bates bedspreads. Every ship in the fleet has Bates bedspreads, and for the Ground Forces the mill produced Army duck for a variety of uses.

The Bates division was organized in 1850 by Benjamin E. Bates, a Boston financier, who was attracted to Lewiston by the excellent possibilities in the water power at the site. Not only did Bates found the mill, but he gave $100,000 toward the beginning of a seminary in Lewiston, which later became Bates College. The first New England college to become coeducational, Bates has followed a program of liberal arts leadership which ranks it high in the list of American colleges.

Benjamin Bates also was one of the cofounders of the city of Lewiston, which is today regarded as the industrial heart of Maine. Within a radius of 50 miles of the city live more than half the population of the Pine Tree State.

Next door to the Bates division is the Hill division. With its 1,278 looms, the Hill unit specializes primarily in the fine-goods field, making such items as combed broadcloths, poplins, and carded twills for women's dress goods and underwear, men's shirts, shorts and pajamas, rainwear and women's girdles. During the war this mill produced Navy summer uniform cloth, water-repellent oxford sleeping-bag cloth, and Army duck. Hill division as well as the others, takes the cotton directly from the bale, processes it, and sends it to the finishers. Harold King puts his years of experience in the textile industry to work directing the division as plant manager.

The fifth mill in the Bates company is the Androscoggin division, under the management of Deane Quinton, plant manager. Androscoggin, built at the end of the canal, is shaded by lofty trees and with its green lawns is one of the finest examples of the industrial age in New England. In operation, however, Androscoggin is ahead of the times. Working solely with rayons, this mill turns out acetate twills, satins, and serges for women's dress goods, blouses, and underwear, lining for suits and coats, shower curtains, bed spreads, draperies, and blanket linings. During the war this mill produced nylon parachute cloth and linings for Army overcoats and uniforms.

Chandler Robbins, Jr., is the company director of research and new products. Mr. Robbins recently was cited by the War Department for his work in developing new fabrics for military uses during the war period.

Connected to the Androscoggin division as a physical plant is the Bates Research Laboratory. Within the last 3 years the laboratory has been greatly enlarged, much new equipment has been added and it is now established in entirely new quarters. Today it ranks among the best in the entire textile industry and is a most important adjunct of the company.

Here routine tests of Bates materials are made. Many of the Bates products go to the customer bearing the label: "Bates Laboratory Tested."

The laboratory staff also does much original research work with most gratifying results. Experiments in synthetics have brought significant improvements in newer and better fabrics, one of which, a poplin-Aralac combination, will be marketed next fall and winter for men's and women's outer wear.

As the result of an outstanding record as general sales manager and president of Bates Fabrics, Inc., marketing subsidiary of the Bates organization, Herman D. Ruhm, Jr., was elected president of the new company.

Mr. Ruhm recently epitomized the goals of the new organization in a letter to employees of all five mills. Its concluding paragraphs were:

"We are all on the same team. We are all in the same family—the Bates family. Let us strive to show the world that a Maine textile enterprise can lead the field in every department of the game.

"We have a great future, a great opportunity. Let's go!"

In a recent address before the Augusta Kiwanis Club, he declared: "We are united in a great effort to create the happiest and most successful textile enterprise anywhere, and in the accomplishment thereof to reflect credit on our communities, our State, and our industry."

In the same address he declared the company's basic policy is "to be a good citizen in the State and in the communities where its plants are located."

"To be a 'good citizen'," he continued, "it (the company) must create a happy place in which to work, with good working conditions, good tools, good running work, a system of remuneration which rewards a dollar's worth of effort with a dollar, and the opportunity for our employees to earn as many dollars as their individual skill and effort merit."

Although the Bates Manufacturing Co. as such is less than a year old, its net dollar sales for 1946 have been computed at approximately $40,000,000. The increase in weekly pay-roll averages for the five companies since 1941 and now as part of Bates, has been from $20.40 to $35.06, a gain of 71 percent during the period for employees of the five mills. Seventeen percent of the 2,257 stockholders are Maine people and 58 percent are New Englanders.

The new company also is following a policy of constantly expanding attention to the needs of employees. Besides physical plant improvements, the "teamwork" spirit of the new organization is being registered in a new magazine for all employees and leisure time and hobby group activities are being fostered. Recognition for meritorious work, length of service (many employees have been with the mills 50 years or more) and similar achievements are being given increased emphasis.

Sports activities are high on the list for development with bowling, baseball and softball already established. The company recently purchased Cloutier Field, near the canal, from the city of Lewiston and will make of it a company athletic field, with baseball diamond, hockey rink, horseshoe area, etc. An athletic director allocates schedules and will coach and supervise the children of employees playing on the field.

You'll be hearing and seeing more and more about Bates fabrics in the coming months and years. In nearly every good shoe you buy and in many fine fabrics you wear you'll know you have a product of Maine. Friends of Maine everywhere will be hearing more and more about the Bates company as it performs its role as a "good citizen." Its contributions to the economic welfare of the State of Maine and to the livelihood of its 8,000-member "team" bid fair to constantly increase. Its research will place the miracles of the test-tube at the disposal of a Nation's well-being.

Bates is a living monument to Maine men and women of faith and vision. In its building and perfection it will have the best efforts of the entire Bates "family" and the best wishes and support of all to whom the Maine tradition of pioneering, enterprise and steadfastness is a material "way of life."

A Just Peace for Hungary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT A. GRANT
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, Americans of Hungarian origin recently met in New York City under the direction of the American Hungarian Federation.

Out of that meeting came the following resolution, which has been sent to me by the Right Reverend Monsignor John Sabo, pastor of Our Lady of Hungary Roman Catholic Church of South Bend, Ind., and dean of the South Bend Deanery, Fort Wayne diocese:

We, American citizens of Hungarian origin, at a mass meeting held on this day, June 16, 1946, after due consideration of all facts and in full realization of our obligations as citizens of the United States ask our Government:

1. To prevent the partition of Europe into zones of influence, either by granting to any great power political, military or economic privileges, or by accepting facts accomplished during the armistice period which are incompatible with the freedom, independence and sovereign rights of any nation.

2. To assure to Hungary, separated today from western Europe, her traditional and rightful place in the family of the western democratic nations. In conformity with the Moscow Declaration (October 31, 1943), we ask for Hungary "that political and economic security, which is the only basis for lasting peace."

3. To put fully into effect in the Hungarian Peace Treaty the principles of the Atlantic Charter and in particular to apply the ethnic principles without prejudice to Hungary in the drafting of her future frontiers. Border territories inhabited by Hungarians or Hungarian majorities should be returned to their motherland.

4. To prevent persecution of minorities on racial basis, and forbid their expulsion and confiscation of their properties as has been practiced during the armistice period by Czechoslovakia. Minorities should be granted full minority rights under international guaranties.

5. To restore Transylvania as an independent state within a Danubian Federation. This is the only proper solution capable of establishing lasting peace between Hungary and Rumania.

6. To relieve Hungary of the unbearable burden of reparations and of occupation which prevent reconstruction and threaten the nation's survival.

7. To expedite the conclusion of the Hungarian peace treaty without further unwarranted delay.

Giant Plane Flies Editors to Paris

OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the second in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called "A Trip Through Hell" and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

FIRST LEG OF TRIP TO VIEW CONDITIONS IN EUROPE IS MONOTONOUS, BELLAMY WRITES

Our European discovery trip started from Washington on the morning of April 9, 1946, at 10:30 a. m., after a dinner the preceding evening in which the party was entertained by Secretary of War Robert P. Patterson and his staff.

I consider Patterson one of the finest public officials I ever knew.

A junior of the Federal circuit court of appeals in New York, he accepted an invitation from President Franklin D. Roosevelt to undertake the most thankless job of the war, namely, that of supply. He accepted, and as Under Secretary of War rapidly became a scourge to the laggard and a leader of the van in the successful effort to deliver on the line in the theaters of war, both Pacific and Atlantic, the planes, guns, tanks, ammunition, and all the other equipment which was necessary for victory.

At the end of the war, with the retirement of Secretary Stimson, also a fine public servant, Judge Patterson was made Secretary of War.

We flew the trip all the way in a C-54, one of the most tremendous airplanes produced during the war. I believe it was second only to the B-29 in size. It was piloted by a crew of nine: Maj. William F. Shanklin, pilot; Maj. Nathan S. Kohn, copilot, Lt. Col. Thomas W. Gell, command pilot; Capt. Paul H. Pflug, navigator; Tech. Sgt. Steve Fedinick, engineer; Master Sgt. Alois M. Palenchar, radioman; Tech. Sgt. Warran M. Berger, aerial engineer; Staff Sgt. Robert E. Hughes, flight clerk; Capt. David A. Lawrie, flight clerk instructor.

This was the third time I had been on a War Department tour, and each time I have been impressed with absolute competence of the crews. On one occasion Lieutenant Colonel Gell undoubtedly saved all our lives by the skillful maneuvering of our flying freight train, to which the C-54 might well be compared without much exaggeration.

And now let us introduce the shepherds who guided us through Europe. The group was headed by Col. Charles J. Barrett, deputy director, CAD, for Europe, one of the most hard-working and competent public relations officers any of us had ever seen. His patience was infinite and it was needed. Someone of the editorial party was always getting lost or strayed, or wanting an answer to an impossible question, but by some feat of magic or other Charles Barrett always came up with the answer.

Colonel Barrett was assisted by Maj. Floyd E. Weideman of the CAD public relations section, who used to work on the Plain Dealer some years back, and Capt. Warren L. Richardson, a Massachusetts man by birth, who had seen combat service in the Pacific with the "Sightseeing" Sixth Infantry Division in the New Guinea, Leyte, and Luzon campaigns.

STOP AT CHICOPEE FALLS

The route took us from the Washington Airport to Westover Field, Chicopee Falls., Mass., which happened to be my birthplace. We put down there in order to pick up Julius Adler and Henry Luce, who had not been able to go to Washington. After a 2-hour stop there for luncheon at the officers' mess, we proceeded on our way and arrived at Stephensville, Newfoundland, at 9:06 p. m., where we had dinner at the officers' mess there.

We left Newfoundland at 1:41 a. m. and made the long ocean flight by night to Santa Maria Airport, the Azores, where we arrived at 12:40 the next noon. We were told that the ATC (Army Transport Command) much preferred to make the long ocean jumps by night because, by flying over the clouds, they could set their course by the stars and always knew exactly where they were. After lunch at Santa Maria we left the Azores at 3:10 p. m., greatly impressed with the importance of keeping this base permanently for American use.

We arrived at 1:50 a. m., April 11, at the Orly Field, Paris, and went at once to the Raphael Hotel, one of the fine hostelries in the Rue Kleber district, near the Arc de Triomphe.

After Paris, the route took us to Frankfort, Berlin, Munich, Nuremberg, Stuttgart, Heidelberg, Weisbaden, Frankfort again for a final view of what we had seen in Germany, Vienna, Salzburg, Trieste, Rome, London, and home. We arrived in Washington at 10:30 a. m., May 2.

A word about these transoceanic hops may be interesting to those who have not taken them.

The C–54 is a four-motor job and can ride through the average thunderstorm with hardly a quiver. And yet the long ocean voyage, one must confess, does become monotonous.

There were six berths on the ship, which made it necessary for us to take turns sleeping horizontally and sleeping in our chairs. On the way back I was fortunate enough, for example, to get 5 hours' sleep in a berth and the rest in my chair, covered by a blanket.

We flew mostly at nine or ten thousand feet above the sea.

On the way back we took the southern route by Bermuda, instead of Newfoundland, because the weather was reported to be bad in the North Atlantic.

AIR BASES VITAL

Let me return here to the subject already mentioned about the disposition of the air bases after the war. For transport to Europe it is absolutely necessary that America work some sort of arrangement whereby we shall have use of the great airports on Newfoundland, Bermuda, and the Azores.

We built most of these airports with our own men and money, and it would be criminal folly not to insist that we have at least an equal use of them with the British, in the case of Newfoundland and Bermuda, and with the Portuguese in the case of Santa Maria in the Azores.

After we had reached Europe we used the plane for the long hops, such as Paris to Frankfort, Frankfort to Berlin, Berlin to Munich, but after leaving Munich we traveled around Germany a great deal by automobile. Only once did we use a train, and that was on the hop from Vienna to Salzburg, which we traveled on a train, variously described as Himmler's or Von Ribbentrop's, a de luxe job which would compare very favorably with one of our streamliners in the United States.

I shall never forget the flight over the Alps from Salzburg to Udine, Italy, when we had to rise to a height of 15,000 feet before we dared plunge across the high range.

Press Support of La Follette-Monroney Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Nashville Tennesseean and an editorial from the Baltimore Sun in support of the La Follette-Monroney congressional reorganization bill. The editorials are as follows:

[From the Nashville Tennesseean of July 7, 1946]

HOUSE PARALYSIS

The life germ of any democratic state exists in its ability to organize effectively the will of the majority. The paralysis and frustration of the late Weimar republic are explainable in the terms of this fact. The current record of the Seventy-ninth Congress gives grave cause for concern on the same ground, as evidenced not only in the handling of the OPA but the minimum-wage, British loan, education, low-cost housing, atomic energy, and congressional reform bills as well.

Critics of the present legislative machinery of Congress point out that it is set up in such a way as to put a premium on delay, filibuster, frustration. A bill to put referees in bankruptcy on a salary instead of the corrupt-fee basis, which was dropped into the legislative mill in 1940, just last week became a law and then only after the scandal in which a Federal judge was involved forced the issue. The House majority, no matter how democratic its spirit and intentions, is often reduced to helplessness by that "third House," the Committee on Rules.

But antiquated machinery is not the whole explanation for current congressional paralysis. The House can do better if it would. Because it is in no apparent mood to do better, there is a real possibility that the summer recess will come with certain bills of great importance to the people either defeated or shunted aside.

If majority rule were the simple test, the administration's minimum-wage bill, now kept under lock and key by the autocratic and reactionary House Rules Committee, would become law in a matter of days. So would the bill to provide Federal aid for schools in the low-income States, still locked up as it has been for 2 years in the Education Committee by a stubborn and hostile North Carolina chairman who is determined to prevent Congress from even expressing its will on the subject. So would the Wagner-Ellender-Taft long-range housing bill, now engulfed in a web of delay in the House Banking Committee.

There is a threat that the La Follette-Monroney congressional reorganization bill will not be allowed to come to a vote this summer. The President's program for merging the armed forces is being sapped to death by deliberate delay. ANDREW JACKSON MAY'S Military Affairs Committee, with scornful disregard for the public will on the control of atomic energy as ascertained by the long and exhaustive work of the McMahon committee, has reported a bill craftily framed either to block any action on atomic energy and thus leave the Army in undisputed control or to perpetuate the Army's position to supremacy over it.

A round robin as offensive and notorious as that circulated by the late Senator Lodge against the League of Nations has pledged a sizable minority of House Republicans to fight the British loan bill and it has the open sympathy, astonishingly enough, of numerous southern coalitioners. The result is that the bill, whose advantages to this Nation and the South in particular were dispassionately and convincingly made clear in the Senate debates, is in grave danger as the House readies for debate on it this week.

Somehow the forces which are short-circuiting or deflecting the popular will must be broken through and Congress made more responsive to the democratic processes or else this postwar paralysis which is creeping upon the National Legislature may persist with calamitous results. Renewed popular pressure upon the lower House to take immediate and constructive action upon the more urgent matters now before it will help. The time for a democratic government to be democratic is all of the time.

[From the Baltimore Sun of July 15, 1946]

CONGRESS CONTROLS THE KEY TO ITS OWN REHABILITATION

Following Senate passage of the La Follette-Monroney bill for reorganizing Congress, House action has depended on decisions by Speaker RAYBURN and the Rules Committee. These authorities now propose to bring the matter to an early vote. This will be encouraging to the defenders of the American scheme of government.

For Congress took top billing in that scheme as it was laid out in the Constitution. It took top billing because the Congress was the essential core of any plan for representative government. The trouble has been in recent years that Congress has not been living up to the high expectations of the Constitution makers.

One reason was that the congressional structure and procedure were outmoded. It was to correct these matters of structure and procedure that the La Follette-Monroney bill was drafted.

True, certain reservations must always be kept in mind when the reorganization plan is discussed. Mere change in structure and procedure can't make any institution perfect. Institutions are the lengthened shadows of men. The men have to be good if the institutions are to be good. The projected changes can help good men function better. That is all that can be said for them—but it is a lot.

Another only less vital reservation was suggested in another connection the other day by Representative EATON, of New Jersey. He said Congress was wobbling because it was trying to do too much. In other words, the Government was branching out into a hundred fields formally considered to be outside its jurisdiction. The result is a burden of work in the legislative supervision of these activities which now approaches the limits of human energy.

But the happy point here is that Congress itself has it within its own power to prevent further poaching of Government in fields wisely left by the older Constitution to various private agencies. Just as it can reorganize itself for greater efficiency by passing the La Follette-Monroney bill, so Congress can control the volume of its own business by resisting the further enticements of the centralizers, the federalizers, the conscious or unconscious totalizers who wish to extend Government into wider and wider fields. A proper vigor in reorganizing, a proper vigilance against overextending will restore Congress to the high place contemplated in the Constitution.

Veterans' Benefits

OF

HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I feel that all men and women who have patriotically served our country during the time of war should have made available to them full information in regard to benefits provided for them by their Congress, and, therefore, at the end of these remarks, I am inserting the schedule of veterans' benefits as prepared by the Veterans' Administration under date of March 21, 1946.

NATIONAL LIFE INSURANCE

In addition to the benefits announced in the schedule, additional legislation has been approved by Congress to liberalize the provisions and benefits of Government life insurance held by veterans of World War II. The new legislation is designed to give Government service insurance the same features as commercial policies. It permits lump-sum payments, ends restrictions on the naming of beneficiaries, adds total disability coverage, and provides a flexible system of conversion from military to civilian-type insurance. I urge all veterans to investigate if they have dropped their insurance.

TERMINAL-LEAVE PAY FOR GI'S

I also wish to call attention to a bill (H. R. 4467) introduced by me last October providing for terminal-leave pay for all GI's. Such an authorization has now been approved by the House of Representatives and I anticipate that the Senate will soon take favorable action on the House proposal.

SERVICE TO VETERANS

During my years in Congress, I have cooperated with service officers of the various veterans' organizations in the First Congressional District, as well as with thousands of veterans who have written me directly in regard to their disabilities and benefits provided by Congress. I shall be glad to continue this assistance to more than 30,000 veterans in the First District. Each of the 12 counties in the district has a county service officer, who stands ready at all times to assist all veterans with their problems. The service office is located at the county seat in each county. The Veterans' Administration has also established branch contact offices at Albert Lea, Austin, Faribault, Rochester, and Winona. Similar offices may be established in other communities when conditions warrant such action. Veterans or others desiring to contact me directly, can address me at 1533 House Office Building, Washington, D. C., or at Red Wing, Minn., when Congress is not in session. I shall always welcome suggestions from constituents on matters relating to their welfare and for the future security and prosperity of our country.

Cotton—A World Force

OF

HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 23 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able and informative address on the subject Cotton—A World Force, delivered by Burris C. Jackson, chairman, Statewide Cotton Committee of Texas, at the Seventh Annual Cotton Congress held at Dallas, Tex., on July 8, 1946. Mr. Jackson is a long-time friend of mine, who knows perhaps as much about cotton and its development and uses in the world as does anyone else.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Cotton has been taken for granted so long and accepted as a natural gift like the sun and moon that few of us are aware of the extent to which it influences our everyday lives, and few of us realize what a tremendous force it is in the world today.

Source of four-fifths of the world's fiber and fabric, cotton is produced on every continent to which man's civilization has penetrated. Cotton is the direct source of livelihood to tens of millions of men and women throughout the world. Countless other millions derive at least a portion of their support from the distribution and merchandising of cotton and cottonseed products.

But the importance of cotton does not cease with the men and women who grow it, fabricate it into finished goods, transport it, and sell it. From the wildest savage in the heart of Africa who trades a tusk of ivory for a brightly colored cotton loin cloth, to the American debutante who thrills at the sight of her sparkling, glamorous cotton evening gown, every man and woman in this world depends upon cotton as a source of apparel.

From the textile mill in the Southeast which utilizes gears and sheaves made from a new cottonseed hull plastic to the contractors who constructed Boulder and Shasta Dams with the aid of tremendously strong cotton conveyor belts, industry looks to cotton as a source of invaluable supplies.

Wars have been fought about and won by cotton. History has recorded that, whatever the immediate causes may have been, our own tragic Civil War was fought about cotton and the cotton economy. History again, and only a matter of months ago, recorded another and more terrifying war to whose victory cotton made astounding contributions.

Cottonseed products were vital necessities on both the war and home fronts. Cotton linters made possible the powder that fired the guns from Berlin to Tokyo. We have but to look at the record to determine that cotton provided such diverse items for our fighting men as clothing, sleeping bags, wind- and water-resistant tents, camouflage netting, motor vehicle tires, and a thousand and one other items which were absolutely essential to the winning of that global fight for civilization.

Cotton is just as important to the peace of the world, for it is one of those strategic products essential to the economic well-being of every country on the earth. Fiber ranks with food as essential to the general health and welfare of the populace, and cotton is by far the most predominant of all fibers, not to mention its value in food and feed.

The boundless versatility of cotton, as exemplified by its past performance in both peace and war, has made cotton a force of world-wide proportions. It is my duty here to briefly survey cotton's position as a real world force, and to set the outlines for the discussions scheduled to follow during this Congress.

Cotton's great importance to the consumers of the world is derived from the fact that cotton is the principal fiber for all clothing, household goods and industrial fabrics. There is no other industry which affects as many people and reaches as far into the economy of nations and into the homes of the people as cotton.

In the principal agricultural producing countries of the world cotton is of foremost importance as a source of income. From the standpoint of employment cotton is the number one agricultural enterprise of the United States, India, Brazil, China, Egypt, Peru and many of the smaller nations and colonies of Latin America and Africa and is one of the major commodities in Russia and a number of other agricultural countries.

As a world export commodity raw cotton has for years held first place among all the agricultural products which move in foreign trade. The total foreign trade in cotton before the war amounted to about 13,000,000 bales a year.

The importance of raw cotton exports by countries is even more impressive. For example, in prewar years, exports of raw cotton as related to total exports from a selected group of cotton producing countries was: Egypt, 75 percent; Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, 60 percent; Peru, 27 percent; India, 20 percent; Brazil, 20 percent, and United States, 15 percent.

The spinning of cotton into yarn and the weaving of yarn into cloth on a commercial scale by mechanical means marked the beginning of the industrial revolution brought about by the invention of the steam engine. The commercial textile industry has from that day continued to be the leading manufacturing enterprise in every industrial nation of the world. The establishment of the textile industry is a natural development as the need for clothing is second only to the need for food. It is, therefore, not surprising to observe that most countries begin their industrialization by manufacturing textiles.

The total number of persons gainfully employed in the world's textile industry before the war was more than any other single industry. In almost every industrial nation today the number of industrial workers employed places the textile and clothing industry in first position above all others. In Japan before the war almost 50 percent of the industrial workers were employed in the textile and clothing industries. Similarly, in many of the Latin-American countries, notably Peru, Brazil, Mexico, and Colombia, the textile and clothing industry employ from a fourth to a half of all the people employed by industry in those countries. In the United Kingdom, the textile and clothing industry accounted for 34 percent of the industrial employment according to the last available figures. Even in countries which are primarily engaged in the producing of foodstuffs like Argentina, Venezuela, Bolivia, and a number of other South American and Central European countries the textile and clothing industry is in second position.

In the United States, which is the most advanced country of the world from the standpoint of industrial production, more people are employed in the spinning and weaving of cotton alone than in any other industry. Cotton manufacturers employ more people than the giant motor vehicle industry, and more people than the huge steel and rolling mills.

Having considered the importance of cotton as a commodity to the consumers and to those engaged in production and processing, let us take a brief look for a moment at the importance of cotton from the standpoint of the areas in which it is produced. Though cotton is grown in about 60 countries, 20 of these producing countries do not grow enough to supply their own needs and must import cotton. Only 5 out of the entire group of 60 producing countries have enough cotton and textile equipment to be self-sufficient in textiles. These five are: The United States, Brazil, Mexico, Peru, and India. All the other countries of the world must either import raw cotton or cotton textiles.

An analysis of the volume of cotton production shows the United States, the British Empire, Brazil, and China produce about 82 percent of the world's raw cotton. The economic control of this tremendous volume of so vital a commodity can be one of the most effective instruments available for provoking or waging war, or it can be equally effective as an instrument for enforcing peace. Beneath the many social and political questions that have disturbed the peace of the world for years and which obstruct the peace settlement today are fundamental questions of economic security every nation faces—the question of where they will get essentials. People must first have food and raiment to survive. All nations must assure themselves of adequate supplies of food and fiber or their people cannot exist. Herein lies the broad problems surrounding international trade and barriers that prevent it. These world-important and far-flung problems will receive treatment by expert hands at this congress.

Cotton stands today as definitely one of the world's strategic commodities. What cotton's position will be a decade from now or 5 decades from now mainly is up to those of us in the industry. Your job and my job here today is to review critically and analytically the problems that confront us and the progress that has already been made toward their solution.

Our second task, and the one of greatest magnitude, is that of setting for ourselves a course for the years ahead. We do not meet here to proposed sugar-coated formulas for the appeasement of political and pressure groups. We meet here to intelligently and courageously grapple with problems and issues that are vital to a survival of the cotton industry. By doing so we can make a substantial contribution to a great world cause and a powerful world force, and we can attain rich and fruitful success toward reaching the ultimate goal of "cotton—a world force—today and tomorrow."

The Dangers of Communism—Editorials From the Memphis Commercial Appeal

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest services of any newspaper in the United States is now being rendered by the Memphis Commercial Appeal in pointing out the dangers of communism through its editorial columns.

I wish every human being in America could read these editorials. Then they would understand the battle now being waged by the Communists and their fellow travelers to overthrow this Government, destroy Christianity, and wreck everything our Christian civilization has built up for the last 2,000 years.

There can be no compromise between the two ideologies. Communism and Christianity cannot live in the same atmosphere. Communism and free government cannot live under the same flag. Communism and human liberty cannot dwell on the same soil.

As the Commercial Appeal has pointed out, communism wants to weaken the United States. Read the following editorial which appeared in the Memphis Commercial Appeal on July 20, entitled "Communism Wants Us Helpless":

The War Department has announced dismissal of five civilian physicians and chemists who were employed at the Army's Aberdeen, Md., proving grounds.

The charge against them was subversion, which the dictionary defines as "the act of overturning; as the subversion of a government."

Aberdeen proving grounds is one of the most vital areas of American security. It is a place for testing weapons, including antiatomic devices. Nearby is huge Edgewood Arsenal, where weapons, including gases, are stored.

The War Department doesn't make a subversion dismissal unless it has good evidence.

In whose interests were the five dismissed persons acting subversively?

In view of the inferences of the case and current Communist activities it would seem that the War Department has an obligation to the Nation to reveal that identity. Only communism seeks the subversion of the American Government.

Communism is extremely interested in what happens to and in military establishments. International Communism's Theses and Statutes set forth:

"A persistent and systematic propaganda and agitation is necessary in the army, where Communist groups should be formed in every military organization. Wherever, owing to repressive legislation, agitation becomes impossible, it is necessary to carry on such agitation illegally. Refusal to carry on or participate in such work should be considered equal to treason to the revolutionary cause, and incompatible with affiliation with the Third International.

"Each party desirous of affiliating with the Communist International should be obliged to render every possible assistance to the Soviet Republics in their struggle against all counterrevolutionary forces. The Communist Parties should carry on a precise and definite propaganda to induce workers to refuse to transport any kind of military equipment intended for fighting against the Soviet Republics, and should, by legal or illegal means, carry on a propaganda amongst the troops sent against the workers' republics, etc."

American Communists have certainly obeyed those directives.

In 1928 no decent American wanted or thought of war. There were no signs of a second world conflict in the making; nevertheless, in that Presidential campaign year, the American Communist Party announced these plans in its platform of the class struggle:

"Not a man, not a gun, not a cent for the imperialist Army and Navy.

"Abolition of the present Army and Navy and State militias, and struggle for the toilers' militia. Election of officers by the soldiers and sailors."

There was a Presidential election in 1940, too. In the latter year, France had fallen, Britain was fighting alone with such supply and weapons-aid as this country could give her, despite Communist obstruction, and Russia was at peace under terms of her nonaggression pact with Nazi Germany. Here is what American Communists set forth in their platform of that year:

"The predatory war unleashed by imperialist ruling classes of Berlin, London, Paris, Rome, and Tokyo is a world-wide struggle for the division of the world among imperialist bandits—a struggle for the right of capitalist imperialist exploitation of the world by sacrificing the freedom of all peoples and the national independence of all nations.

"We are opposed to imperialist ventures, against M-day plans, and the militarization of our country."

This country had just adopted selective service, was attempting to prepare against the then inevitable Japanese attack.

Communism wanted to make this country impotent, and said so in these platform planks:

"Combat the imperialist policies and acts of the President, the State Department, Congress, the Democratic and Republican Parties, to spread the war and involve the United States in it. No aid to the imperialist war makers * * * oppose all war loans and credits to the warring imperialist powers. Stop the sale and shipment of munitions and armaments to the imperialist belligerents.

"No armaments or American soldiers for imperialist war or adventures.

"Democratize the armed forces.

"Only when capitalism is abolished, when socialism is established, as today in the U. S. S. R., will there be no more wars, no social retrogression."

Thus shouted American Communists who wanted their country so weak it could not protect itself.

Before a year had passed Russia had become involved in the war and the American Communist party line was immediately reversed. The "imperialist war" became the "people's war." The clamor for a "second front" began and continued until the very day American forces hit the Normandy beaches.

What had been Communist obstruction became enthusiastic cooperation, and with good reason—Holy Mother Russia was in danger.

Then came VJ-day, and again the party line changed overnight. Demonstrations demanding immediate transport home and discharge began to occur in all American theaters. Some were honestly inspired by war-weariness, others plainly showed Communist motivation.

The word "brass" began to appear in news stories and headlines. There were attacks against discipline, tradition and custom. The cry was against "caste" and the demand became—"Democratize the armed forces." Earnest, honest Americans picked it up, not knowing its origin.

In 1940 when American Communists were fighting against every armed forces strengthening effort, Russia was tossing its military "democracy" policies out of the window. It created its officer corps, stripped its army's political commissars of power, and reorganized its forces on the traditional basis of discipline.

In late 1945 Russia again reorganized her army and Stalin announced his decree for emphasis on training and discipline. Within a month, he abolished the 1940 Red Army's basic regulations, replaced them with rules requiring strict obedience and use of the salute.

No reminder is needed as to what has been done in this country. The greatest, noblest fighting force the world has ever known has been almost destroyed.

The existence of widespread Communist espionage activity in Canada has been proved and convictions obtained.

The Attorney General of the United States asserts that a Communist fifth column is at work in the United States.

Five persons have been dismissed at Aberdeen Proving Grounds for subversion.

Russia has rejected the American plan for atomic energy control. Chinese Communists are at the brink of precipitating civil war.

It is time all Americans understood that this and much more are part and parcel of communism's plan for world control.

If you want to know how communism proposes to render us helpless you might read the following editorial from the Commercial Appeal of July 18, entitled "Pattern for World Revolution":

When Attorney General Tom Clark publicly admitted the other day that a Communist fifth column is at work in the United States he merely applied to our national scene the general charge made by Winston Churchill in the spring that Communist fifth columnists "are at work throughout the world."

Coupled with that was an accusation by the former British Prime Minister that "Russia is a growing challenge and a peril for civilization."

Severely criticized even by conservative sources, Mr. Churchill has since been proved right by Russia's actions, by her policies and chiefly by her obstruction, and all that, in turn, can be traced directly to Josef Stalin.

He placed them upon a foundation of pure Marxist communism.

Last fall Stalin announced a new 5-year plan for Russian economic development. He did it with these words:

"The war was the inevitable result of the development of the world economic and political forces on the basis of monopoly capitalism."

He did not exclude his recent American and British allies. Quite to the contrary, their so-called capitalistic economies, from his and the Communist point of view, contributed as much to the inevitability of World War II as did German nazism and Italian fascism. And right here it would be well to remember that until the very day on which Germany attacked Russia both the Communist Russian Government and Communist International held the conflict to be an "imperialist war." Russia had a nonaggression pact with Germany, and communism did everything within its power and means to obstruct the British defense and American aid.

When Stalin attacked capitalism he had gone back to the teachings of Karl Marx and Frederic Engels—the patron saints of communism—and consciously or otherwise revealed what was to be future Russian diplomacy and policy.

World communism had resumed the march. He had ordered it.

Communism has existed in varying degrees throughout mankind's recorded history, but it remained for Marx and Engels to develop it into the philosophy which is the creed of Communists. They were by no means original, however, for they were communistically larcenous to take a great deal of the teachings of Haegel, one of Prussia's earlier state philosophers, and incorporate it into their own.

To link Stalin's condemnation of capitalism to Marxist communism one has only but to turn to Marx's Das Kapital, a prodigious work intended to be an exposition of the theory of surplus value.

Simply expressed, that theory holds that labor creates all value, and under the capitalist system receives in turn only what competition, mergers, and monopolies permit it in a squeezing process. Under that system, according to Marx, the rich get richer and the poor poorer, and ultimately the worker has to fight to survive.

When the fighting-for-survival point is reached the social and economic alinement is proletariat against bourgeoise — worker against employer.

The Communist doctrine for development of world dictatorship of the proletariat is based directly on the Marxist theory of the state being a capitalistic coercive force.

World revolution, which is the continuing objective of communism, depends on solidification of the proletariat, or achievement of complete solidarity among workers.

The purpose could not be better defined than it is by Stalinists when they assert that communism is a philosophy to be used for building a workers' world.

It is communism's contention that it cannot exist, flourish, and expand if a Communist-controlled country has as its neighbor a capitalistic state. Therefore it must press on for world control.

Not recognizing the validity of any boundaries—geographical, racial, or social—communism holds that where they exist they have been created by force and, therefore, must be abolished. If destroyed by force, in turn, that conforms with the communistic belief that the end justifies any means.

This doctrine has been activated by Stalin from the Arctic to the Black Sea, and if the reader thinks otherwise, let him consider the Communist-created plights of Finland, Poland, Yugoslavia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania, the Russian-occupied areas of Germany, and an extensive area in Iran.

The drive is now to the Mediterranean and restoration of a Communist government in Spain.

What the Western World—what we in America know as patriotism is defined by communism as "an emotional snare to enslave the workers."

In the theses and statutes of the Third International this is written and is therefore subscribed to by the Russian Government and by every Communist, whatever his nationality or origin:

Every party desirous of affiliating with the Third International should renounce not only avowed social patriotism, but also the falsehood and the hypocrisy of social pacifism; it should systematically demonstrate to the workers that without a revolutionary overthrow of capitalism no international arbitration, no talk of disarmament, no democratic reorganizations of the League of Nations will be capable of saving mankind from new imperialist wars.

Doesn't that explain why Russia has used the veto power five times on major United Nations Security Council matters?

Why it has rejected the American plan for control of atomic energy?

Why it refuses to cooperate with Britain, France, and this country in sensible control of Germany?

Why it has attempted to interfere with MacArthur's wise control in Japan?

"Without a revolutionary overthrow of capitalism, no international arbitration, no talk of disarmament, no democratic reorganization of the League of Nations (United Nations) will be capable of saving mankind from new imperialist wars."

That explains Russia and her policies.

It explains, too, why Stalin, in his Red Army Day order, decreed that training and discipline were to be emphasized.

Communism and the United Nations Charter are incompatible and can never be reconciled.

What a pity that every newspaper in the United States does not reproduce, not only these editorials, but the other splendid editorials appearing in the Commercial Appeal on this subject.

The Communists and their fellow travelers have been trying to lead the American people to believe that the Comintern has been dissolved, but the Comintern is not only alive today, but its tentacles are reaching into every section of the United States. I call your attention to an editorial which appeared in the Commercial Appeal on July 17, entitled "The Dissolution Was a Lie." It reads as follows:

For the first time since its purported dissolution in 1943, a responsible agency of an Allied government has charged publicly that Communist International—the Third International or Comintern—exists and continues its work.

The accusation is made by the Royal Commission appointed to probe Moscow-directed espionage activities in Canada, a probe which recently culminated in conviction of the only Communist member of the Canadian Parliament.

In finding that Moscow has sought and obtained "top secret" political information relating to policies of the American and British Governments, as well as Canadian, the commission, composed of two members of highest integrity of the Canadian Supreme Court, asserted that the Communist movement "was the principal base within which the espionage network was recruited."

It was the principal base, the commission found, since it provided personnel with adequately developed motivation and the organizational framework wherein recruiting was carried out safely and efficiently.

The Third International was supposedly dissolved by its executive committee at Moscow on May 22, 1943. Two reasons were given—difficulty in convening a Communist congress because of the war, and because, in the language of the announcement:

"The great lesson learned from the war was that the general national uprising and mobilization of the people for the speediest victory over the enemy can be best of all and most fruitfully carried out by the vanguard of the working-class movement of each separate country working within the framework of its own country."

The western Allied Governments, swallowing the dissolution announcement hook, line, and sinker, acclaimed it as a milestone of Russian diplomatic progress. Now comes the Canadian Royal Commission, after months of inquiry, to say it wasn't so.

No security agency in the world ever believed it was.

Communism double-talks, cheats, and lies. Omit the three words, "over the enemy," from the 1943 announcement and the true intent is revealed:

"The great lesson learned from the war was that the general national uprising and mobilization of the people for the speediest victory (world communism) can be best of all and most fruitfully carried out by the vanguard of the working class movement of each separate country working within the framework of its own country."

Says the Canadian Royal Commission:

"The Russians, in establishing their several parallel undercover systems, worked through their nationals in foreign countries."

The Theses and Statutes of Third International make the following one of many conditions for party admission to the world group:

"The class struggle in almost every country of Europe and America is entering the phase of civil war. Under such conditions the Communists can have no confidence in bourgeois (capitalist) laws. They should create everywhere a parallel illegal apparatus which, at the decisive moment, should do its duty by the party and in every way possible assist the revolution."

Parallel illegal apparatus was used for spying purposes in Canada.

Prior to Russia's involvement in World War II, Third International followed a technique of expansion. Since its purported dissolution, however, it has depended upon its affiliates in each country to carry communism forward, and that is entirely in line with the announcement that "the general national uprising * * * can be best of all and most fruitfully carried out by the vanguard of the working-class movement working within the framework of its own country."

The vanguard of the working-class movement in this country—a movement designed to establish world dictatorship of the proletariat—are the members of the Communist Party, U. S. A., their friends, and their sympathizers.

Along with them is that considerable number of Americans whose bleeding hearts have permitted them to be sucked in by an alien and sinister ideology.

All are the instruments and agents of Moscow-controlled Communist International.

A show-down between the western philosophies of human freedom and constitutional government and that of communism draws nearer each new day. Only if the American people understand communism and its objectives will they successfully combat its encroachment.

There are many definitions of communism. Its avowed purpose, of course, is to establish a world society without governments in which the people will have equality of rank and wealth, and racial barriers and distinctions will be nonexistent.

Communism holds the state or government to be a coercive force which, when the communistic ideal of the "true or perfect state of living" is attained, will not be necessary. That ideal "cannot be reached so long as capitalism exists," therefore the world-wide Communist attack against capitalism and free initiative.

Actually, communism is a combination of Machiavellian materialism and phony righteousness, and a diabolical philosophy of opportunism aimed at the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence.

It was spawned in Prussia and became a threat in Russia, where beats its acquisitive, evil heart.

These are some of the reasons why I have advocated keeping the atomic bomb in the hands of our military authorities until we at least have a semblance of peace throughout the world.

Every once in a while we find some religious fanatic who imagines that communism is humanitarian, that communism means freedom, that communism means liberty, that communism means freedom of worship. A man from Missouri who is just back from Russia said to me a few days ago that there was not as much freedom for the masses in Russia as there is in the penitentiary of Missouri. For he said that in the penitentiary a man had religious freedom and a chaplain to pray for him.

He said that in the penitentiary a man had hope of a pardon, or that his time might expire, and that he had the assurance that his wife and children would not necessarily suffer the same fate. But he said in Russia an individual is chained to his job for life, and his children are destined to suffer the same fate.

It is a system of slavery more ignominious than anything else that has ever existed in a civilized country in all the history of the Christian era.

Communism is based upon hatred for Christianity, as stated in an editorial in the Commercial Appeal of July 21, entitled "God or Antichrist—Which?" It reads as follows:

The great American freedoms are guaranteed and protected by the Constitution of the United States. They are specifically set forth in the Bill of Rights.

They are freedom from undue search, seizure, and imprisonment; freedom of religion, of speech, of right of assembly, and of the press.

They are freedoms founded upon a people's acknowledgment of the existence of a Divine Power whose aid and guidance has been sought by the people and their Government from the time the Mayflower's company began their compact with the phrase, "In the Name of God, Amen," to this very day.

They are freedoms which communism seeks to destroy.

There are no freedoms under communism and none in its world heart—Russia.

Organized religion is the strongest spiritual and moral force standing in the way of a Communist world revolution, and that, rather than its opposition to fascism, is why communism seeks overthrow of Catholic Spain's present government.

That "religion is the opium of the people" is a basic communistic belief and teaching stemming from the Marx and Engels philosophy and vigorously, consistently fostered by Communist International and the Stalinist government. The utterly ruthless Lenin and Stalinist suppressions and exterminations of religion and the religious provide history with some of its saddest and most outrageous chapters.

According to former American Ambassador W. C. Bullitt, a total of 46,475 Orthodox churches in Russia in 1917 had been reduced to 4,225 by 1940.

Only because the defense of Russia required use of every ounce of the people's emotional and spiritual strength as well as physical, did Stalin, in 1941, grant tongue-in-check recognition to the Russian Orthodox Church. Then he set up a committee to control it and made it an international political instrument.

"The party (Communist) cannot be neutral toward religion," Stalin told an American labor delegation in 1927. Speaking then of the suppression of religion, he said: "Anti-religious propaganda is a means by which the complete liquidation of the reactionary clergy must be brought about."

Stalin is leader of world communism and revolution. He has not changed. Communism does not change.

"There are no freedoms inside the Soviet Union," asserts Brooks Atkinson, former correspondent in Russia for the New York Times.

"The first socialist state in the world has not released the workers from slavery, but has reduced them to totalitarian slavery that includes the mind as well as the back."

There are no labor unions carefully protected by Federal laws as in this country. There is no freedom of speech. The Stalinist government completely controls the press and other mediums for dissemination of news. "The Soviet citizen who opposed a Stalinist policy," says Mr. Atkinson, "would be removed from society as an enemy of the state."

"By our standards the Soviet system has not solved any of the problems of freedom—including freedom from want and freedom from fear.

"The police regimentation of the Soviet people is not only disillusioning, but frightening."

The Communist Soviet Government is an absolute suppressive dictatorship by the Stalinist 13-member politburo.

Lenin-Stalin communism has sent between ten and fifteen millions of people into the prison camps of the NKVD—Communist secret police—during the past 15 years, Mr. Bullitt estimates. Brooks Atkinson concurs in that opinion. Many of those camps are maintained at Siberian salt mines. Germany's Gestapo, evil as it was, could not surpass NKVD in viciousness, or in efficiency in spying upon and controlling the people.

"Fear," says Mr. Bullitt, "is the dominant emotion in a vast country where a relatively small Communist minority subjects the majority to terrorism."

Under the last Czar," he points out, "there were, in 1913, only 32,757 such prisoners as NKVD has controlled and only 5,000 were political."

A conviction that Russia's slave labor camps equal in horror any of those which existed in Germany is inescapable.

Widespread activities of NKVD in Canada were recently reported upon by the Royal Commission investigating Communist espionage activities.

There are no secret police in the United States. The only Federal police agency, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, has the respect and admiration of all honest Americans, and is, incidentally, the chief target of American Communist Party smear campaigns.

No Communist citizen of Russia can move with freedom. He must carry his passport and identification papers with him at all times. So long as he behaves himself, any American can wander over all of the 48 States and no agent of Government, local or Federal, will ask him from whence he came or whither bound. He's a free citizen.

The Russian worker who does not possess a worker's card cannot eat. He possesses that card only at the whim of the Stalinist government, and its agents. That's what the workers' government—the dictatorship of the worker—does to the man around whom the philosophy of communism is developed and expanded. Surely, no American worker wants the type of government which has power to shut off his source of food at will—which holds life or death power over him.

It was this same Communist workers' government, by the way, which instituted and perfected the speed-up system so objectionable to American labor.

Unite the farmer and the laborer, shout American Communists. Russia, under the czars, was a country in which small farms predominated. The collectivization of agriculture wiped them out and established the existing large, socialized farm units. The Stalinist government decrees the amount of production which farmers may keep for their own benefit. It isn't much. The farmer, like everyone else, works for the state.

Between 1932 and 1933 from three to five millions of farmer peasants of the Ukraine and Kuban died as a result of government-organized starvation.

That's agriculture under the Communist system.

Consider, then, the rural electrification, the farm-to-market road programs, crop subsidies, and the thousand and one aids to agriculture given by the American Government to American farmers.

Anyone want to swap for the Russian system? And die for that system?

That's what Communist International would have us do. That's what the American Communist Party seeks in infiltrating into the fields of labor, agriculture, science, the professions, and Government itself—to overthrow constitutional government and replace it with a Communist dictatorship.

There is a simple way to prevent that:

1. Outlaw the Communist Party as a privileged political entity.

2. Revise the Federal statutes so that Communist subversion will be specifically prohibited as a criminal offense and provide penalties adequate to the treason.

3. Educate the American people in the basic principles and objectives of communism.

4. Provide a better quality of American history teaching in schools and colleges.

5. Collectively and individually cling to the profound faith of the founding fathers, that a Supreme Power—the God despised by communism—exists, and that He ordained for this Nation a great and beneficent destiny.

The latter is as important as all the rest combined. Faith and the hard work, the courage and the striving, made us what we are. We, the American people, have come a long way during 170 years of freedom. Now a crossroads, and necessity for making a decision, has been reached.

The choice is between God and these United States, or communism and social and economic enslavement by the forces of the antichrist.

Again I say, Mr. Speaker, that in publishing these editorials the Commercial Appeal is rendering one of the greatest services of any newspaper in the United States in pointing out the dangers with which America and the rest of the civilized world is now threatened.

God save our country from such a menace.

What's Wrong With Housing—Bungling of Priorities

OF

HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of July 19, 1946:

WHAT'S WRONG WITH HOUSING—BUNGLING OF PRIORITIES

Milwaukee's program for temporary veterans' housing is a dismal failure. It is the same all over the country. For instance, not a single barracks unit has been completed for any municipality anywhere in the Nation, FPHA officials have told a delegation of Milwaukee officials.

Why? Shortages of vital materials. It's the same old story. These are the shortages that were holding up houses while the war was still on.

Despite this, President Truman very unwisely lifted housing controls last fall in a carelessly timed move to get rid of wartime restrictions. The motive was good, but it was no time to do this, as was apparent to most persons who had followed the building industry.

As a result of this error, all sorts of industrial and commercial projects were undertaken. Residential builders were outbid for material and labor. Controls had to be instituted again. But much of the damage had been done. Industrial and commercial projects already under way were allowed to continue.

Worse still, the CPA policy, even since controls came back, has been far too lenient—even in Milwaukee—though the rules have been more strictly enforced here than in many parts of the country.

Although hundreds of privately built housing units are unfinished in Milwaukee and other Wisconsin communities, and publicly sponsored barracks units and even Quonset hut projects are marking time, you can see new commercial and industrial construction everywhere. Everything is getting built but houses for veterans.

The Federal Government has bungled the housing program badly, and still does not correct abuses. One of the quickest forms of relief would be to make priorities for residential construction extendible right back to the material sources to make sure that housing goes ahead first.

Another thing necessary is for many builders to make better use of the limited priorities they now have. Many wait until the last minute before presenting their priorities with local dealers, although they should know better. Some haven't found out how to use priorities properly. Builders making early and proper use of present priorities are getting at least a considerable flow of supplies from dealers.

These improvements could be made overnight—better use of existing priorities and extension of priorities from dealer to wholesaler, jobber, factory, and the source of raw material.

The first improvement can be achieved by builders alone; the second by a change of policy in Washington. Then why can't we get somewhere?

Rural Electrification in Montana

OF

HON. WESLEY A. D'EWART

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein a statement by me concerning rural electrification in Montana.

Mr. Speaker, one of the Federal programs that is going ahead in Montana most successfully is rural electrification. I have supported this program from its start and was one of those who helped to organize one of the first rural electric cooperatives in my State. Since coming to Congress I have had an opportunity to appear before committees of the Congress and to address the House in behalf of this program that means so much to the farm and ranch people of my State.

In Montana, before the Federal rural electrification program began in 1935, only 2,768 farms, or 5.5 percent of all the farms in the State, were receiving central station electric service. Latest estimates based on the 1940 census show that more than 27 percent of all Montana farms are now electrified. Montana has 13 REA-financed cooperatives with systems in operation. They are operating 3,540 miles of power lines and serving 9,014 rural consumers. Ten others are in various stages of progress and will be in operation soon.

The first REA loan in Montana was approved in May 1936. As of June 1946, the cooperatives of the State had received $11,869,598 in REA loan approvals. Of this amount, $3,964,659 had actually been advanced to pay for line construction. The borrowers have paid $832,650 of principal and interest on their loans, including $166,457 paid on principal before it was due. None of the Montana borrowers is behind in its payments.

REA allocated $7,653,000 as loans to Montana borrowers from the $300,000,000 loan fund available in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1946. This will enable the Montana co-ops to extend electric service to approximately 9,500 unserved rural consumers. Further Montana loan applications will be considered for approval out of the $250,000,000 fund made available by Congress for REA loans during fiscal 1947.

During the war, when line construction was curtailed because of scarcity of strategic materials, the Montana REA borrowers made their plans for the postwar period. As soon as wartime restrictions were lifted, they were ready to begin construction. Today they are building lines and connecting consumers as rapidly as the still scarce supply of materials and labor permits. Goal of the Montana borrowers is electric service to all of the 30,000 rural families in the State who still lack central station electric service.

The electrification program of the Montana cooperatives in the next few years is expected to be one of the most vigorous in the Nation. There are several factors that contribute to this promising situation.

First, the Bureau of Reclamation and power being made available from Fort Peck will provide for large-scale public power development in Montana. Under Federal law and the policies of the Department of the Interior this power will become available to REA users and others. However wholesale rates as a result of this program should mean reduced operating costs and low retail rates to members that will greatly increase the consumption of electricity on Montana farms.

In May 1946, the Mid-Yellowstone Electric Cooperative of Hysham, Mont., became the first REA-financed cooperative to purchase directly from the Bureau of Reclamation public power generated at the Fort Peck hydroelectric plant. Two other Montana co-ops are expected to receive Bureau of Reclamation power through new transmission facilities in eastern Montana, to be financed largely by a 1946 REA loan to a subsidiary of the Montana-Dakota Utilities Co. The REA cooperatives will purchase power at wholesale directly from the Bureau of Reclamation. The utilities company will be paid by the Bureau for delivery of energy to the cooperatives over its transmission lines under a "wheeling arrangement."

Another development that will help the Montana REA cooperatives serve some extremely thinly populated Montana rural territory is the prospect for combining farm and small-town rural electric systems.

In March 1946, REA allocated loan funds totaling more than $2,000,000 to two new Montana cooperatives—at Cut Bank and Shelby—to finance the purchase of facilities of the Great Northern Utilities Co. and the construction of new power lines in Glacier and Toole Counties. Sale of the holdings of the Utilities Co. had been ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission under the Public Utilities Holding Company Act. Purchase of these small-town facilities will enable the two cooperatives to reach almost 900 farmers in thinly settled areas that could not be served in any other way.

A similar development has occurred in the vicinity of Lewistown, where the Fergus Electric Cooperative, by purchasing two village power systems, will be able to serve 120 farm consumers who could not be reached otherwise.

Another important Montana rural electrification project involves both public power development and town-and-country cooperation. The McCone County Electric Cooperative, which has received approval of REA loans totaling $550,000, and is supplying power to the town of Richey, has proposed to make the town of Circle the hub of a rural electric system serving about 1,200 consumers. The entire system would be fed with power from a new substation to be built near Circle by the Bureau of Reclamation.

On Montana ranches and farms served by REA-financed cooperatives, yard lights, building lights, milking machines, electric fences, pig brooders, chick brooders, lamb brooders, feed grinders, running-water systems, and scores of other electrical devices are in use. Sheep are being sheared with electric clippers. Water warmers prevent freezing in stock water tanks in winter. Farmers are finding that it is less costly to pump irrigation water with electricity than with gasoline engines. A Montana rancher who consumes more than 2,500 kilowatt-hours of electricity a month uses 32 fractional horsepower motors for a variety of farm jobs. One Montana farm couple, aided by electricity, maintained a 480-acre irrigated farm without other help during the war. Electric power enabled a farmer near Lewistown to convert an old unoccupied homestead into a modern dairy and stock ranch.

With electricity, a Montana farm home can be nearly as modern as any city dwelling. A survey made in 1944 of Montana farms that had been served by REA co-ops for several years showed that 9 of every 10 had radios, 4 of every 5 had washing machines, and 3 of every 4 had electric refrigerators. Practically all the farm families lacking those appliances indicated in the survey they would buy them within 2 years after the war. The survey showed tremendous demand among farm families for other electrical appliances that are not yet on the market in quantities. Plumbing systems, vacuum cleaners, electric ranges, and farm-size freezer units of both cabinet and walk-in types are especially popular.

Electricity has been a strong factor in building community enterprises and rural industries in Montana. One small town in the State, for instance, converted an abandoned cheese factory into a community canning center, available to both town and farm women. Several rural schools served by rural electric lines have installed power machinery for the training of vocational agriculture students. One grain elevator in an REA-served Montana rural community uses electric motors aggregating 104 horsepower. The manager says he does three times as much business with the same manpower as he did while using his old equipment.

Business for local appliance dealers and electricians is an indirect benefit of rural electrification. Experience shows that for every dollar spent to build rural power lines farmers spend $2 for wiring and appliances. The all-out drive to extend the use of electricity has caused the production of electric farm machinery to gradually approach the prewar level. According to the Civilian Production Administration, domestic electric-appliance production in April was about 85 percent of the 1940–41 level, and it will be only a matter of a short time until electric equipment will be available to all.

The extension of rural electrification has been held up during the war, and it was difficult and at times impossible to obtain the equipment necessary to extend rural lines. This has resulted in a great backed-up demand for allocations of funds to go ahead with this construction. Congress has recognized this demand and the need for the expansion of the use of electricity on the farms and has therefore appropriated the funds so that allocations could be made. Montana has been exceptionally well treated in these allocations. I am attaching a table showing total allocations, total advances, miles energized, and consumers connected in Montana as of June 1, 1946, and following that, loans approved from June 1 to July 3:

The Lichfield Trials

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, July 23 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Lichfield Trials," published in the Huntington (W. Va.) Advertiser of July 10, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE LITCHFIELD TRIALS

From time to time the trials of military personnel accused of beating and mistreating prisoners at the guardhouse in Lichfield, England, do make the day's news, but the information is so limited that the public gets nothing more than a reminder that such trials are going on. It is not due to faulty work of the reporters covering the trials. The meager information results from the fact that little progress is being made, and nobody connected with the case seems disposed to speed up things.

To expedite the investigations a high-up officer was sent from Washington some time ago to Bad Nauheim, Germany, to which point they had been transferred from England for the purpose of hurrying matters along. The trials still drag, and the accounts of them, though meager, make unpleasant reading.

So far, since the trials were transferred from England, one enlisted man has been acquitted. An officer and five enlisted guards have been found guilty. But not a single jail sentence has been given to any of the six convicted of beating prisoners or of ordering them beaten. There has been sickening recitals of brutality, but punishment has ranged from a reprimand to a $250 fine. There should be harsher penalties for men who resorted to the Nazi-type of cruelty to discipline those who had violated the military laws.

All in all, it seems military authority is dealing softly with those who showed no softness in their hearts and conduct when they had custody of wayward GI's, some of whom were guilty of nothing more than overstaying leaves.

Congress should require an accounting of the progress of these trials to date to show why there is indifference and who is at the bottom of it. The public should know whether it is a whitewash proposition or the military authority really means business in arranging Army personnel for brutal behavior toward fellow soldiers.

Actions Speak Louder Than Words

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT W. HAWKES
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, July 23 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a story entitled "Actions Speak Louder Than Words." This little story will prove that men of different colors, races, and creeds find ways to get along better together without laws forcing them to get along than under such laws.

There being no objection, the story was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The members of the Woodmont Country Club of Washington, D. C., through a former president, paid high tribute to the colored houseman at the club in respect to his 25 years of faithful, intelligent service.

The club members gave a dinner to Mr. James Rone, who has served the members of the club for this long period of years; and they presented to him, through the house chairman, Mr. Morris Jaffee, as a testimonial of their respect for him as a man, a gold watch.

The former president of the club made the following presentation speech, which I believe demonstrates that the policy of "love thy neighbor as thyself" is one that grows up in the human being rather than being enforced by law. The president's speech reads as follows:

"In recognition of your 25 years of service, I would like to express to you the good wishes of the club members for your loyal and devoted service. Your conduct and character in the performance of your duties have endeared you in the hearts of all of our members. You represent man's humanity to man. You combat with your simple philosophy the venom of hate that has spread around the world and your ideals of living have struck a responsive chord. You have done a great deal, Jimmie Rone, to create good will for the colored folks. Your simplicity, your earnestness of purpose, and your unselfish devotion has all added to a better understanding between the peoples of your race and those of the white race.

"You, to me, are the living Booker T. Washington. Even though you are not an educator, and have never gathered any great knowledge, you understand, though, the problems of your fellow man. You forgive their weaknesses and catalog their virtues in a manner similar to that of those rare qualities which were found in Booker T. Washington.

"You may not have planned it that way, but by your acts and understanding you have done a great deal for your race, and you have gained the respect of your fellow Americans.

"Your kindliness, your homely wisdom, and your keen sense of friendly devotion has all aided in making you an outstanding person. Your smiling features and pleasant words have done much to enrich the surroundings of this club.

"Your keen sense of responsibility to your colored folks, who have been less fortunate, has earned you the respect and admiration of all who know you.

"I have heard many tributes paid you by men of affairs for your outstanding contributions to the creation of friendship and understanding between the white and colored man, and it gives further evidence of the fact that in these turbulent days, with the peoples of the world trying to adjust their affairs from war to peacetime pursuits; actions, such as yours, do more to bring about better understanding between the peoples of the world than any public laws that may be enacted to try and bring this about.

"I congratulate you for your fineness of character and your understanding of the American way of life, and I hope it will be the pleasure of the members of this club to have you with us for many years to come."

Railroad Retirement Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Sunday Star of July 21, 1946:

RAILROAD RETIREMENT BILL

Railroad retirement laws should be liberalized. But as the public must pay the bill, Congress should be the conscientious referee between claims and counterclaims as to the extent of liberalization considered practical. The legislative history of the bill now pending in the Senate, already passed by the House, to liberalize railroad retirement and unemployment insurance laws, indicates that Congress is more ready to comply with the wishes of the railroad unions than to seek reasonable modification in the public interest.

As described by Senator BARKLEY, the bill represents the fruits of the work of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, which spent some 6 years studying the retirement and unemployment compensation laws. It was before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for nearly 3 months and was reported by the committee with numerous amendments designed to overcome objections as to cost, coverage, and administration. The amendments were accepted by the House, sitting as the Committee of the Whole. But on a record vote all the amendments were killed and the bill was passed as introduced; in other words, as written by the railroad unions. The identical bill is now before the Senate.

It is estimated by the railroads that the bill will mean an additional cost to them of about $100,000,000 and Chairman LEA of the House committee said that if its provisions were applied, on the same scale, to Government social security laws, the cost would be $20 000,000,000 a year. Yet the cost, according to the actuaries employed by the House committee, is not enough to pay the benefits; the measure, in other words, is considered actuarially unsound.

Railroad labor has sought to prevent what it contends is the practice by railroads of giving out, by contract, parts of railroad work as a means of escaping responsibility for coverage, under railroad social security laws, of those engaged in such contract work. The railroads claim, however, that the bill's provisions are now so broad that all the workers in an ice plant, for example, which sells some of its ice to a railroad, would be covered. Senator BARKLEY denies this to be the intent of the bill. Yet, if this is not the intent, the language of the bill itself should deny that intent and remove all ambiguity over what it does mean.

The bill introduces new theories as to the meaning of unemployment and in this connection makes eligible for unemployment compensation an employee laid off by illness or maternity. It also pays disability benefits regardless of the cause of disability.

While railroad labor has a right to make such demands, Congress has a duty in passing on them. It has so far shown a greater disposition to grant them for political expediency than to rely on the recommendations of its own Members who studied the measure in relation to its potential effect on the public welfare. When the bill comes up in the Senate, it should be amended with that consideration in view.

Railroad Retirement and Insurance Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAYMOND E. WILLIS
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 23 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "For the Favored Few," published in the Indianapolis Star of July 22.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOR THE FAVORED FEW

The House of Representatives has decided that the Government should favor another special group of our people at the expense of the public. Government intervention already has soaked the public millions of dollars in increased costs for coal, due to wage increases; for steel, due to wage increases; for automobiles, due to wage increases; for shipping, to subsidize wage increases. Now they propose, through the Crosser bill, to amend railroad retirement and insurance benefits, to increase the benefits of this favored group all out of proportion to the social security paymen'ts provided for the rest of us. The bill would force the railroads to shell out an estimated one hundred million more dollars when the roads are already appealing for higher freight rates to cover increased costs arising from recent wage increases. This means the public will pay again—higher passenger rates and freight rates. We're taking an awful licking from the Government these days.

Why should the Congress favor one group of our workers at the expense of all the rest of us? Why should the railroads be driven toward bankruptcy or higher rates in order to give special benefits to a small segment of our population? It's one thing for a business to provide additional employment and retirement benefits for their workers of their own free will. It's quite another thing for the Government to impose these insurance privileges by law on an industry which will be forced to pass the cost on to the American people in general. This is not a question of providing benefits equal to those in other industries. It's a question of giving special benefits to a small group of American workers by act of Congress. There are plenty of Congressmen who are looking out for the special interests of privileged groups. Who's looking out for the interests of the American people?

Clear Record—All Bad

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Wall Street Journal of Thursday, July 18, 1946:

CLEAR RECORD—ALL BAD

We will ask you to go back a few months to the time when the Bretton Woods financial agreements were being sold to the American people. It is not too hard to remember the propaganda.

If America rejected these agreements, it would be the return of "isolationism." This Nation would have turned its back on the world and so on. Russia has not adhered to Bretton Woods. Great Britain did so only when granted a loan. So much for that.

The most powerful claim was the pocketbook claim. Without Bretton Woods America could not export. There would be a currency devaluation race with each nation trying to bar goods of the other. One of the favorite pieces of showmanship was to get John Jones or Ella Smith on the radio for 3 minutes. John or Ella spoke a canned piece about how exports would help him or her and how they liked Bretton Woods—about which they knew nothing whatever—because it would stimulate exports, thus enabling them to live prosperously for ever after.

How has it turned out? Instead of devaluing their currencies, nations are upvaluing. Instead of trying to bar American exports they are trying to put themselves in position to buy. They are doing that so intensively that Washington is talking about ways to restrict shipments abroad.

We go into this at this time because it is the latest addition to a record which is as consistent as anything one is likely to see. It makes the bad guesses of the Washington planners 100 percent. Through the war they were thinking up new crop controls, and the world is short of food. There were to be 8,000,000 unemployed but we had a labor shortage and still have. Shelves of blueprints for public works were drawn but it turns out that there is not enough labor and materials to build the houses people want. So far as we know there was not one prediction which was not exactly 100-percent wrong.

Well, what makes the planners act that way?

Partly they are stupid, or, in the words of the late Harry Hopkins, just "too damn dumb." Yes, they can read and write and reel off theories and statistics that would swamp the average citizen but they are, nevertheless, the victims of the most dangerous stupidity, that which afflicts the highly educated man without perception.

But largely their predictions were based on what they hoped would happen. And the reason they wanted bad things to happen is that they would thereby have an argument for keeping their jobs of power and influence. It was a depression that brought them to prominence and persuaded the country to experiment with the efforts at managed economy and it was only a continuation of the depression that would prevent them being thrown out. Dreading such an event, they predicted depression.

Every one of the bad predictions that has been mentioned here was based on an assumption. That assumption was that this country and the world would continue under the conditions that obtained in the '30's. That the conditions might change was not admitted. That they might reverse themselves was to be put outside any calculations. And so the planners planned for a depression and so there we are.

When a private citizen guesses wrong about his private affairs, and fails to reverse himself in time, he is penalized. What happens to the planners? Well, there is Bretton Woods and the bad guessers have not been penalized. They have been rewarded. One of the principal proponents has a job at $17,000 a year tax-free.

Labor Puts Its House in Order

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the membership of American labor unions is, in an overwhelming majority, and in the truest sense, a patriotic body of our citizenship.

The evidence that this majority is growing more articulate, and more jealous of its rights as union members is shown by the increasing number of union locals which are going on record as opposed to totalitarian practices which would, in the long run, destroy all the rights and privileges gained by labor during the past half-century in America.

A very clear example of this demand by labor for democracy within its own corporate machinery comes from the following news item which appeared on July 22, 1946, in the Bridgeport Post. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I call the attention of legislators to the action of local 203, United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America, an affiliate of the CIO, in furthering the cause of free labor:

G-E UNION HITS COMMUNISM—STORMY SESSION

A resolution condemning communism within the ranks of local 203, United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America, CIO, and prohibiting Communists from holding office in the union, was in the hands of the organization's constitution and bylaws committee today, following a stormy session of the local at the UEW hall, 600 Hallett Street, yesterday.

Other matters of business scheduled for discussion during the session were shunted aside as the union members, employees of the General Electric Co., debated the resolution for more than 3 hours before deciding to send it to the committee for further action.

The vote to send the resolution to the committee was reported as 64 to 46, and 61 to 53. The motion to forward the resolution to the committee was presented by Louis Santoianni, and the membership, it was said, voted that it was the sense of the meeting that the resolution as presented and read had the full confidence of those present.

BLYCHER IS SILENT

Fred Blycher, business agent, declined official comment on the situation today, stating that he is not the publicity agent of the union. Mr. Blycher said that the resolution had been presented and forwarded to the committee headed by Patrick O'Boyle, and added that he had no chance to determine whether 51 persons who signed a petition for presentation of the resolution were members of the local. The petition was not presented until 2:30 p. m., Mr. Blycher said.

The action follows similar resolutions adopted by city CIO councils in Hartford, Waterbury, and Torrington, and by the Brass Workers Local of the International Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers of this city, except that the resolution introduced yesterday by Daniel J. Ryan, of the conduit and wire division, is more drastic than any other resolution yet introduced in any Connecticut local dealing with the Communist questions.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas the membership of local 203 must abide by the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the UERMW, as to no discrimination against race, creed, and political beliefs, and whereas, we believe in the slogans "Organize the unorganized" and "In unity there is strength," and whereas we believe in the upgrading of our fellow workers in not using the UERMW as a means for fostering any "ism" within the local, be it resolved that we allow all workers in the electrical industry to join the UERMW, and be it further resolved that we, the membership of local 203, go on record as condemning communism or any subversive group or groups within our ranks, and be it further resolved that any member who acts in the interests of communism or any other "isms" which would tend to undermine the Constitution of the United States and the purpose of the organized labor movement, be enjoined from becoming an officeholder in local 203 and that any said member shall be denied, elected, or appointed to offices on any committee within our local, and be it further resolved that any officeholder found to be affiliated with these subversive groups shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $200; and be it resolved that local 203 publish this resolution in the daily newspapers and publicly denounce communism as an evil to organized labor.

OTHER BUSINESS

On the agenda for yesterday's meeting, which was presided over by Oliver Arsenault, president, was the election of CIO council delegates, a report on the constitution and bylaws, and election of delegates to the national convention in Milwaukee Labor Day week.

The discussion on the anti-Communist resolution took 3½ hours and Mr. Blycher said Sunday night that no other business was transacted. The election of delegates will come up at another meeting.

Mr. Ryan, who introduced the resolution, and Bernard Donnelly, a supporter, said afterward that the vote to send the resolution to the bylaws committee was carried 64 to 46. The matter of bringing the resolution before the meeting was accomplished by the presentation of a petition signed by 50 members to have it put on the agenda. This petition was introduced by Joseph Fontaine and carried 76 to 26.

In a debate on adoption of the resolution and its reference to a committee those who spoke in opposition included Frank Fazekas, Neil McGillicuddy, John Goldring, Josephine Willard, H. Peterson, and Harry Novak. Business Agent Blycher made a speech against the resolution on the grounds that it was inconsistent with the present constitution of the union.

Supporting the resolution in what was said to have been one of the most heated sessions of the local were Mr. Donnelly, Mr. Fontaine, Rudolph Link, Louis Santoianni, Frank O'Boyle, Thomas Griffith, Al Gill, James Shannon, James Glancy, John V. Francisco, John Bucko, Fred Mensch, and others.

The meeting adjourned and according to some present a few blows were struck between some of the members but the fighters were quickly quieted. During the discussion, it was reported that several of the members admitted they were members of the Communist party when the question was asked by others, "Who are the Communists in our midst?"

OFFICIAL STATEMENT

The following official version of the meeting was issued by Mrs. Josephine Willard, publicity agent for the local:

"At a 'general membership meeting of local 203 today a resolution was presented barring all 'isms' from our local. President Oliver Arsenault ruled that the resolution was unconstitutional. His ruling was challenged by several members but the membership upheld his decision.

"In making his ruling, Mr. Arsenault said: 'America is made up of all minority groups. In taking away the right of any individual because of his racial, religious or political beliefs we take away the rights and liberties of all groups. We have just emerged from a war against fascism which denies the right of minority groups. We won that war by bloody combat. Let us not make the same mistake twice.'

"By a vote of 61 to 53 the resolution was sent to the Constitution and By-Laws committee of our local as a routine procedure."

Search and Seizure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, with reference to usurping the individual's personal rights, I am including an editorial of Spencer Canary, editor of the Sentinel-Tribune, of Bowling Green, Ohio:

SEARCH AND SEIZURE

A month ago in this column we protested the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Jack Davis case as infringing upon the Bill of Rights in the Constitution. Congressman ALVIN F. WEICHEL has taken up the decision with the House Judiciary Committee; and there is hope that it will result in action that will make certain that no future distortion of the Bill of Rights will take place.

We now have before us the complete text of the Court's majority decision delivered by Justice Douglas and the vigorous dissenting opinion of Justice Frankfurter in which Justice Murphy concurs. It is in the Wood County law library and in other county libraries. Lawyers especially will find it very illuminating.

The gist of the majority opinion is that Jack Davis, a New York gasoline station proprietor, "voluntarily" submitted to search of locked premises and seizure of evidence on which he was convicted of illegal sales; and that, being "voluntary," his rights under the Bill of Rights were not trampled upon by investigators. The Court also holds that the gasoline coupons seized were not private property but of the Government.

The dissenting justice points out that the evidence shows the Government investigators by their action made Davis fearful that they would immediately break in and that to avoid the damage he consented. It was coercion that made him voluntarily surrender his rights.

Justice Frankfurter says that to hold that the search in this case was legal is to hold that a search which could not be justified under a search warrant is lawful without it. He says that even a search warrant must be specific and that private papers of an accused cannot be seized even through legal process.

The justice goes into the historic as well as legal aspects of the formation of the Constitution and shows that it clearly protects the individual.

The decision should be drastically challenged by Congress, our representatives whose first duty is to protect our rights under this basic law. It may operate sometimes to the advantage of the law-breaker; but its annulment by a court means that the liberty of every one is jeopardized.

The expediency of search and seizure often arises in cases where officers seek evidence hard to obtain; but the founders of the Constitution had experienced gross abuse under the British rule and so wrote the safeguard into the Constitution.

What Amputees Must Go Through To Secure Artificial Limbs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD KNUTSON
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I wish to include a letter from Dr. Frank S. Bacon, chief medical officer, Mount Alto Hospital, addressed to J. H. Leib, veterans' counselor, relative to the procedure in securing artificial limbs.

The letter is self-explanatory and it is hoped that something can be done to eliminate much of the red tape now in effect.

The letter follows:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., July 10, 1946.

Mr. J. H. LEIB,
American Veterans of World War II,
Arlington, Va.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Walter Bura, Acting Director, Prosthetic Appliances Service, has referred your letter of June 17, 1946, to this office for reply. The step-by-step procedure that each amputee must follow to receive an artificial limb through the Out-Patient Department of Veterans' Administration Hospital, Washington, D. C., is as follows:

1. The amputee presents himself to the receptionist in the Out-Patient Department of the hospital. (Here his treatment folder is pulled, or if he has never been at the hospital before, a treatment folder is prepared. The amputee should have with him his letter of compensation award and his military discharge, as these will save him considerable time.)

2. The amputee is referred to a physician specialist in orthopedics for examination and recommendation as to the suitable type of limb for the particular case. (Ordinarily the orthopedist holds clinics on Tuesday and Friday at 2. It is best that the amputee attend this clinic as the doctors conducting it are specially trained in amputation and prosthetic work. However, if it is inconvenient, arrangements can be made on any day of the week for an orthopedist to give the appropriate recommendation.)

3. The amputee next sees the prosthetic appliance clerk who checks his papers and, if necessary, his eligibility and directs him to the prosthetic appliance company which produces the recommended type of limb. This clerk will make appointments with the company if they are necessary.

4. The amputee then proceeds to the limb company where measurements are made, the limb furnished and fitted to the satisfaction of the amputee and the company.

5. The amputee returns to the Out-Patient Department wearing the fitted limb for final inspection by the orthopedist. If the limb is found to be correct and satisfactory to both the amputee and the physician, the prosthetic appliance card is signed by the doctor and the amputee.

Acting for the manager:

FRANK S. BACON, M. D.,
Chief Medical Officer.

Bureaucracy's Deadening Hand on Private Enterprise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Honolulu (T. H.) Advertiser:

BUREAUCRACY'S DEADENING HAND ON PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

The people of Hawaii, beneficiaries of the new United Airlines passenger service between Honolulu and San Francisco, are at the same time losers. This is because the Civil Aeronautics Board continues to lay its deadening hand on private enterprise which built the prosperous economy of modern Hawaii.

With one hand (War Shipping Administration) the Government has taken Matson's great passenger liners and continues to keep half of them nearly a year after the end of hostilities. With its other hand (Civil Aeronautics Board) it is granting facilities to others to serve the passenger trade which Matson spent 65 years developing, and without even permitting Matson to participate.

As great an injustice as this is to private American business, it shows an even greater disregard for the desires of the traveling public and of the American merchant marine.

Matson's inquiry of past travelers shows 34 percent will desire the convenience and facility of traveling one way by sea and one way by air. These studies have since been corroborated by surveys conducted by Time, Life, and Fortune, and the New England Council. Combination sea-air travel will never be promoted effectively except under a single management for reasons which are too obvious to enumerate.

The Civil Aeronautics Board has, however, gone beyond its disregard for private enterprise and public convenience. It has invaded the realm of national defense. When World War II broke upon us, 57 large passenger steamships flying the American flag were immediately available for troop transport and other war purposes. Today, all of these vessels are 10 years of age, or older. Not a single American passenger ship is under construction. The nearest approach is combination freight and passenger steamships, although the Government, with taxpayers' money, is building a limited number, because private capital cannot undertake the investment risk under the highly restrictive rulings of the CAB. Unless this is corrected we may find ourselves desperately short of this type of steamship should another emergency unfortunately descend upon us.

Shipping companies are essentially overseas transportation systems. It is important that they be allowed to utilize the most modern equipment and methods in their evolutionary development and in their service to the public. This is particularly true where no exclusive or preferential right is sought. Matson specifically stated in its application that it was suggesting no restriction against the issuance of certificates to additional air carriers, and it offered the service without Government subsidy or Government aid of any character, entirely at its own risk.

Now that the air age is here, we fail to see either logic or fairness in the Government's decision to deprive Matson of the right to give, and the people of Hawaii the right to receive this additional service. This is particularly true as to the service between Hawaii and the Pacific Northwest, where Matson held out the same offer, and the Board denied any service.

The CAB decision, while giving Hawaii a fine additional air service amply justified and required, is so vicious in its implications for free American enterprise, the American merchant marine, and the national defense, that Hawaii's joy in this progressive move is tempered by disappointment.

Terminal-Leave Pay—Bonds or Cash?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I want to call attention to the following letter which was received by me this morning from Harold G. Stagg, editor of Army Times, a national weekly newspaper for the United States Army, published at Washington.

The views advanced by Editor Stagg certainly deserve the most serious consideration from legislators and the public. This is a question in equity which should be weighed with the greatest regard for justice to the very large number of enlisted and former enlisted personnel of all the services.

It is hard to see, from an impartial viewpoint, any justice in asking that those entitled to terminal-leave pay should wait 5 years before they receive it.

ARMY TIMES,
Washington, D. C., July 22, 1946.

The Honorable CLARE BOOTHE LUCE,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MRS. LUCE: The proposal of the Senate Military Affairs Committee to pay accrued, unused leave to enlisted and former enlisted personnel of the armed forces in nonnegotiable 5-year bonds instead of in cash, as voted overwhelmingly and unanimously by the House of Representatives on June 11, is in our opinion unnecessary, unjustified and unfair.

The Senate Military Affairs Committee, in amending H. R. 4051, states that it seeks to lessen the inflationary effects of contemplated payments to enlisted and former enlisted personnel by providing for the issuance to them of 5-year, nonnegotiable, nontransferable bonds on which no loans can be obtained.

The report of the committee states that "sentiment has been widespread, both in the Congress and in the country, that justice and fairness require equality of treatment of officers and enlisted men with respect to their leave rights and benefits."

Nonetheless, the committee failed utterly to provide that "equality of treatment" when it recommended that payment of the obligation to enlisted and former enlisted personnel be, in effect, postponed for 5 years.

Terminal leave pay to officers was justified during and since the close of World War II under the provisions of an act of May 8, 1874, which authorized "in the discretion of the Secretary of War" leave of absence without deduction in pay or allowances up to a maximum of 120 days. Pay for unused leave has been made to officers in cash.

For Congress to countenance, on the one hand, the removal of price controls; substantially higher wages in Government, industry, and the armed forces; reduction of taxes, increased public works spending; and then defer for 5 years—through the issuance of nonnegotiable bonds—pay for earned, but unused leave to enlisted and former enlisted personnel on the grounds that it lessens the dangers of inflation is, in our opinion, indefensible. It is neither economically sound nor morally justifiable.

Terminal leave pay is not a bonus, either for officers or enlisted personnel. It is not a wage increase. It is not a sop to politics. It is a debt now owed to the enlisted and former enlisted personnel of the armed forces. It was earned in the same way that officers earned the leave for which they were paid in cash upon separation. It was earned in large part on the battlefronts and under other wartime conditions that made it impossible for earned leave to be used as earned.

There is justification for paying officers for unused leave in cash, and there is the same justification for paying enlisted and former enlisted personnel in cash. There is very real justification for treating officers and men alike.

While the enlisted personnel of the services was earning the terminal leave pay which they have not received, civilians patriotically poured billions of dollars into negotiable war bonds, and today are cashing in those bonds at will.

During the war the officers and enlisted personnel of the services also poured a huge percentage of their earnings—especially while fighting overseas—into war bonds, and unless the terminal leave pay so long overdue to enlisted personnel is paid in cash, they, too, may have to cash in their war bonds. Payment of terminal leave in cash will not adversely affect the Nation's economy any more than the day-to-day cashing in of war bonds by civilians and former service personnel.

The committee agrees that sentiment in favor of granting terminal leave to enlisted personnel is widespread. The fact that 380 Members of the House of Representatives voted unanimously to make payment for unused leave in cash is further evidence of that sentiment. To substitute a 5-year nonnegotiable bond-payment plan at this late date is inequitable in the extreme and makes a mockery of the committee's own statement that justice and fairness require "equality of treatment."

If terminal leave pay is to benefit enlisted and former enlisted men, it should place the money in their hands when they need it most; that is, in the first crucial months of readjustment to civil life—not 5 years from now when they will have had time to reestablish themselves. Certainly if they are paid in bonds, such bonds should be negotiable war bonds.

If Congress is to place enlisted men on "equality of treatment" with officers—as the committee sets forth—then provision should be made for payment in cash. That is the form in which officers have been and are being paid, and it is not recalled that the President, the Budget Bureau, or the Congress made any comments on the inflationary aspects of such payments.

Apart from the equities of the case—and there are many—it should be realized that not all enlisted and former enlisted men would spend their terminal leave pay immediately upon receipt of it. Those who have no real need will bank the money, or otherwise save or invest it. Furthermore, cash payment will result in considerable reduction of Federal disbursements for unemployment compensation by making it unnecessary for many former enlisted men to claim jobless pay.

It is hoped very earnestly that the Members of the Senate and the House will give consideration to the justice and the equity of the points outlined above. We would very much appreciate receiving from you an expression of your opinion on the merits of the case for payment in cash instead of 5-year, nonnegotiable, nontransferable bonds, for publication in an early issue of Army Times.

Sincerely yours,
HAROLD G. STAGG, Editor.

Primary Election in Queens County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM B. BARRY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FELLOW DEMOCRATS: The date for this year's primary election is Tuesday, August 20.

On that date the CIO-PAC and Communists hope to purge me from Congress. Their candidate, a member of the Communist controlled American Labor Party, and who lives outside our congressional district, is the business agent of local 450, of the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America, which is a notorious Communist-dominated union.

Recently, according to the Associated Press, in Dayton, Ohio, the national president and financial secretary of that union resigned. The president, Ralph E. Moses, told a meeting of 800 delegates that he was quitting because "every district local president in the United States and Canada, with the exception of four, are known Communists." He then urged the local to affiliate with the American Federation of Labor.

No one could be the business agent of Communist-controlled local 450 unless he followed the Communist Party line and was strictly for Russia first. That is the type of opponent that I have in the Democratic primary.

I know that at times some of my fellow Democrats have disagreed with my position on a number of issues—which they have a perfect right to do. I have never professed to possess a monopoly on good judgment. I do know, however, that at all times I have represented the majority of the people in my district and I have done so conscientiously and to the best of my ability. I also believe that even those Democrats who disagree with my voting record dislike that less than they do communism which is the greatest threat to our American way of life.

I, therefore, urge all enrolled Democrats regardless of how they may vote in the general election in November, to turn out and vote on August 20 primary, and let the CIO-PAC and Communists know that there is no place for them in the Democratic Party in Queens County.

Sincerely yours,
WILLIAM B. BARRY,
Member of Congress.

Polls are open from 3 to 10 p. m., Tuesday, August 20.

Great-Grandfather's Tale

OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an interesting and challenging editorial under the pen name Uncle Dudley, appearing in the issue of the Boston Globe of July 7, 1946:

GREAT-GRANDFATHER'S TALE

In the summer of 1986 Joshua Pendleton, of Wiscasset, Maine, being then in his late eighties, decided to write his memoirs. He undertook this arduous task partly for the sake of history—for he had played an important role in the remarkable events which attended the transformation of the American Republic during the middle years of the century. The more immediate motive for setting down his observations was, however, a purely personal one, and in this the old man shared company with the illustrious Marmontel and other noted writers of earlier centuries.

Joshua Pendleton's great-grandson, fertile in questions and boundless in curiosity (a not unusual characteristic of 14-year-olds) had come to Wiscasset to spend the summer. These two became cronies almost from the hour of their first meeting, a conjunction that had been long delayed because the boy's father had been for many years absent from home on diplomatic mission in Asia, where the boy was born.

Strolling along the storied water front of the charming old coastal town, the beauty of whose architecture established it long since as one of the museum pieces of New England, the alert ancient, who had been a Senator in his day, found himself compelled to repeat, over and over again, the narrative of those exciting years of his young manhood which are familiar history to every American schoolboy in this year 2000 of atomic peace.

It was from these story-telling sessions that Joshua Pendleton found inspiration for the writing of his memoirs. He began them, in fact, that very summer, after the boy's departure with his mother on the return trip to the capital of China. This explains why a notable work in American political literature took the form of letters from a very old man to his great-grandson. The following excerpt is from a chapter on the origins of the amazing transformation of the Government of the United States, which began shortly after the atomic-bomb experiments at Bikini Atoll, in the Pacific, during the midsummer of 1946.

"Men aboard the U. S. S. Camden, a cruiser which carried the party of more than 140 Senators and Congressmen observing the bomb explosion, at first noticed little change in the attitude and speech of the Members of Congress. The explosion of the bomb itself occurred at a distnce of several miles from their craft. In less than half an hour the visible effects of the detonation were wiped out entirely by a strong westerly wind, quartering to the north. The smoke vanished. The Pacific resumed its blue tranquillity. Aloft, a few dazzling cumuli drifted almost imperceptibly across the enormous arch of the skies.

"As the cruiser headed toward Diamond Head and distant San Francisco, there was the same jollity, the same good natured political bickering among Congressmen of differing views which had occurred on the trip out to mid-Pacific. * * * The whole excursion seemed to retain the characteristics of holiday that marked its beginning. The Camden, furrowing the barreled seas at a lively 18-knot clip, proceeded as if nothing of great historical moment had occurred, as if the hidden secrets of radioactivity liberated by the bomb explosion were nonexistent, as if no one aboard were changed.

"Two days from San Francisco signs of change became evident. Jollity ceased. Senators and Congressmen appeared to be depressed. There was an end to bantering exchanges. By the time the Camden raised the Golden Gate, knots of political officials could be seen huddled at various quarters on the deck and in wardroom, engaged in earnest discussion.

"The striking feature of this development was that they were all in close agreement. Though a few of the ship's officers sought explanation of this singular behavior among their guests, none was found. The statesmen were reticent toward all who were not of the congressional party. Nobody knew then, nor indeed until some time afterward, how the subtle and invisible effects of the 'Q-ray,' liberated by the bomb explosion, were to change not only these men but the history of the United States.

"Arriving at San Francisco the official party startled the local chamber of commerce of that city, famous for its hospitality, by refusing to tarry and complete what had been considered a holiday excursion. To offers of free entertainment at the Mark Hopkins, they returned polite regrets, explaining that grave matters of national importance required their immediate return to the Nation's Capital. Nor would they consider the incurring of any further expense at the cost of the public. Canceling earlier arrangements, each insisted upon meeting all expenditures connected with the trip to Washington from his own pocket.

"What happened following the return of this little band of inspired and determined men is now history. The miraculous effects of the mysterious 'Q-ray' to which, unwittingly, they had been exposed, became swiftly apparent. Their colleagues on Capitol Hill were at first dumbfounded, then infuriated, but eventually bowled over by the change in attitudes toward public affairs displayed by the returned travelers. In committee meetings as well as on the floors of both Houses, it was soon evident that events without parallel in the annals of the Nation since the framing and acceptance of the Constitution itself, were unfolding.

"In a solid phalanx the returned statesmen organized and let loose a political revolution which startled the entire Nation and soon evoked almost universal acclaim. With matchless eloquence, with an almost superhuman skill at cooperative maneuver, they tackled the antiquated tangle of precedents, rules, and customs that had reduced the Congress, especially in the Senate, to inefficient futility in the conduct of business.

"Rules were revised to put an end to filibusters and emancipate majority will from the delaying tactics of shady political stratagem. Patronage was outlawed. The naming of Federal officers to key posts all over the Nation, a right hitherto reserved to Members of Congress, was entrusted to a Federal Personnel Board, chosen from among the most capable administrators in the land. Subordinate commissions, similarly constituted, were set up in each State.

"In the Congress, committees were consolidated and placed on a basis of efficiency, their members being chosen strictly with an eye to merit and experience in the area of public interest with which each committee was concerned. After providing adequate salaries for all members, Congress forbade any member to retain connections of personal financial nature, directly or indirectly, in any corporate body or business interest in the Nation. The good of the country as a whole became the sole test of all legislative proposals. Organized pressure lobbies were banished a distance of at least 100 miles from the capital.

"Tremendous programs for development of public education and public health displaced previous enormous wastage of funds in a hundred causes. The budget was reduced more than a third; yet no essential service suffered and many new ones were added. Junkets were abolished to insure proper attendance of legislators. To facilitate the public business, all speeches aimed at races or religions, or designed to stir social animosities, were forbidden on pain of expulsion. The Department of State was restored to full control of foreign policy, after a sharp skirmish with the War and Navy Departments. Thus the plan originally laid down by the founders of the Republic was reestablished. Parties shifted from the old basis of embittered contest over class interests to competition of constructive aims for the general good. A system of wise, fair, and democratic regulations brought peace in labor-management relations, sped the wheels of industry, and ushered in an era of social and economic freedom such as the world had never before witnessed. And, as the margins of freedom widened, a mighty renaissance began in the creative arts. Science, long a source of fear and destructive anarchy, became man's well-managed servant. Philosophy flourished. Incalculable constructive forces, liberated by the educational and health program, spread their beneficent influences first at home and then throughout the world, fortifying peace, broadening cooperative opportunities, and restoring man to that spiritual and moral ascendency over himself, loss of which in earlier decades had carried him to the verge of the pit.

"'The 'Q Ray,' of which no one had dreamed, thus became the instigator of the age of atomic peace."

The Union Could Help Here

OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Christian Science Monitor of June 29, 1946:

THE UNION COULD HELP HERE

The United Mine Workers of America based their recent strike largely on demands upon the operators for improved health and welfare safeguards, but a recent incident in Pennsylvania illustrates how the union might itself exercise a greater degree of responsibility in this regard. A group of workers threatened to walk off the job when foremen searched them at the mine mouth for matches and cigarettes. Searching was enforced because men insisted on violating the "no-matches" rule. Yet the United States Bureau of Mines has warned that smoking is the cause of many disastrous mine explosions.

Every one of the thousands of Coast Guardsmen, regular and reserve, who were assigned to port security during the war will recognize this baffling problem. Where ships were being loaded with ammunition or other highly explosive material, longshoremen often had to be searched at the gangplank for matches and cigarettes, and constantly watched to prevent surreptitious smoking in the cargo holds. A Bureau of Mines report, published in January 1941 titled "Explosions in Coal Mines Caused by Smoking," points out how miners smuggle smoking materials into the mines in sandwiches, thermos bottles, and hidden pockets of their underwear. The Bureau says:

"Of 130 explosions in Alabama mines, 76.9 percent have been caused by open lights and smoking. Pennsylvania anthracite mines have experienced 90 such explosions."

That workers will grow careless and take chances despite danger is well known to every factory or mill owner. As a result many machines have had to be made foolproof. But there is no mechanical device which can keep cigarettes and matches out of a miner's pocket. This simplest safety precaution requires cooperation on the part of the worker himself. Supervisory forces have borne the brunt of the disagreeable task of enforcing the rule, but here is a place where the UMWA can help. Why can't the union aid in the inspection, exact a no-smoking pledge from miners, and enforce its own penalties against violators of antismoking rules?

Berlin Devastation Astonishes Editor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the third in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called A Trip Through Hell and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

BELLAMY SUGGESTS CITY'S UTTERLY RUINED CENTER MAY REMAIN A WASTE FOR CENTURIES

The question is often asked as to how badly Germany was damaged.

I can offer some first-hand testimony on that.

The devastation in German cities was colossal. The worst hit places that we saw were Berlin, Munich, Nuremberg, Stuttgart, and Frankfort, but travelers who had greater opportunity to see Germany as a whole have said that of the cities that I have mentioned above Nuremberg was the only major job of devastation done by the air forces, and that the other cities which were hit hardest were Coblenz, Cologne, Essen, Darmstadt, Mannheim, Kassel, and Pforzheim.

Take Berlin, for example. Berlin was a city of magnificence, if there ever was one on this planet.

Unter den Linden, the Sieges Alle, the Houses of Parliament, the Tiergardten, were all laid out on a thoroughly splendid scale.

Those parts of Berlin, like Carthage, are utterly ruined. We walked down the Unter den Linden and saw the ruins of the Adlon, one of the swankiest hostelries of Europe. They are now trying to go back into business with 20 rooms in one wing of the hotel, but the main building is utterly "kaput," to use the word so often employed in Europe.

CHANCELERY TORN UP

We visited the Reichschancelery, in the basement of which Hitler is supposed to have ended his life and that of his mistress, Eva Braun. Although the walls are standing, there were great holes in the roof, all the windows were out and every floor has been catapulted into the basement.

It has been estimated that it would take 10 trains of 50 cars each, or 500 cars a day, working 365 days a year for 16 years, to clear the rubble out of the central part of Berlin so that construction could start. I think what will happen is that the Berliners will have to give up the ruined parts of their city and go out to the suburbs. In time it may be that the central part of Berlin will be covered with the debris of time, and possibly excavated a thousand years from now, as was the Roman Forum, which we saw later.

In Frankfort, to mention a figure which will give some idea of the housing problem throughout all Germany, it has been estimated that before the war the city possessed 520,664 rooms, not including kitchens and baths. Today, half these rooms are totally destroyed and another 12 percent are so badly damaged that they cannot be lived in. The United States Army, on moving in, took all the best remaining buildings by requisition, and there remained 136,546 rooms, including entrance halls, for the 365,000 Germans in Frankfurt on January 1, 1946.

Not only does the city dweller in Germany now have to live in a cold house all the year around, but he has to use shank's mare or a bicycle to get to his work, sometimes miles away. Public transportation has been spottily restored in some cities, but by and large the proud and haughty German has to proceed about his business on foot or by bicycle. Push carts are also often seen in the streets, being dragged as often as not by women, some of them well along in the seventies.

The people look ill-fed, ill-clothed, down at the heel, and hopeless. They are indeed paying the wages of sin.

What the effect of the malnutrition and the hard living conditions will be on the children of Germany in the years to come nobody can foresee, but there are already signs of a great increase in tuberculosis and rickets among children, and, in fact, the whole list of diseases which spring from insufficient diet and bad living conditions.

Despite the immensity of the ruins in Berlin, I was not so greatly impressed with the horror of the air raids there as I was at Nuremberg, where the damage was more concentrated in the center of the town.

With a companion of the voyage, I sauntered through the devastated part of Nuremberg and tried to imagine the stark awfulness of those nights of bombing, when great buildings came crashing down, with cornices weighing 20 tons smashing everything in their way; when bombs landed on roofs and took everything with them to the cellar; when an occasional wall would stand, a mute remainder of a once largely populated tenement house; when the people in a church would cry eloquently to heaven to the God who, it must have seemed to them on those awful nights, had deserted them.

SINGER'S STATUE SURVIVES

In the center of the ruins stood a little monument with a plaque, dedicated to the memory of Hans Sachs, the greatest meistersinger of them all, celebrated by Richard Wagner, but of Hans Sach's house there was no vestige left.

The rubble stood so high that, to the pedestrian, it seemed like man-made mountains, and over it all hung the fetid smell of death. There must be thousands upon thousands of bodies which will never be recovered in the ruins of the German cities.

In almost every hotel in central Germany one can see signs: "Do not drink the water from the tap because it is polluted. Use water from the Lyster bag."

The Lyster bag is a canvas container for water to which chlorine has been added. It was named for its inventor, Maj. William Lyster, medical corps, United States Army. The water from these bags is unpalatable in the extreme, but most of the inhabitants drink the tap water just the same, and owing to the exceptional vigor of the military authorities in administering typhus and typhoid inoculations, the death rate from these diseases has been kept down.

The net of it is that Germany is now without any large cities, and German civilization and prosperity was largely built up on the cities. Some towns escaped practically without damage. Heidelberg and Wiesbaden are examples of this, particularly Heidelberg. This lovely university city emerged practically unscathed. The college buildings are intact, and so is the enormous wine vat, the biggest in the world.

COUNTRYSIDE LOVELY

The German countryside is as lovely as ever and bloomed with a beauty which made the heart ache as we drove through this smiling land in the spring sunshine. The question constantly obtruded as to what insanity suddenly seized the Germans that they thought they were God and had to be put down by other nations of the world. And put down they were to utter ruin.

They had everything that a nation could wish for. They had a beautiful countryside, rich in agricultural wealth. They had great cities with splendid parks and magnificent public buildings. They had a great culture in literature, music, and all branches of belles lettres. They boasted the second greatest technological progress in the world, being surpassed in that respect only by the United States—and they threw it all away.

Someday an explanation will be vouchsafed to the world as to what happened to the German mind between 1870 and 1946, but to me it is still an enigma.

The Germans now are a beaten race, and they know it. Of love for their conquerors they have none. It is my impression, after talking with a great many of them, that they consider the Americans and the British less offensive than the Russians and the French, but that is far from saying that they have any affection for us. We are in for a long, tough job of policing, and need not expect any love for it.

To sum up the damage in Germany, which I have only indicated, but which one could go on writing about for the length of a whole book, I came away from Germany with a different impression from the one I had gone over with. Namely, that even if left to their own devices, the Germans could not, at least for a quarter century, be in a position where they could challenge the security of the world. The land is too completely devastated.

They asked for it, and they had it. I don't pity them, but I think that all serious men have to consider where we go from here.

Nonscheduled Air Lines

OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, following my remarks of yesterday about the problems faced by the so-called nonscheduled air lines I am including with my remarks a letter to the Civil Aeronautics Board from the Military Pilots Association and also a copy of the objections of that organization to proposed amendment No. 3 to section 292.1 of the Board's regulations.

The one essential thing, Mr. Speaker, is for the Board to permit this badly needed air-line business to develop for a period without stringent regulations in order that a clear picture of the situation and the need may develop.

MILITARY PILOTS ASSOCIATION,
Miami, Fla., July 19, 1946.

CIVIL AERONAUTICS BOARD,
Commerce Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: Pursuant to this organization's efforts on behalf of the nonscheduled carriers and the former military pilots employed by such carriers, the following comments and suggestions are respectfully submitted:

In view of the confusion existing between the CAB's rulings on docket 1501 and the carriers' understanding of said rulings; and, in view of the fact that forms, upon which carriers were to submit information to the CAB concerning 1501, were not in the hands of carriers at present writing and through no fault of their own but rather because they had not been circulated in time by the CAB and CAA; and, because the carriers' duties with respect to filing information with the CAB in compliance with part 42, and their duties in filing information in compliance with docket 1501 were confused and not made clear to them; and because in filling out forms affecting themselves with respect to docket 1501, the carriers must necessarily give grave consideration to certain items contained therein which, if filled in honestly, would give cause to the CAE for a cease-and-desist order under their rulings; because time is needed to clarify the CAB's position in this respect and reassure the carriers of no malintent but rather an effort to obtain information so that public interest may be served.

It is therefore respectfully suggested that an extension of time be afforded the carriers to the mutual benefit of CAB and the carriers. The present dead-line dates, July 15 for information on part 42, and July 22 for forms concerning 1501, do not give the carriers a fair chance to submit what the CAB, in its efforts to best serve the public interest, wants from the nonscheduled carriers.

Another aspect to be considered is with respect to proposed amendment 3 of section 292.1 of the economic regulations. This proposal has found nonscheduled carriers in a completely unprepared position to present the board with proper comments and constructive criticisms.

A fair extension of time for nonscheduled carriers to comply with CAB present rulings, and to allow them an opportunity to prepare their side of the story concerning proposed rulings, is, we believe, acting in the best interests of the public.

Sincerely,

EVERETT E. JONES,
Executive Vice President.
JOSEPH W. FAGAN, Jr.,
Vice President and Treasurer.

OBJECTIONS OF THE MILITARY PILOTS' ASSOCIATION TO AMENDMENT NO. 3, SECTION 292.1 OF THE ECONOMIC REGULATIONS

In re amendment No. 3, section 292.1 of the economic regulations, before the Civil Aeronautics Board, Washington, D. C., July 22, 1946.

The Military Pilots' Association, a nonprofit national organization, with headquarters at 3502 North Miami Avenue, Miami, Fla., is comprised entirely of veteran pilots of World War II. Present membership lists number in the thousands and all members have voiced objections to the proposed amendment No. 3, section 292.1 of the Economic Regulations.

Therefore, the board of trustees, representing the members of the Military Pilots' Association, presents herewith, arguments against the proposed regulations, and petitions for the continuation of the charter and nonscheduled air lines of the United States for reasons set forth herein:

1. It is the contention of the Military Pilots' Association that the Civil Aeronautics Board has erred in stating that the charter carriers are a threat to the volume of business of the major air lines simply because the nonscheduled traffic has grown so large in the past 6 months. Because:

(a) The ability of the scheduled lines to advertise rates, to advertise for passengers and express, and to receive a mail subsidy, and to secure money by public stock sales, is sufficient to give a great competitive advantage which is certainly more than the major air lines need.

(b) Reports published by financial organizations show a continuing expansion in the number of passengers and amount of freight being carried for the first 6 months of 1946.

(c) We therefore contend that the scheduled air lines will not be able for a long time to meet the public demands for passengers and freight.

2. The equipment being used by the nonscheduled air lines has been reconverted, licensed, and is now being operated under rules set forth by the Civil Aeronautics Administration.

3. The aircraft and equipment being used by the nonscheduled operators has been purchased from the United States Government, from declared surplus war materials, with full knowledge by the Government that these aircraft were to be set up and used in airline operations.

4. Of the more than 300 nonscheduled passenger and freight carrying lines listed by the Civil Aeronautics Authority, there are more than 500 multiengine-type aircraft in use, and nearly 5,000 smaller single-engine, feeder-line type in use.

5. The nonscheduled lines, both passenger and freight, are, for the most part, owned and operated by the veterans of World War II, and their personnel consists of more than 6,500 of these pilots and over 10,000 ground crew, of which over two-thirds are ex-servicemen. And of these pilots, some thousand are members of the Military Pilots' Association.

6. The livelihood of these persons, whose present activities are a continuation of the training which they received in the armed forces, is that for which they are best fitted. Many of these persons have never worked before, having left college to become pilots and members of ground crews which made up the greatest air force ever established. To strip these men of their investments and their present jobs, is to break down the vast force of reserve pilots and ground crews; while allowing these charter air lines to continue, the tremendous reserve of pilot personnel will be kept in flying status, and will serve as a continuous active reserve for the future protection of the United States.

7. The maintaining of these nonscheduled air lines will hold this tremendous reserve without cost to the taxpayers, and with no subsidy from the Government.

8. The Civil Aeronautics Board has lost complete sight of the fact that domestic transportation and foreign relations can be best promoted by applying safety to air transportation, while at the same time encouraging the greatest freedom of competitive effort in order to develop air transportation to its fullest extent.

9. In comparison to the major air lines, the safety record of the contract carriers and nonscheduled lines far excels them for the first 6 months of 1946.

10. We contend that the major lines should be restricted in their hectic race for expansion, rather than adopting the 10 trips proposed by the Civil Aeronautics Board for the nonscheduled group.

11. It appears entirely un-American and strictly unfair to allow surplus aircraft to be sold to veterans by one governmental agency and then to be literally taken away by another department in the same year. The Civil Aeronautics Board has erred in holding that contract air carriers could or should apply for scheduled routes, when the Board knew that the charter lines in existence since the end of the war were not financially able to make applications and to pay the expenses concurrent thereto and be made to await the long delay for action on route petitions.

12. The Civil Aeronautics Board erred in holding that the charter air carriers should be curbed as to growth and activity, in that the Board has failed to consider the increased demand for air transportation which has been greatly developed and absorbed by the charter carriers. In so finding, the Board has ignored the promise that they, the Board, should promote aviation and not curb it.

13. All the nonscheduled air carriers, both passenger and freight, are wholly in accord in setting up and supporting stringent rules and regulations pertaining to safety, both in the maintenance of equipment and in the licensing of pilots, navigators, mechanics, and other key personnel.

14. The limitations which are now proposed by the Civil Aeronautics Board will make it impossible for the majority of the nonscheduled lines to carry on after August 1, 1946.

15. Prohibiting these lines from flying outside of the North American Continent would take away a vital service now being offered by many of these carriers who now fly to foreign ports. This is evidenced as shown by the freight and passenger loads now being transported by these carriers in and out of the United States. And it also seems that there is no necessity for a certificate of convenience and necessity in these cases, whereas the major air lines cannot furnish this service; while the charter lines and nonscheduled carriers are filled to capacity on nearly all of these foreign flights.

16. If the waiting lists of all the scheduled air lines are examined, both the foreign and domestic, it will show that even now, with the major carriers increasing their numbers of aircraft, and with the Miami season in particular being at its lowest peak in the months of June, July, and August; that they, the major lines, are still not able to keep up with the demands for transportation.

17. Furthermore, the contract carriers are at this time running capacity loads in both freight and passengers.

18. The restricting of the nonscheduled carriers at a time when they are serving these demands seems wholly untimely, monopolistic, in restraint of free trade, the attempt to stifle small business and competition.

19. We therefore petition that no curtailment of present nonscheduled operations be put into effect until such time as such data can be gathered and hearings be held at key points throughout the United States to hear the public's wish and to get full operating reports and data on the existing charter air lines, and at such time as this data have been gathered, necessary rules and regulations be promulgated regarding all air carriers which will best serve the public demand. We further petition that at least 1 year be allowed for the gathering of these facts in order that a fair set of rulings may be made which will allow the air-transportation system of this country to grow naturally unheeded and to expand by the use of private capital to best serve the economic welfare of the citizens of the United States, and those of other countries who wish to engage in trade with us.

20. The future of the supremacy in the air depends upon the enterprising and unlimited sources afforded businesses of all descriptions in the United States and the full development of every phase of air transportation that can be afforded and undertaken and pioneered by the air transportation of the United States.

21. The veteran pilots and the ground crews of the combined air forces of World War II are not asking for favors because they fought. This, they felt, was their duty for the protection of themselves and their families. They want the right to enter into business activities as they see fit and to carry on where they left off before the war. The Air Forces groups, as a whole, have no chip on their shoulder, and are not demanding anything unusual. They represent a high type of American manhood and only ask that they be allowed to pioneer and keep the United States supreme in world affairs.

Vice President and Chairman of Board of Trustees.

Remarks of Hon. Thomas J. Lane, of Massachusetts, Before Veterans of Polish Descent Welcome Home Banquet, Chelsea, Mass.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein an address delivered by me at a welcome-home banquet tendered to World War II veterans of Polish descent at the St. Stanislaus School Hall on Chestnut Street, Chelsea, Mass., on Sunday evening, July 21, 1946. This affair was conducted under the auspices of the combined Polish-American Societies of Chelsea, Mass., and was the second in a series of welcome-home banquets given to the veterans of World War II. The first get-together was held in October of 1945, and this second affair was tendered to more than 200 of the veterans and the members of their immediate families. It is expected that within the near future a similar affair will take place to other Polish-American World War veterans not included in the first two groups. I am proud to state that these young men and women of Polish-American extraction from the city of Chelsea, Mass., served in large numbers, making a very excellent contribution to the make-up of the armed forces of the United States in this Second World War. The toastmaster for this occasion was Roman F. Pucko, one of the leading citizens and educators in that city. Other speakers on the program were the Honorable Bernard L. Sullivan, mayor of the city of Chelsea; Rev. Father Callistus Szpara, pastor of St. Stanislaus Roman Catholic Church, Chelsea; and Lt. Col. Stanley W. Wisnioski, former member of the Industrial Accident Board of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

My address follows:

The United States Marines, who have done quite a bit of traveling in their time, and who are in a position to speak, have come to a very realistic conclusion. They believe that all Hollywood publicity men, all lecturers and tourist agents who try to sell us on the beauty of tropical isles, the sunny hills of Italy, or the fashionable beaches of France, should practice what they preach. They can have the islands, the hills, and the beaches for keeps, if that will help the marines to get back home on the double.

Like the rest of our service men and women they know that there's no place like home. There were times, in their experience, when it seemed that they would never see home again, but those dark days are past and most of our veterans are back. And they are glad to be back, not only to see the hills and the beaches and the glorious summertime in Massachusetts, but to pick up the pleasant ways of peace in the company of friends and relatives from whom they have been separated by years that were eternities.

As in the best of reunions, the pleasure is mutual, and genuine. We do not welcome you with fireworks because we believe that you have had your fill of fireworks. The war was not an heroic adventure to those who had to face it. It was a grim and deadly business which shocked the world into a realization of the adjustments which must be made, if our civilization is to survive. And so we welcome you home, not with any false and fleeting display, but with the sincere handclasp of friends, for whom this day is but the beginning of a reunion that will last as long as we shall live.

We have left the anguish and ruin of war behind us. Before us lies the job of building a world in which there shall be peace, security and opportunity for all.

It will not be easy.

We shall need machines and materials and plans and effort. But more than these, we shall need the help of one another. Machines alone cannot do the job. The one imperative lesson of the war is that we must find a way of working together.

You veterans know the meaning and the necessity of cooperation. As Americans of Polish extraction you were justly proud of your heritage. Poland was the first to stand up against the Nazi aggressor, when the rest of the world was afflicted with the paralysis of appeasement. With characteristic independence, the Poles knew that no dictator would ever be satisfied with appeasement, for authoritarian governments take everything and give nothing. And so the Poles stood up and fought the aggressor. Though they were overwhelmed by superior force, they served to awaken the world to its danger. Even after Poland fell, the Poles fought on, in the underground, in Norway and Italy and France. They fight on, today, against another tyranny, whose oppression is no less dangerous because it is hidden from the world.

To the American armed services, you brought this unyielding courage and liberty-loving spirit which characterized your relatives abroad. In the American Army and Navy you worked and fought, side by side with men of many different racial extractions, but in the common effort which united all, those differences meant nothing. You helped one another as men and came to know the tolerance and understanding and cooperation which is the goal of our democratic way of life. You have a better grasp of this than many of us who stayed at home. That is why we need your help. For in the days to come, the political and spiritual and cultural liberties which we now enjoy, must be preserved. And from these, we must work to develop the social and economic freedoms which will strengthen our democracy and set an example for the rest of the world.

You did not simply fight against the Fascists and the Jap militarists. You fought for and were united by the right of freedom to work out their problem through intelligent compromise, as equals, without tyranny on any one side or slavery on the other.

Under the pressure of common danger, your loyalty to this belief was intensified. But we shall need this loyalty in peace, even more than we did in war. All of us must learn to cooperate for the purpose of building security and progress.

The people here, back home, have many separate and strong loyalties. The workers are loyal to their unions and the operators are loyal to an organization of their own. Mr. Jones is loyal to one church, while Mr. Smith is loyal to another. Even Members of Congress are divided, some being loyal to the interests of the Corn Belt, others defending the interests of the South or the interests of New England. Everyone who acts with a group has a sense of loyalty to that group, as you will be loyal to the particular veterans organization which you join.

The danger in such loyalties is that they may become so extreme as to separate us at the very time that we need to reach a common understanding. In the Old World, civilizations collapsed when communication systems broke down. As veterans, you understand the importance of the word "communications." Whenever they failed, the success of the whole operation was endangered. That was war. But today communication systems are breaking down in a different way. We still have newspapers, cables, telephones, and radios, which are the mechanical means of communication. In spite of all these conveniences, however, there is a failure of communication between man and man, group and group, nation and nation. There is difficulty in reaching understandings, even with the added help of legislation, arbitration boards, Big Four conferences, and the United Nations.

As Americans, we believe in variety, and not regimentation. It is not treason for one man to say that he is a Republican, or for another to say that he is a Democrat. Some people believe in price conrol; others oppose it. A liberal urges change, a conservative warns against it. City workers fight for wage increases, and the property owners object. Some people think we should let everybody in on the secret of the atomic bomb; others say "No." Every man is entitled to his opinion.

But that opinion is dangerous if the mind which holds it, rigidly excludes all other opinions and tries to win the decision by force alone. Any opinion, to be worthy of the name, must meet and mingle with other opinions so that a workable compromise may be reached. Only in this way can we put the common welfare of the United States above our private or group conflicts. The man who will not give a little in these quarrels is not only the Nation's enemy, he is his own enemy and the enemy of those who blindly follow his leadership. It is the responsibility of every American citizen, when faced with an issue, to explore all phases of the problem. In a spirit of well-informed and reasonable conciliation we can do our share to solve all of the problems which now plague us.

If we can be loyal to that which serves the over-all good of America, settling our differences by rough reasonable concessions by both sides—in any dispute—we shall be in a better position to face our international responsibilities.

The quarrels which have torn our country during the past 6 months, encourage those who do not believe in the democratic system. If we cannot get along with each other, how can we get along with other nations?

They have watched the unity which we had in war, fall apart with the coming of peace. They believe that this is a sign of our inability to meet and solve the new problems of this new age. They believe we are ripe for regimentation.

It is up to us to demonstrate how wrong they are. We shall maintain our infinite variety. The stimulating clash of opinions has furnished the drive that has made our Nation great. In the free air of open discussion, which reveals all of the facts, we have the great meeting ground for fair compromise, decision, and solution.

We shall not hide our failures behind an iron curtain.

We shall face our mistakes and correct them as we try to develop teamwork among men.

You, the veterans who fought and suffered in this war, have learned much from your experience. You have come back, determined to make of our country an even better place in which to live. You want an education, a decent job, and a home. We welcome you with the pledge that we will do everything in our power to help you win through to these objectives.

But we also need your advice and assistance. For you know better than we that there can be no happiness or progress for any individual or group without peace and security for all.

We depend upon you, the veterans of World War II. Show us the way by your example to that genuine cooperation from which all real living begins.

We welcome you home with affection, sincerity, and hope. Before us is the great adventure of building a new world from the old and we shall learn to build that world together.

No Pensions for Congressmen

OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of June 28, 1946:

NO PENSIONS FOR CONGRESSMEN

Members of the House of Representatives, restive to get home until after the November elections, should not adjourn without disposing of the La Follette program for the reorganization of Congress.

This measure, which has already passed the Senate, would modernize the congressional machinery, now hopelessly antiquated. It also would provide for registration of lobbyists, would raise congressional salaries from $10,000 to $15,000 annually, and would bring Congressmen under the Federal retirement system.

The Journal is heartily back of all of these proposals except that which would give pensions to Congressmen. It is now, and has been, opposed to the giving of pensions to elective officials. This applies especially to Congressmen and Senators, State legislators, aldermen, supervisors, and State, county, and city executive officers.

Pensions for workers under civil service and social security for the mass of the populace are worth-while policies to which the Nation is committed. Pensions for elective officials are different. The elected official does not run for office as a career, so there is no basis on which he can justly claim a pension. To give him one, and thus grant that his service may constitute a career, would be contrary to good public policy. It would run counter to our conception of government.

We hope the House will take the pension provision out and then pass the La Follette bill.

This Hurts Morale

OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of July 20, 1946:

THIS HURTS MORALE

The Navy apparently has not yet solved the problem of getting mail to its boys promptly, especially when they change location.

A Milwaukee father received back three letters addressed to his son in the Pacific. Two were postmarked March 12 and one March 29. They were addressed through the fleet post office in San Francisco. This is just a typical case.

The ships on which these boys are stationed are moving around, of course. Or the boy may be transferred to a new post. But it would seem that the Navy mail need not be 4 months behind in finding where he is.

Morale in the defense services is important. Many parents realize that and write promptly and often. It would seem that the services would want to be on their toes in handling this mail.

Veterans Deserve Better Treatment—Housing Badly Needed—Nation-Wide Survey Shows Wyatt Program Failing

OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, a Nation-wide survey shows that the veteran emergency housing program is failing and that in spite of all the authority given to Mr. Wyatt to provide housing for veterans it has produced very little relief.

Southern California has been hit the hardest because of the large number of veterans from other States who have decided to make their postwar home in southern California.

Here is a report of a Nation-wide survey as reported by the National Association of Home Builders:

Less than 10 percent of the veterans' houses started under the veterans' emergency housing program have been completed because of failure of the Government to assure a flow of building materials, the National Association of Home Builders reported today.

A telegraphic check of active builders in 23 States found the veterans' housing program badly stalled everywhere, the association reported. The survey showed that 92 percent of all veterans' houses started since inception of the program January 15 are either at a standstill or seriously delayed because of lack of materials. In 7 major areas builders survey reported 40,054 priorities taken out since January 15; 21,766 units started and 1,355 completed—a ratio of 8 percent of the "starts" completed, 92 percent unfinished.

In all cases builders reported that shortages of critical materials are responsible for the bogging down of the program. None of them reported prospects for improvement of supply in the near future.

"Unless something is done quickly to get more materials to builders, thousands of veterans face another winter with no place of their own to live," Frank Cortright, executive vice president of the association, declared. "These reports from builders trying to get veterans' housing built show only too clearly that all the talk in Washington about Government action and all the legislation enacted and proposed will not produce houses."

A cross section of 69 of the Nation's most active builders were queried by the association as follows:

"Extremely important that you wire us today how many HH priorities taken out by you since January 15, how many such units started since January 15, and how many completed. What percentage is badly stalled or stopped lacking materials and how many months is it taking to complete houses?"

The States covered included Alabama, California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, Minnesota, North Carolina, New York, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, and Wisconsin.

Builders reported that the time needed to complete houses has lengthened from a normal 3 months to 9 or 12 months. In San Francisco one builder reported no completions out of 137 starts; another no completion out of 400 starts. In Denver one builder had 3 completions out of 104 starts; in Chicago no completions out of 400 starts were reported by another operator. On Long Island, 100 completions were reported for 1,800 starts. A Detroit builder was able to finish only 26 dwellings out of 310 started. In Buffalo, Niagara Falls, and Syracuse, completions were zero out of 41, 74, and 32 respective starts.

"Builders have warned the Government for months that veterans can't live in paper plans," Mr. Cortright said. "Builders have taken out priorities for more than 500,000 dwelling units; they have started more than 250,000, but everywhere construction is seriously stalled because of lack of materials that were supposed to back up the priorities."

Among materials most frequently reported as lacking are flooring, wallboard, nails, plumbing pipes and fixtures, roofing, heating units, paint, insulation, stucco netting, electric conduit, windows, and millwork.

Typical replies received by the association are as follows:

Chicago, Ill.: "We have received 723 priorities since January 15. More than 400 have been started. None have yet been completed. All are badly stalled due to lack of materials. Under present conditions it takes more than 6 months to build a house."

Glendale, Calif.: "Sixteen HH priorities on contract started since January 15. None completed. All 16 stalled up to 120 days principally due to stucco netting. Have turned down jobs for over 60 days. Will be lucky to finish any job less than 10 months."

Jacksonville, Fla.: "I have received 54 priorities. Twenty-five have been started. None completed. Hundred percent stalled lacking materials. Some of the houses were started 6 months ago."

Miami, Fla.: "General situation, 3,000 priorities issued. About 800 starts, about 80 percent badly stalled due to lack of materials. Taking 6 to 9 months to complete against normal of 2 months."

Baltimore, Md.: "Two hundred eighty-seven HH priorities taken out since January 15. Eighty-three started. None completed. One hundred percent badly stalled due to lack of materials. Taking 6 to 8 months to complete."

Denver, Colo.: "Have taken out 104 priorities since January 15. All are under construction. Have completed three houses. Could have completed 30 at this date if plumbing, electrical conduit, and lath had been available. Average time to complete building under these conditions, 6 months. Under normal conditions, 3 months."

Pasadena, Calif.: "Sixty-one priorities; 61 started, 8 complete, 75 percent stalled 5 to 7 months."

Santa Ana, Calif.: "Since January 15 we have taken out priorities for 96 veteran houses under No. 66-122-00374. To date have started 96, completed 5. Ninety-one waiting various critical building materials."

Worcester, Mass.: "Fifty-two priorities taken out since January 15. Twenty-two started. None completed. Eighty percent badly stalled, lacking material. Eight months required to complete houses."

Detroit, Mich.: "There have been 488 HH priorities issued to us since January 15. Three hundred and ten of the 488 issued have been started. Of the 310 stated 26 are completed and occupied. Approximately 200 are sold to date to veterans who are waiting for completion and occupancy. Program stalled at different stages and at the present time delayed nearly 100 percent. Present rate of construction for one house between 6 months and 1 year. Situation nearly impossible. Price restrictions are Government red tape has made one h—— of a mess of the home-building business."

Flint, Mich.: "Twenty-eight priorities. Twenty-eight starts. Five completions. Twenty-three stalled 6 months."

St. Louis, Mo.: "Six thousand two hundred and fifty HH priorities taken out since January 15. It is estimated 4,000 starts since January 15 and estimate of completed homes is between 250 and 300. Ninety percent of housing is being stalled for lack of material, and it is taking from 8 to 12 months to complete."

Long Island, N. Y.: "Our members took about 3,000 HH priorities since January 15. About 1,800 started. Less than 100 delivered to date. All of remainder badly stalled lacking variety of materials. Now taking some 9 months to 1 year to complete simplest houses."

Cleveland, Ohio: "Received 50 HH priorities. All started. All stalled for want of millwork. Fifty percent stalled due to carpenter labor shortage. One year completion time seems likely."

Portland, Oreg.: "About 4,000 HH priorities taken out in Portland area since January 15. Around 1,500 actual starts made. Less than 100 completed. At least 500 stopped cold for lack of materials."

Memphis, Tenn.: "One hundred and ninety-one priorities since January 15. All units started, none completed. One hundred units badly stalled lacking lath and hardwood flooring. Six months required to complete against 6 weeks under normal conditions. All units sold to eager veterans while we have been sold down the river."

Houston, Tex.: "696 HH priorities already granted. Eighty-three units started. Seven units completed. Eighty-five percent stalled or stopped lacking material. Completion time varies."

Milwaukee, Wis.: "Fifty CC priorities received December 31, of which 24 on the way, others abandoned, 100 percent stalled. None completed. Seventeen HH priorities received. Ten started. Fear to start balance. None completed. One-hundred percent stalled. Twelve to fourteen months need for completion this area."

Cleveland, Ohio: "Seven thousand five hundred HH priorities taken out since January 15. Two thousand five hundred started, none completed. Five thousand stalled. These figures cover greater Cleveland."

Mr. Speaker, here is specific and factual evidence that the veterans' emergency housing program has failed and as a result many thousands of veterans and their families are without proper and decent homes to live in.

I supported the veterans' emergency housing bill in good faith, believing that it would bring relief to our returning veterans. The hue and cry when the bill was before the House was that it would bring immediate relief. According to all reports up to date, especially from southern California is that it has failed miserably to accomplish its objective. I want our veterans to have homes; they are deserving of better treatment. A congressional investigation is evidently needed.

Mihailovich Condemned

OF

HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Evening Star of July 16, 1946:

MIHAILOVICH CONDEMNED

If the case had been tried before an international tribunal, or if the Tito government had granted the United States request to let several Americans testify in his defense, the sentencing of Gen. Draja Mihailovich would not now seem so much like an act of political venom outraging justice. The trial was conducted by a controlled military court, and it is difficult to escape the conviction that this man has been condemned to death not because he committed treason but because he lost out in his own country against a bitter rival intent upon liquidating him.

Last March a member of Tito's government frankly declared that the captured Chetnik leader would be given a "fair" trial and then be taken out and shot. In other words, as far as the Yugoslav regime was concerned, the guilty verdict was handed down even before the case was heard, or so it appeared at the time, and the appearance was not dissipated later by the actual court proceedings, especially in view of the unbending refusal to hear the defending testimony of American flyers rescued from the Nazis by Mihailovich.

The man's background, moreover, argues eloquently against the idea of his having been a traitor or Axis collaborator, no matter what his other failings may have been. Early in 1943 Russia flatly accused him, and the Moscow-trained Marshal Tito—who suddenly emerged as head of a rival Yugoslav resistance force long after Mihailovich had taken up arms against the Nazis—elaborated on the accusation. Such charges, however, had all the earmarks of a deliberate smear campaign even after Prime Minister Churchill, in May of 1944, declared that no more Allied supplies would be sent to Mihailovich because "he has not been fighting" and because "some of his subordinates have made accommodations with the enemy." In saying this Mr. Churchill was careful to absolve the Chetnik leader of any personal blame. After all, he was a soldier of extraordinary courage and patriotism who had won Serbia's highest military honors in the First World War and who had thrilled and inspired free peoples everywhere when he took to the mountains to battle the Nazis and become one of the greatest Allied heroes of the hour—a man in whom treason seemed inconceivable.

Accordingly, considered against his personal record, the condemnation of Mihailovich has the mark of ruthless factional politics upon it. Unquestionably it satisfies the Belgrade dictatorship, but not so the free world. For a long time to come the character of the justice involved will be questioned and history's final judgment may well be against the condemners rather than the tragic man condemned.

Reuther Sparked Inflation

OF

HON. THOMAS G. ABERNETHY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Los Angeles Times:

REUTHER SPARKED INFLATION

Threats of Walter Reuther, head of the CIO United Auto Workers, to call a new strike against the motor industry if OPA legislation fails to roll back prices to the June 30 level, should remind the public that Reuther himself was one of the main influences in boosting the price level which consumers, including union men, now have to stretch their pay to meet.

While wiser union leaders were opposed to a campaign for higher pay before industry became fully converted to peacetime production, Reuther insisted on an immediate wage boost and struck General Motors. It is difficult to suppose that Reuther was stupid enough to believe his assertion that wages could be raised 30 percent without raising prices, but many of his followers did believe it, and so, apparently, did our not very intelligent Secretary of Commerce, Henry Wallace. The latter allowed himself to be fooled into putting out some faked figures which gave some support to Reuther's assertion. The strike fever spread to steel, coal, railroads, and other industries; and price control went out the window.

It is possible that wage rises up to 10 percent could have been absorbed by industry without any substantial effect on prices, provided they resulted in increased production. But the chain reaction which Reuther set off went far beyond any such moderate figure. What followed is history—the price line bulged and then broke.

Reuther perhaps has the power to disrupt industry again with another strike. If he does he will be responsible for the inescapable consequences.

How Communism Works

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to set forth that the methods used by fellow travelers and Communist sympathizers to gain control of organizations for the Communist movement are subtle and strange.

For some time it has been the desire of the Communists to gain control of the motion-picture industry as well as the legitimate theater. To accomplish this objective it became necessary to secure control of certain affiliated organizations such as Actors Equity. This well-known organization requires 2 years of membership and 50 weeks of actual stage experience before a member is given a voice in its management.

The treachery used is revealed by the manner in which a group of fellow travelers succeeded in having themselves placed on the nominating committee of the Actors Equity council and gave to the rank-and-file membership a regular ticket of officers and councilors without an opportunity to make a free choice.

In their official publication, Equity, in which the one-party ticket was presented, the action of these termites was defended in these words, and I quote:

> In point of fact we have violated no procedure. But we were not primarily concerned with the procedure, rather were we motivated by a consciousness of our responsibility to present to the membership the candidate, in our opinion, best suited for the office. We were determined to make no compromise in this regard.

This procedure is typical of the Communist method of ruling: One party, one candidate, no free choice. The above phrase was recently carried in substance in various organs of the Communist movement in respect to free elections in countries under the domination of the Red army. On this occasion the Red press denounced free elections because persons whom the Communists described as reactionaries might be elected by the people. The fact that it might be the will of the people to elect a so-called reactionary is of no concern to these destroyers of humanity, nor are they interested in making available to the rank and file an opportunity to choose their representatives.

This should be a warning to people in every walk of life in the United States who are being constantly propagandized to yield their present right to select representatives of their choice. In all nations where the Red Fascists have gained control the candidates are selected by the Politbureau just as they were selected in Actors Equity.

It is interesting to know how such a maneuver could be put over on good citizens of the United States who are members of Actors Equity.

On April 30, 1946, certain elements managed to have passed a resolution which appeared innocent enough. This resolution read as follows, and I quote:

> That the deadline for receiving independent tickets be 30 days before the annual meeting.

The date of the annual meeting was June 7, 1946. This resolution meant that the names of all candidates must be filed before May 7, 1946, or 7 days after this resolution was introduced and adopted. Now the only medium which members of Actors Equity have for learning the facts herein described is either by personal attendance, which in this profession is impossible for a large majority who must travel from one location to another, or by word of mouth, or from the official organ of the group, which is the magazine, Equity. Having full knowledge of these facts, the conspirators fully realized the part which their original resolution would play in this conspiracy. The official organ was not distributed or made available until May 16, 1946, which was 9 days after the deadline under the innocent resolution passed on April 30, 1946.

This procedure did not go unchallenged. At the next meeting of the council, Mr. Fred Irving Lewis of the Broadway hit Harvey questioned the Chair on this development. Russian-born Mr. Jaffee, one of the leading fellow travelers, asked permission to answer this criticism and blandly stated that the ticket presented had been publicized in the previous issue or on April 19, 1946. Mr. Lewis did not challenge this statement immediately but proceeded to secure a copy of the previous issue and searched for such information. It was missing. Mr. Jaffee and his fellow conspirators then decided to alibi their conduct and did so by placing the responsibility for what he desired to call an error on the shoulders of the aged editor of Equity.

A careful analysis of this charge vanishes into thin air when it is remembered that the council took no action on the selection of candidates until after April 30, 1946, or 11 days after the April issue of Equity had been published. It therefore would have been impossible for the candidates selected to have appeared in the April issue as stated by Jaffee.

Those familiar with the Red movement have come to learn that Lenin encouraged the use of the lie, whenever it would benefit the progress of the Communist cause.

The same group which sponsored this slate of officers likewise endorsed the appearance of five members of the Council at the meeting sponsored by the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee in Madison Square Garden, at which Harold Laski, a guest speaker, denounced America, the capitalistic system, the Catholic Church, and American aid in the recent conflict. The directors of the JAFRC were recently cited for contempt by this House.

Why does the Communist movement in the United States desire to control actors equity? The foremost reason perhaps would be to gain control of the $1,250,000 in the treasury of the Council, secondly to break down existing barriers and open the doors to those who pledge allegiance to the Red flag, and in this manner gain control over the organization from those actors who are interested in their profession and not in propagandizing the people of the United States into a communistic form of government. This is not without reason for Earl Browder, desposed head of the Communist Party, on July 15, 1946, over the mutual network testified that the only real privileged class in the Soviet Union were the authors and those associated with the propaganda field.

However, there are within the Council loyal Americans who believe in the United States, its freedom and self-government. They are prepared to fight to maintain our Government, the best the world has ever known.

The patriotic members have formed the Actors Equity Association Anti-Communist League. This newly created organization is composed of the leading actresses and actors of our day and come from stage and motion picture. The people of the United States are beginning to register their resentment against the use of the theater for un-American propaganda purposes. I feel confident that the courageous conduct of these truly great Americans will receive the wholehearted support of the rank and file of our citizens.

Americans have been slow in rising against communism, but these fine representatives of American manhood and womanhood have minced no words. They are anti-Communist and want the world to know it: If there be any doubt, read their platform, and I quote:

> We, the undersigned, members of Actors Equity Association, believe without reservation in the Constitution of the United States of America and as such further be it resolved; we do hereby pledge ourselves to work, to free, and to keep the ranks of Equity from infiltration which we believe will bring about overthrow of our Government and the disgrace of our profession. Further be it resolved; we deem it necessary to be known as the Actors Equity Association Anti-Communist League—

This group is prepared to challenge the totalitarian methods of the reds and fellow travelers who now control in a subtle manner the Equity organization—

Labor Extension Program for Wage and Salary Earners

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER

OF WISCONSIN

Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, in speaking briefly regarding a bill to establish a Labor Extension Service within the Department of Labor which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] and I have today introduced, under unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks and, for the convenience of Members, I include at this point the text of the bill, certain statements and resolutions, together with a list of organizations and individuals supporting the proposal:

A bill to promote the general welfare of the people of the United States by establishing a publicly supported labor extension program for wage and salary earners and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to aid in diffusing useful information among the workers in the United States, there shall be established a labor extension program so that the institutional resources and facilities of State universities, land-grant colleges and universities, and other educational institutions shall be made available to such workers, through such extension media as the Secretary of Labor finds appropriate to carry out the purposes of this act.

Section 2. The labor extension program provided for in this act shall consist of instruction and educational activities in the fields of labor problems generally, industrial relations, government, community programs, techniques of workers' education, responsibilities of citizenship, and related fields.

SEC. 3. For the purpose of providing for the development of a Labor Extension Service and for its administration within the Department of Labor, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1947, the sum of $10,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, the sum of $12,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1949, and annually thereafter, the sum of $15,000,000. In each year, not more than $1,000,000 of the appropriation shall be available for administrative expenses of the Department of Labor in administering this act.

The Secretary of Labor shall determine, in accordance with the provisions of this act, the amount to be allotted to each participating institution for each fiscal year and shall certify the amount so determined to the Secretary of the Treasury. Upon receipt of such certification, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, through the Division of Disbursement of the Treasury Department, and prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office, pay such amount to each institution in accordance with such certification.

Amounts paid to an institution under this section shall be expended solely in accordance with a plan which meets the requirements of section 5 and is approved by the Secretary of Labor in accordance with such section.

SEC. 4 (a). That the Secretary of Labor shall allot the funds made available under section 3 of this act among the participating institutions in such amounts as he determines will best carry out the purposes of this act.

(b) Not later than December 15, 1949, the Secretary of Labor shall recommend to the Congress a reasonable formula for allotment of the funds provided for in this act in the several States, for the purpose of providing an equitable distribution of the services provided for in this act among the wage and salary earners in the several States.

SEC. 5 (a). A plan for participating in the program authorized by this act must—

(1) Contain a general statement of purpose and method which will guide the institution using the funds granted under the authority of this act;

(2) Provide a list of such groups, organizations, or individuals as may have requested the services contemplated by this act;

(7) Provide documentary evidence satisfactory to the Secretary of Labor of the legal right of the institution submitting the plan to develop the activities contemplated by this act;

(8) Provide that the institution will make such reports which shall be approved by its advisory committee, in such form and containing such information as the Secretary of Labor may from time to time require, and give the Secretary of Labor, upon demand, access to the records on which such reports are based;

(9) Contain proof satisfactory to the Secretary of Labor of the intention and ability of the institution to develop and maintain a program in conformity with the purposes of this act.

(b) The Secretary of Labor shall approve any plan which complies with the provisions of subsection (a) of this section.

SEC. 6. Each institution which receives funds appropriated under this act shall be required to make to the Secretary of Labor, on or before the 1st day of October in each year, a report for the previous fiscal year ending June 30 approved by its advisory committee, containing such information as may be required by the Secretary of Labor. A copy thereof shall be sent to the Secretary of the Treasury. Any unexpended funds advanced to an institution shall be returned at the same time into the Treasury.

SEC. 7. The Secretary of Labor shall make an annual report to the Congress on or before the 1st day of December of the conduct, results, receipts, and expenditures of the labor extension work carried on in all of the institutions receiving the benefits of this act, and noting whether the appropriation to any institution has been misapplied and if so, a full statement of the case.

SEC. 8. (a) There is hereby created within the Department of Labor, and under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of Labor, a Labor Extension Division. The Labor Extension Division shall be headed by a Director to be known as a Director of the Division of Labor Extension, who shall be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate and shall receive a compensation of $10,000 a year. The Director may, subject to the civil-service laws, appoint such employees as he deems necessary to carry out his functions and duties under this act and shall fix their compensation in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. The Director may establish and utilize such regional, local, or other agencies, and utilize such voluntary and uncompensated services, as may from time to time be needed. The Directors shall have authority, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, to issue such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

(b) The Secretary shall formulate general policies for the administration of this act after consultation with the Director and the National Labor Extension Service Advisory Council, provided for in section 10 of this act.

SEC. 9. In the case of any plan which has been approved, if the Secretary of Labor, after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing to the institution which submitted the plan, finds that in the administration of the plan there is a failure to comply substantially with any provision required by this act to be included in the plan, he shall notify such institution that further payments will not be made to the institution until he is satisfied that there is no longer any such failure to comply. Until he is so satisfied, he shall make no further certification to the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to such institution.

SEC. 10. (a) There is hereby established a National Labor Extension Advisory Council (herein referred to as the Advisory Council) to advise the Secretary of Labor and the Director in formulating general policies required in administering the provisions of this act.

(b) The Advisory Council shall consist of not more than 15 members, chosen by the Secretary of Labor from suitable nominations submitted by labor organizations. Five members shall be appointed for a term of 1 year, five members for 2 years, and five members for 3 years, and thereafter each appointment shall be for a term of 3 years. The Advisory Council shall meet at the request of the Secretary of Labor, but in any case not less frequently than twice a year and whenever at least one-third of the members request a meeting. The members of the Advisory Council shall serve without pay but shall be reimbursed for actual expenditures incurred in attending meetings and performing the work of the Council in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Labor.

The Secretary of Labor shall provide such clerical assistance and other services and facilities as may be necessary for the council.

SEC. 11. (a) Each institution participating in the labor extension program shall appoint a local advisory committee of at least five but not more than 10 members, who shall serve without compensation. The members shall be chosen from suitable nominations submitted by labor organizations whose members will benefit from the participation of the institution in the program under this act.

(b) Each institution shall consult with its local advisory committee as frequently as necessary concerning the operation of the labor extension program in that institution.

(c) Each institution shall consult with its advisory committee in the preparation of the plan required by section 5 (a) of this act.

(d) Each local advisory committee shall assist the institution in all practicable ways to implement the program of labor extension service, and in maintaining contact with the groups, organizations, and individuals whom this program is intended to benefit.

SEC. 12. If any provision of this act or its application thereof to any institution, or circumstances, is held to be invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provisions to other institutions, or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 13. This act may be cited as the "Labor Extension Act of 1946."

STATEMENT BY WILLIAM GREEN, PRESIDENT, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR, IN THE AMERICAN FEDERATIONIST, JUNE 1946

The Department of Labor should have a Labor Extension Service similar to the Extension Service of the Department of Agriculture. The Morrill Act of 1862, under which the Agricultural Extension Service was set up, provided Federal aid for land-grant colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts. Labor was not represented in the executive branch of the Government at that time and did not benefit by this opportunity. Farmers, on the other hand, have been able to get research and technical advice on their daily problems, so that agricultural management has greatly improved. Every farmer has such aids readily available.

Workers need services to enable them to plan for progress and to promote their economic well-being. They need decentralized technical assistance to promote health and safety in places of work. They need to be sure of their rights as well as their responsibilities. They should have the necessary services readily available. All of the agencies properly within the Department should contribute information and experience to such a service.

STATEMENT BY PHILIP MURRAY, PRESIDENT OF THE CIO

A free labor movement is indispensable in a free world. This fact is often overlooked when labor disputes have given rise to demands for laws restricting labor's right to bargain collectively, to strike if need be, to defend its sacred political and economic rights.

To fetter labor with restrictive governmental regulation such as the Case bill is to endanger the very principle of American freedom. To establish constructive programs for the betterment of labor relations is to serve the welfare of the whole people.

A Labor Extension Service within the Department of Labor is one of many possible constructive programs which could foster good labor relations without sacrificing labor's freedom. It takes education and practical experience to participate effectively in collective bargaining. There must be a combination of skill, knowledge of facts, understanding of issues, knowledge of procedure. From the beginning the CIO has recognized this need. CIO has built an education department to supply information upon request from any CIO union. Many CIO internationals have developed their own education departments to fill the special needs of locals in the various industries. The larger the union know-how in collective bargaining the better the labor relations that will result.

It follows that a better stewardship will result in better grievance procedure through which the contract operates day by day.

Unions have grown by leaps and bounds in the last decade. Four million strong after World War I, organized workers now total 15,000,000. Each day new workers join our ranks. These numbers constitute a practical difficulty. We need more than skilled, well-trained labor leaders. We must have skilled, well-informed union members. This means that we need new teachers, new techniques for teaching, new materials, pamphlet libraries, and educational films. Demands for education services are now so numerous and so urgent and have grown to such vast proportions that only a government service can meet them. That service is a responsibility of the United States Department of Labor which can neither be ignored nor met half-heartedly.

A labor extension service should be backed by all the resources of the Labor Department. In addition, the Labor Department should channel to the labor extension service the many necessary facilities of other governmental departments. In other words, all the resources of government should be integrated by the Labor Department to serve the people it was established to serve.

The country's farmers have had the benefit of extension services for many years. They can apply to the Department of Agriculture for technical help on their problems. They can ask for information, for research, for expert advice, and get them. As a matter of cold statistics the Nation's industrial workers outnumber the farmers, and no one seriously denies that the Nation's industrial health and well-being depend upon industrial workers. It is high time for the Labor Department to supply an extension service to the many workers upon whom so much of the country's future prosperity depends.

PROPOSAL RECOMMENDED BY THE COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS AND ADOPTED BY THE LABOR LEGISLATIVE CONFERENCE, DECEMBER 1945

Resolution V

Request for labor education extension program

Whereas it is now becoming generally recognized that the public has as great a stake in the development of an informed union membership and competent union leaders as in the development of competent businessmen and farmers; and

Whereas a number of States have already taken steps to establish union leadership and industrial training courses through State universities, extension services, and other publicly supported institutions; and

Whereas there is need for a central clearing house in the Federal Government to assist both financially and technically in the development of such programs at the State and community level; and

Whereas there is need for guidance to such institutions in order that their programs may deal realistically with labor problems; and

Whereas there is no such service offered to the millions of wage earners comparable to the service offered by the United States Department of Agriculture to farmers through its Agricultural Extension Service or the service to industry provided by Federal vocational training programs: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That the Industrial Relations Committee:

1. Endorses the principle of a Labor Extension Service to be set up in the United States Department of Labor to act as an authoritative clearing house in the field of labor education and to administer a program of grants-in-aid for the development of a labor education program on a State and local level; and

2. Urges the United States Department of Labor to proceed forthwith with the development and formulation of this program in consultation with the proposed Labor Education Advisory Committee of the Division of Labor Standards and union officers at the State and local levels; and

3. Urges all individual delegates to initiate discussions with the appropriate State and local officials of labor, education, and other public organizations to the end that this program may reflect the best thinking of all interested groups; and

4. Requests that copies of this resolution be sent to the chairmen of the Senate and House Labor Committees and to the heads of all State labor organizations.

Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that this bill, which already has wide nonpartisan public support, may receive equally wide nonpartisan support in this House and in the Senate. Thereby it will receive attention and study in the next few months. It is my hope that, when the new Congress convenes next January, such a bill may be reintroduced and receive prompt attention, hearings, and early enactment.

This bill proposes to implement one of our proudest national ideals and policies, the diffusion of useful knowledge among the people in response to State and local needs and desires, and in ways determined by the people of the States and local communities.

The relatively high general level of education and informed intelligence among our people has been a principal source of national strength, welfare, and prosperity. It has contributed to our survival. It insured the production necessary to military victory in the war that ended a year ago.

Our concern and practical provision for the diffusion of knowledge has been the shield of the Republic, protecting freedom and democracy against the stealthy encroachment of special privilege and economic power on the one hand and, on the other hand, that mob rule which lends itself so easily to the manipulations of cynical and unprincipled demagogs. Our defense against those dangers would have been even more effective if our provisions for the diffusion of knowledge had been more thorough and more practical.

This bill proposes no new policy but rather the practical implementation of the noble principle set forth in the Morrill Act of 1862, namely, to promote the diffusion among the people of useful knowledge for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, and for the benefit of the human beings engaged in those occupations. It proposes to extend to wage and salary earners services equivalent to those long given to farmers and their families by the Agricultural Extension Service.

The bill proposes to establish a Labor Extension Service within the Department of Labor, as the Agricultural Extension Service is established within the Department of Agriculture. Grants in aid, not to exceed $14,000,000, would be extended on a 75 to 25 matching basis to those State universities, land-grant colleges and universities, and other educational institutions desiring to extend their resources and facilities to wage and salary earners. This proposal must stand on its own merits, but I remark in passing that the amount suggested is substantially less than the Federal funds supplied for disbursement to the States by the Agricultural Extension Service.

Section 2 of the bill defines the nature and scope of the Labor Extension program as consisting of "instruction and educational activities in the fields of labor problems generally, industrial relations, government, community programs, techniques of workers' education, responsibilities of citizenship, and related fields."

Mr. Speaker, labor is asking for this bill and is supported in its request by organizations of teachers, civic, welfare, and church groups who are concerned, as are responsible leaders of labor, with the working out of intelligent, fair, and peaceful solutions of industrial relations.

The management-labor conference called by the President last November could not reach agreement on some basic issues, but it did recommend in its report that there be greater educational activities among workers to stimulate a more constructive approach to collective bargaining and for the improvement of collective bargaining as a whole.

It recognized that the use of facts and reason is a desirable substitute for costly tests of economic strength in strikes and lock-outs.

An explicit recommendation for the establishment of such a labor extension service within the Department of Labor was made in resolution V adopted last December by the legislative conference of State-Labor Department officials and representatives of organized labor. I have already inserted in the RECORD the text of that resolution.

Support for the proposal has been expressed by more than 50 colleges and universities now offering extension services of various kinds to wage earners and by many institutions just starting such programs or already prepared to undertake such programs if supplied with the know-how and material assistance.

Mr. Speaker, here is labor asking for light that it may find its way. Here on the floor of this House in the past months we have heard much discussion of industrial relations. We have heard heated denunciation of labor and warm words in its defense. The status and temper of industrial relations within the United States in the past year have been of intense concern to every citizen.

The status of wage earners and of organized labor has changed in the past 10 years. It will continue to change. We have witnessed the growing pains as wage earners have progressed toward economic enfranchisement, toward some measure of economic security against unemployment and old age. In the minds of wage earners themselves, the nature and scope of their rights and responsibilities are not always clearly defined and understood.

Here is labor asking for help in promoting such understanding. I take it that labor is prepared to accept the responsibilities that accompany the new status it now enjoys.

I believe that most employers, recognizing that labor organization is here to stay, would prefer to deal with employees and employee representatives who are equipped by knowledge and training to negotiate on the basis of facts and reason rather than by hasty recourse to a test of economic strength. I believe that such negotiation, freely practiced and without abolition of the right of freemen to withhold their labor or employment, is in the public interest, and the national interest, and is conducive to the welfare of individual citizens.

American labor and persons and organizations with experience in workers' education are themselves the first to state, as a fact needing neither explanation nor apology, that industrial workers and others in the lower-income groups of our population have for the most part been limited by force of circumstances to education confined to the primary grades. Few have completed high school, and still fewer have been able to begin a university education. At a later date, I shall submit data on this point, showing the correlation between family income and school-leaving age.

Because of this hard fact, labor's part in the field of labor relations often reflects not only limited experience, but also a limited knowledge of relevant facts and limited facility in dealing with them. When responsible labor leaders have tried—sometimes in vain—to prevent or terminate wildcat strikes, some wage earners have displayed too little knowledge of the resources and methods available to them in their relations to management and to the community and too little understanding of the broader implications of their actions.

Mr. Speaker, there is a hunger and a demand for more knowledge and understanding among wage earners themselves. This demand is supported by intelligent management, by educators, and by church and other groups who are concerned with working out peaceful and equitable solutions of the many problems that now complicate industrial relations and the achievement of steady full production. A labor extension service within the Department of Labor will make available to labor expanded resources and trained personnel to aid in the diffusion of knowledge and understanding of these resources and experience in their use. Such understanding and experience are prerequisite to the development of sound industrial relations.

The resources of the Agricultural Extension Service, aggregating more than $44,000,000 of Federal, State, and local funds, are available to some 6,000,000 farm operators and their families. Businessmen have recourse to the facilities provided by the Department of Commerce. It is not only natural but essential that wage and salary earners, numbering about 45,000,000, have available through a labor-extension service the resources that will enable them to become more constructive in their approach to industrial relations and to understand more thoroughly their rights and responsibilities as citizens of the United States. Measured by the importance of the need and by comparison, the sum of $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 annually in Federal aid is a modest and justified figure.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that we are in a race between education and catastrophe. Here is labor, a mighty segment of our population, appealing to the Congress for aid in promoting the extension of education among the wage earners of the Nation. I believe that careful consideration will show the urgent need for such a bill as I have proposed.

The sooner such a service is established, the sooner will we have strengthened the foundation for equitable, reasonable, and peaceful industrial relations. Labor cannot bring this about without the cooperation of management. But it is obvious that the increasing use of facts and reason by labor will tend to elicit more factual, reasonable responses by management. That way lies peace and prosperity for labor, employers, farmers, and professional people. This bill for a labor-extension service is therefore in the public interest. I urge its careful consideration and early enactment with such perfecting amendments as further study and hearings may show to be necessary to the achievement of its purpose.

How American Relief Funds Are Used in Foreign Countries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, from time to time reports have come to the House of Representatives dealing with the waste and misuse of funds which have been appropriated for the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. This, as everyone knows, was the set-up which was going to do so much for the suffering people in war-torn countries. Money was to be used to alleviate hunger, sickness, and poverty which have followed in the wake of World War II.

The charge has been made repeatedly that the UNRRA set up was playing politics with relief funds which have been appropriated by this Congress. There is no doubt about the correctness of those charges. If I need any confirmation it is set forth in a newspaper item by Seymour Korman which appears in the Times-Herald of Washington, D. C., under date of July 23, 1946, and reads as follows:

SERB CHILDREN TOLD UNRRA IS "SPOT IN RUSSIA"

(By Seymour Korman)

ROME, July 22.—UNRRA is the name of a region deep in Russia beyond the Urals, a region laced by streams and milk and honey and producing enough food and other commodities to take care of all good Communists, big and little, in Yugoslavia.

This fairy tale is taught as truth and part of the Red credo to youngsters in one Belgrade school and is indicative of the efforts made by Marshal Tito's Soviet-backed government to keep the Yugoslav people in ignorance of the fact that the bulk of UNRRA supplies comes from America and Britain.

American UNRRA officials in Yugoslavia also have run into difficulties in trying to inform the people that the supplies come in free and that if they are being sold—as they are, and sometimes at high prices—it is because that is the policy of the Yugoslav Government.

The head of the UNRRA in Yugoslavia is the Russian, Col. Mihail Sergeichik. Last month he ousted Leo Hochstetter, of Washington, American director of the mission's office of public information. Hochstetter charged censorship and distortion of the news by Sergeichik and that he, Hochstetter, had been unable to get remedial action on complaints of American and British regional officers; that the Yugoslav public was not sufficiently informed of the real source and variety of UNRRA items, and of the existence and function of a rehabilitation fund.

This newspaper item, Mr. Speaker, is rather conclusive argument against appropriating any more funds for UNRRA. Not only has UNRRA been accused of wasting funds but, as this newspaper article indicates, UNRRA used funds for political purposes and the matter of relief for destitute people is either secondary or else of no particular consideration.

I think that my former attitude in demanding that Congress appropriate its own relief funds and then have them disbursed by the American Red Cross, the Salvation Army, or national church organizations is still proper and correct.

National Service Life Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, national service life insurance is more desirable as the result of the amendments recently enacted. Now, more than ever before, World War II veterans should heed the advice of experienced commercial insurance men and World War I veterans to hold on to their war insurance and to reinstate it if it has lapsed. Changes, many of which are technical, were recently made by Congress. It was our purpose to give veterans, as nearly as possible and practicable, insurance comparable to that available in commercial policies.

For instance, the beneficiary group has been expanded to include any person, firm or corporation.

Nearly everyone knows one or more men who were classified for limited service who were later assigned to duty in or close to combat areas, even though insurance was denied due to the physical condition. One amendment gives coverage to those limited service men who were totally disabled or killed in action, by declaring their application to have been accepted. Another injustice has been remedied.

Now, upon converting their war policies, veterans can get their choice of ordinary life, 20-pay life or 30-pay life policies, 20-year endowment or age 60 or 65 endowments.

Lump-sum payments can now be authorized by the veteran; thus a big objection to Government policies is overcome.

Discrimination against a small group of beneficiaries who began receiving payments prior to September 30, 1944, has been removed by permitting those beneficiaries to make an election which will assure payments equal to the full face value of the policy.

A few men applied for insurance to be effective at a future date, but met their death before that date. Coverage is given these men by declaring the insurance to have become effective from the date of application.

Re-instatement of policies is liberalized, premiums may be waived when veterans are totally disabled and have been for 6 months. By the payment of extra premiums, upon proof of good health, veterans having National Service Life Insurance may now get coverage for total disability; if not in good health but partially disabled because of service-connected disability, such application must be made before January 1, 1950.

Reinstatement of lapsed term policies may be made upon payment of two monthly premiums and satisfactory evidence of good health. Application must be made within 6 months after lapse or August 1, 1946, whichever is later. In making application for reinstatement and disability provisions, good health is not to be denied because of service-connected disabilities, if such are not already total.

Often, servicemen and veterans overlook changing beneficiaries, for instance, after marriage or the birth of a child. Named beneficiaries, prior to receiving payments under the policy, may assign all or any part of the insurance to others.

Payments resulting from extra hazardous risks will come from the Treasury, not from insurance funds, so the extra load is not put on policyholders. Dividends will undoubtedly be, in the future as in the past, better than commercial policies.

Hold on to your policies. Convert as much as you can when you can. National service life insurance is a good investment—it is good protection for your loved ones.

Talk your insurance problems over with your commercial agent. A letter to the Veterans' Administration or to the nearest VA contact officer will bring you full information about your insurance. If you feel we can help, do not hesitate to ask us. Address: Congressman ERRETT P. SCRIVNER, 316 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Time To Investigate Foreign Policy—H. R. 433

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the foreign policy of our country is not a partisan matter. For many months a feeling has persisted that we are floundering in this highly important matter and something should be done about it without further delay. To that end, Mr. Speaker, my distinguished colleague, Hon. CHESTER E. MERROW, has introduced H. R. 433, which aims to authorize a congressional investigation of our foreign policy.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MERROW] is well qualified to spearhead this investigation. He has had an opportunity to travel extensively, to study, and analyze the problems confronting this Nation relating to foreign policy.

Just a few days ago, Mr. Speaker, my colleague addressed this House on that subject. All Members who heard him agreed that his analysis of the situation was to the point and it was on a high statesmanship basis; it was very constructive and evidenced a thorough understanding of the subject.

Likewise, Mr. Speaker, this address by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MERROW] resulted in a splendid editorial by the Washington Post on July 22, 1946. It should be preserved as a valuable contribution to the subject matter under consideration and I include it as a part of my remarks:

FOREIGN POLICY STUDY

A speedy job of reporting by committees in both the Senate and House and the prompt action of the House itself on Saturday makes it probable that the bill to expand and improve conditions in the Foreign Service will become law at this session. That is highly encouraging to those who recognize the vital importance of a competent Foreign Service. Since pressure for adjournment is strong, extra effort is warranted on the part of Members to reconcile minor differences between H. R. 6967 and S. 2451 quickly and to insure that the measure is not lost in the last-minute shuffle.

As an appropriate supplement to the Foreign Service Act, Congress would do well to authorize a congressional investigation of our foreign policy, as proposed by Representative CHESTER E. MERROW. Mr. MERROW asks the appointment of 23 Congressmen for this purpose. We should prefer a joint House-Senate committee chosen, in line with the La Follette-Monroney congressional reorganization plan, from the two foreign affairs committees. That group would make recommendations as to a consistent, realistic foreign policy, as well as on operating improvements in the State Department and the Foreign Service and on methods for obtaining and disseminating more accurate information on world conditions to Congress and the public. The need for such a study was emphasized by Mr. MERROW recently in a statesmanlike speech citing specific weaknesses in the work of the State Department. Mr. MERROW has had considerable opportunity abroad to witness the results of our foreign policy. His observations, which do not constitute criticism so much as a constructive attempt to better conditions, apply, we believe, with considerable validity. Briefly, they are:

(1) The position of the United States in world affairs demands closer cooperation between the State Department and other Government agencies. (2) Liaison and working relations between the State Department and Congress are poor. (3) Internal procedures in the State Department, including the clearance of policy papers and the handling of communications, are slow and cumbersome. (4) The Department has traditionally operated on a day-to-day basis with little time devoted to long-range planning. (5) A more dynamic information program is needed both at home and abroad. (6) Salaries in the State Department and the Foreign Service are far too low to attract the top-flight personnel needed for the job. (7) Progressive thinking has often been discouraged by the State Department. (8) The Foreign Service is not organized and administered so that its activities may be coordinated effectively with the rest of the Department. (9) Our representatives abroad do not have sufficient contact with the common people. (10) Most of our representatives abroad do not keep in close enough touch with the American scene. (11) Provisions for the recruitment and appointment of Foreign Service officers at the higher levels are inadequate. (12) Foreign Service officers have tended to represent the State Department rather than the United States Government as a whole.

Several of the deficiencies Mr. MERROW has noted will be corrected by prompt passage of the Foreign Service bill. But the need for a broad, over-all appraisal is still starkly apparent. Conducted on a nonpartisan basis, the study Mr. MERROW proposes would give Congress a feeling of participation it now lacks and would be of immense value in re[illegible]ating the basic tenets of our foreign policy and in remedying specific inadequacies.

Relations Between Labor and Management—Address by His Excellency Archbishop Cushing, of Boston

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, no one can overemphasize the importance to America of the greatest possible cooperation between labor and management.

In both world wars we have accomplished miracles in terms of production because of the cooperation of every patriotic American in both labor and management.

Cooperation is the conclusive answer to those who would substitute alien principles for those which have made this country great. Cooperation carries with it the assurance of the maximum of good things in life for all.

Any proposal such as Nation-wide profit sharing, making for maximum cooperation and team play, should have the earnest consideration of all thinking Americans.

In this connection, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including at this point in the RECORD a copy of a notable address recently made before the International Brotherhood of Bookbinders in Boston by His Excellency the archbishop of Boston, the Most Reverend Richard J. Cushing, D. D., LL. D.:

Mr. Chairman, my dearly beloved friends, I propose this afternoon to try to give an interpretation of what I think is the popular reaction of the average man toward strikes and also toward the problem of capital and labor relations. In other words, I am going to try to speak for the layman as well as the churchman and to interpret what I think is the average appreciation of those interested in labor in this great problem that I stated, insofar as strikes are concerned.

The postwar reconversion period of the past year will be remembered among other things for its strikes. In one strike-bound city, for example, there were 42,000 factory workers. Forty thousand of them went on strike late in November 1945. In that long and bitter contest, the workers lost more than $25,000,000 in wages.

Throughout the duration of the war, these workers subscribed heavily to war bonds. Admitting a generous allowance for the liquidation that followed VJ-day, the workers had an average of several hundred dollars each in wartime savings.

These investments had been intended to enrich the family lives of the workers, to extend the education of their sons and daughters, to purchase homes, refrigerators, radios, automobiles, clothing, and other things promised in the postwar world. But alas, most of them were sold to stave off hunger and forestall eviction during the long and bitter months of the strike.

Multiply the facts in that city by at least 40 or 50, to include other strikers, and the staggering value of the production that was irreparably lost in the reconversion wage crisis, measure all the anxiety, bewilderment, and suffering of the families of the unemployed and you have a picture of a major crisis, occasioned by strikes, on the threshold of the reconversion period.

There is a strong temptation to say that there ought to be a law against all this. But that would never do. Every curtailment of freedom is a step nearer to slavery. The truth is that the cost of political freedom in an industrialized society like ours comes high. We can have a regimented order, if we desire it. The Fascist states had it, and the Soviet Union now has it. But we cannot have regimented order and individual freedom. One eliminates the other.

Is there no answer, short of totalitarianism, to the problem of strikes or labor-management difficulties from which strikes ensue? Has our system of government failed in the reconversion period to meet its first major crisis, the stoppage of production resulting from labor difficulties? These questions have occurred to many. As a rule they are born of despair. The truth is, we have all the necessary machinery within our reach to solve our industrial problems. In the recent crisis between capital and labor, it was America that failed, it was the individuals involved who failed. The American way to industrial harmony is through charity and justice. But, these virtues, as was evident during the past year, have a way of flying out the window when the personnel manager and the union negotiators sit down to discuss the profit position of the company or when an unhappy employer and an equally unhappy worker tangle over the worker's ability to produce. When that condition prevails we have the beginning of labor disputes. New laws cannot remedy the situation. No law can take the greed from the hearts of employers who refuse to bargain with their employees in the face of steadily rising prices. No statute can dim the inordinate ambition of labor leaders who would exploit a national wage problem for their own glory.

It would be a sad and erroneous commentary, however, to say that we have no answer within our democratic framework for industrial disputes. The complete abolition of these disputes between free employers and free workers is not possible, any more than it is possible that every able-bodied member of the working force be employed every day of every year. But there certainly are ways to minimize the impact of industrial disputes. Chief among these are justice and charity, from which arbitration, the American way of settling all troubles, is born.

The laborer, for example, must come to realize that he owes his employer and society an honest day's work in return for a fair wage, and that conditions under which he works cannot be substantially improved until he roots out the desire to get a maximum of return for a minimum of service.

And the capitalist must also get a new viewpoint. He must learn the long-forgotten truth that wealth is stewardship, to be used, not abused, that profit-making is not the basic justification of business enterprise, and that there are such things as fair profits, fair interest, and fair prices. The employer has a right to get a reasonable living out of his business, but he has no right to a return from his investment until his employees have obtained at least living wages. This is the human and Christian view of the ethics of business. It is the virtue of justice applied to the relations between capital and labor.

The laborer also has a natural right to unite with his fellow employees so that they may bargain, not as individuals, but as a unit; and no man, be he the ruler of a nation or the economic dictator of a community, has any right to discourage, hinder, or prevent such collective bargaining. The workingman has not only a right, but a duty to demand that the conditions, hours, and other circumstances under which he is obliged to work be such that he can live on the job and at home, as a reasonable human being. It is difficult for any man to live a normal life or to save his soul on an empty stomach, or unless the conditions of his existence are such that he may live with adequate comfort and respectability. Let us remember that in this matter as in all others we are dealing with persons, individuals made to the image of God.

But if the workman has his inalienable rights, he also has duties. His attitude toward his employer should be one of good will and cooperation, without malice, hatred, or unreasonable conflict. He should sincerely offer an honest day's work for an honest day's pay. When it is necessary to negotiate for new terms, he must limit his demands by the principles of justice, and honestly endeavor to adjust wages and hours in a way that will not destroy the enterprise of those who are giving him work. He must shun the suggestions of false leaders, prophets, and criminal racketeers and conscientiously pledge his time and talent to the building of a strong morally sound union organization that is honest from top to bottom. He must respect the property of his employer and use the tools of the owner with as much care as though they were his own.

The employer, as well as the workman, has rights that cannot be denied him. He, too, has a right to a living wage. He has a right to run his business without wildcat threats on the part of constantly changing labor agitators. We cannot blame an employer for refusing to bargain with a labor leader whom he knows from experience would not scruple to ruin his whole business venture. His plant and his property belong to him; his business belongs to him; he has no obligation to carry on his pay roll incompetent, uninterested, and shiftless employees. In industrial relations neither the employer nor the labor leader has a right to be a dictator. Those relations must be carried on in a spirit of sincerity and honest cooperation, or continued conflict and hardship will be the result. All this is so elementary, so simple, that it is self-evident, but, somehow or other, it all goes out the window in the average conference between representatives of labor and capital.

Since labor and industry are so interdependent in fact, it should be possible for them to work together, if not in a love feast, at least in rational cooperation. They need each other. The country needs both. Right here enters the virtue of charity. Employers do not want to pay all that workers ask; workers do not want to accept what the employers are ready to give. That is all very human. The best way out, therefore, is for employers to agree to pay more and the workers to agree to accept less. That is a compromise dictated by common sense, by the common good, by love for one another, or charity. Since the common good is involved, it must be frankly acknowledged that government also has rights and duties in the battle between employers and employees. Labor disputes cannot be settled by force, but the public certainly has the right to demand that it cease to be victimized by industrial disputes. On the other hand an apathetic, poorly informed, indifferent public will either continue to pay the price of its indifference, or it will be continually crying for Nazi-Moscow-like suppression of strikes by the Government, or by compulsory arbitration. Neither of these is compatible with democracy. Voluntary arbitration, born of justice and charity is the American way.

What happened in the past year with its numerous and costly strikes is water over the dam. The problem now to be faced is—What can we do about the next economic convulsion? Without peace between capital and labor we will be confronted with certain economical chaos.

Assuming first of all that in the weeks and months ahead we escape uncontrolled inflation, that we produce to our maximum capacity, and that we have peace among the nations, our next national economic problem will doubtless appear when the postwar orgy of civilian production begins to ease off, and we again see the danger signals of wage deflation and mass unemployment. Meanwhile new trouble between employers and employees will appear. I would hazard the opinion that in the fall of the year we will have another period of labor unrest. That unrest, I fear, will not be the natural result of discontent in labor circles or the result of the failure of arbitration. It will be inspired by subversive elements. There are those who want our domestic problems to increase and to multiply in order that our voice may be weakened in the councils of the world. And they consider the labor-capital field as the most fertile for dissension.

All these problems require intelligent and progressive political action, as well as an honest determination among labor leaders and employers to get along one with the other. They require, too, long-range preventive medicine of higher minimum-wage standards, full-employment legislation, or whatever you want to call the national responsibility to support employment when private investment lags. They also require the elimination of communistic control within unions.

Good intentions alone will not suffice. We must now practice the art of healing. War offices in every capital of the world make plans for every conceivable political crisis, and hold troop maneuvers to enact what the red army will do to the blue army under the hypothetical conditions of their extensive plans.

So, too, we should be drafting plans for the next economic catastrophe. It is for the experts to agree on the technical phases of these plans. But the rest of us would like to see more and more leaders of labor and capital striving for more and more cordial relations and better mutual understanding of each others problems. And we would like to see every subversive power banished from every labor union. That, gentlemen, is the task of the union man. There are very few leaders on either side who have succeeded in erasing the familiar, time-worn frictions which have long been and still are the plague of American industries. A working partnership based upon cooperative and mutual understanding is the natural foundation for better relations between unionism and industry. Big business spends millions of dollars in advertising of all kinds, it engages lobbyists and retains attorneys; it would be well if it spent more in time, talent, and money in building up better relations with its organized employees. Unions spend large sums in salaries, in strikes, in politics—they would do well in putting top-flight representatives in key positions to better their relationship with employers. Where good will, good relations, good leaders are found resort is seldom, if ever, made to the use of a strike in the settlement of labor disputes. Where these conditions exist, the American method, the sensible method, the civilized method of arbitration is always employed.

But what can you, the individual employee, do? You can and you must take a more personal and active interest in your union.

The presence in some unions of irresponsibility and racketeering, whether financial or ideological, can only be explained by the failure of democracy within organized labor. In other words, there are too many dues-paying members who take no active interest in the affairs of their union, have little loyalty to it, and never think of going near a meeting. They think it is hopeless. It is this apathy which permits a few individuals or a small, ambitious minority to secure control of a union and manipulate it to their own selfish advantage. In this way, vicious abuses have crept into the unions—those abuses which have become a cause of shame to workers and of delight to their enemies.

Organized labor does, of course, have its enemies, and some observers profess to be worried over what these enemies will do to the unions. I do not believe that antiunion forces are the most serious threat to the continued growth and influence of organized labor. The most serious threat is rather the weakness within the unions themselves—the absence of an interested, alert, loyal, militant rank and file. If the average dues-paying unionist exercised his domestic rights and assumed his full responsibilities, if he helped to clean house where house cleaning is needed, organized labor could go forward confident in its own strength and prepared to counter the worst attacks of its enemies.

This is not a criticism of present labor leadership. In general, organized labor is today ably led, and the ideological and financial racketeers among labor leaders, about whom so much has been written, are only a very small minority. Nevertheless, though few in numbers they have caused and are causing and will cause a great deal of harm and ought to be expelled by an outraged rank and file from the high positions of trust which they have betrayed. If the average members were more conscious of their responsibilities toward their unions, these men would be driven out in a hurry.

In the many unions which enjoy an honest and vigorous leadership, an alert rank and file will exercise its democratic rights and duties by supporting the officers and leaders against the unwarranted attacks of an ambitious and jealous minority. We must always remember that in every human endeavor those who lead are generally subject to a great deal of criticism, much of it unjust and dishonest. An intelligent and active membership will not be taken in by purely destructive criticism, compounded in equal parts of envy and ambition, and lacking justice and charity. When the leaders are doing a good job, the rank and file owes them loyal and unwavering support.

Gentlemen, you carry a union card. Respect it. Cherish it. Let it be a pledge of your constant solicitude for the welfare of your brother workers. Let it be a perpetual reminder of your obligation to work shoulder to shoulder with your fellows to build a union which will embody the highest ideals of Americanism, of fraternal cooperation, and which will win the respect of employers and public alike. That is the type of union the Nation needs today, as our people dream of building tomorrow a better world, under God, on the ruins and sufferings of this war.

I congratulate you all on the spirit that animates your union, and I would that it animated every organized effort of labor to demand, yea, and even to fight for its rights.

God bless you all.

Red Fascism in America

OF

HON. WALTER C. PLOESER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, America is enjoying the first fruits of peace. This peace has been hard won at the expense of hundreds of thousands of American youths and an economic burden which must be carried by the American people into the next two generations. Yet, what we presume to be peace is not yet a real peace.

We have conquered Hitler's hordes and Tojo's military savages, only to find ourselves engaged against an ideology completely hostile to American traditions and to American free life. Russia, the Soviet, communistic capital of the world, owes in a great measure her very existence to American might and American resources. Yet, in the work for international peace, she stands as a constant obstruction to progress.

This year's congressional elections must have as their basic issue the question of communism in America. So many of our citizens are deluded by the thought that communism versus free American enterprise—the American tradition—constitutes simply an economic argument. It does present an economic argument between two great forces—freedom against absolute statism by a ruling class such as is today the condition of Russia, and such as was but yesterday the condition of Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy. But communism presents also a great moral issue. The very nature of its operation and its literal principles are antigod, antichurch, antireligion, and anti all of the things which are the Christian moral fiber in the life of a great people.

We have in America numerous groups which advocate the Communist idealogy. Some are wholly Communist, some are Communist controlled or influenced, and act either knowingly or innocently as "fronts" for the movement.

TRIPLE THREAT

The CIO-PAC comes in the group of American movements designed to carry on this campaign against our free institutions. The CIO-PAC is divided into three groups: First, the CIO Political Action Committee; second, the National Citizens Political Action Committee; and third, the Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions. Even the CIO-PAC has its front organizations in order to hide behind some semblance of respectability. One such organization is the Liberal Voters League of St. Louis. There is nothing liberal about them, but their name is high sounding.

A very able friend of mine, a true and well-known liberal, recently stated in a radio address:

PAC is too radical for America because it is attempting to fasten an autocratic state on the American people by forcing some and misleading others into supporting economic policies which will produce that result.

Our people do not see any marching black shirts or brown shirts. Nobody is being beaten up—not yet. No newspapers wrecked. No books burned, churches closed, or ministers imprisoned. No Hitler or Mussolini, posturing in the market place or screaming over the radio. What happened in Europe seems so violent and brutal that the average American simply cannot imagine such things happening here. But autocratic government did not come to Italy or Germany arrayed in these barbarities. In Mussolini the people beheld a man denouncing evils, dishonesty in government, and promising wonderful things for the common man. In Germany Hitler appeared in the role of a resolute messiah who promised full employment to jobless Germans. He did not promise them dictatorship and war. He promised them freedom, peace, jobs, abundance.

The approach of tyranny was not odious to the Italian and German peoples because it was presented as a scheme for giving them employment and abundance. The Italian people did not understand the savage organism that was breeding in Italy, which would spread to Germany and to many other countries, and which now, like a terrible contagion, has found its way into this country under the banners of PAC.

Germany and Italy were once democracies. In each nation business was in general conducted by businessmen. Government had the power to regulate business, but it could not tell businessmen what to produce in what amounts, who should produce, what wages to pay, and what prices to charge. Because government did not have the power to control business, political freedom was possible. Whenever government can control business it controls the jobs of voters. It can intimidate or coerce voters, and political freedom stops.

BOUGHT AND KEPT

When business in Germany and Italy broke down in prolonged depression, the opportunity for dictatorship was created. Had statesmanship in both nations put private business on its feet, dictatorship would have been impossible. But political leaders arose to offer jobs and plenty through government spending. Subsidies to voters became the invincible method by which Hitler and Mussolini obtained power to make government the master of business and to establish autocracy.

Let us now turn to PAC. It is spending huge sums to educate the American people politically. These funds come out of the pockets of millions of helpless workers. In the thirties, the National Congress provided a series of laws making it possible for a few labor leaders to establish a despotic control over the jobs of millions of workers. It is this despotism which today makes it possible for a small group of labor leaders to order these workers to put up the hard cash for the political purposes which their autocratic leaders have in mind.

The American people are to be taught that abundant prosperity is simply a matter of having the Government spend countless billions on all sorts of projects advocated by PAC. Shades of Hitler and Mussolini!

Congressmen who disagree are to be purged and PAC stooges put in their seats. Once in control of the purse strings of the Nation, these stooges will open quickly the floodgates of public spending.

Red Fascists seek to destroy our economy and to destroy our systems of religion. Their stooges in the Congress and in the executive branch of the Federal Government are their most effective tools to power. Americans must awake and realize that this is a year of decision.

Address of Hon. Claude E. Pepper

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERMAN P. KOPPLEMANN
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, under leave given me, I wish to insert in the Appendix an address given by the Honorable CLAUDE E. PEPPER at the graduation dinner of the School of Political Action Techniques, held in Washington on June 29.

The Senator's speech contains considerable political wisdom which I think behooves the serious consideration of everyone. It follows:

Fellow politicians, I greet you as fellow politicians, only with reservations as against myself because, after all, I never had the benefit of a formal political schooling and I cannot boast of a diploma from such a distinguished school of politics.

I understand that your course of study has been an unusually brief one, even by present-day standards when most university curricula have been bobtailed. But in view of the attainments and earnestness of your student body and the wisdom and excellence of your faculty I feel confident that the standard of scholarship of your graduating class will not suffer by comparison with that which now prevails in the profession.

I have been greatly impressed by the range and diversity of background and interests represented by the student body, but I am somewhat at a loss to explain the enrollment of a representative of the NAM. From what I have been able to observe on the Hill during the past 10 years they would seem to be past masters of the techniques of political action, and of the art of winning congressional friends and influencing congressional committees. I would be the last to suggest, however, that the NAM has nothing to learn from the objectives and programs of the Political Action Committee. At the same time, I can well understand the presence of representatives of the Washington Federation of Churches. From what I have observed in the Capital the Lord's messengers will need the aid of all the man-made political techniques in order to get the Lord's message accepted on the Hill.

Diploma in hand, you enter upon your new vocation undismayed, I trust, by the knoweldge that, next to mothers-in-law, politicians are the most frequent target of American humorists, real and fancied. I am sure that you understand that you can no more escape politics than you can escape death or taxes. The only alternative open to us is whether we shall be active participants in the shaping of those events. If you are not interested in music or baseball or the opposite sex, it's your decision to make and you can avoid them—more or less. But you cannot avoid politics and you cannot escape politicians by ignoring them or by being ignorant of their art and science.

It is through politics and politicians that we decide whether we have disastrous inflation or price stability and industrial peace. It is through politics that we will make the decisions that will bring full employment and production or a return to soup kitchens and street-corner apple stands. It is through politics that we will make the decisions that will bring peace and security to ourselves and our children, or a hunted cave-dweller's existence in an atomic war which may destroy human civilization. Politics in my opinion, is really something more than the business of "who gets what, when, and how." Even that cynical, iconoclastic observer of the human comedy, George Bernard Shaw, has acknowledged, "Only through politics can civilization be saved."

I am sure that in your emphasis on the practices, techniques, procedures, and mechanisms of political action—important as they are—you will have not overlooked the basic truth that what wins election campaigns are programs, policies, and records of achievement. You may ring all the door bells, kiss all the babies, shake all the hands; you may have Frank Sinatra croon for you and Greer Garson emote for you; your campaign publicity may be prepared in the slickest advertising office and Norman Corwin may write your radio scripts—but if the record you have made has offended the American people, frustrated their hopes or defied their will, you will most of the time go down to inevitable defeat. You cannot long make the worse cause seem the better. Nor can you overnight make a liberal out of a die-hard reactionary any more than you can make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. Wasn't it one of the most successful practical politicians in American history who said:

"You can fool all of the people some of the time, and some of the people all of the time, but you cannot fool all of the people all of the time."

And more recently another politician who captured the Republican Presidential nomination in 1940 after a whirlwind campaign—hardly longer than your own school course—admitted, "I knew I was licked when I heard President Roosevelt start to read the record in Congress of Martin, Barton, and Fish."

In politics as in the other arts we can learn much from a study of the masters. Franklin D. Roosevelt, twice elected Governor of New York and four times President of the United States was a political genius, an accomplished master of the traditional political tactics and a brilliant improviser of new forms.

His sense of timing, his gift of phrase, his reassuring voice and friendly smile, his inspirational courage, will not be matched in our day. But underlying and sustaining his great personal gifts was his fighting faith—a stanch and militant liberalism. And it was on his liberal program and the record of its achievements that his stunning election victories were solidly based.

He never ran from a challenge where principle was involved, regardless of the power and prestige of his opposition. He said to the economic royalists in 1936 that in his first term they had met their match and in his second term he hoped that they would meet their master. If the mastery proved short-lived—then the fight must be taken up once again by every American who would live out his days in the peace and security Roosevelt worked and died for.

Roosevelt's liberal faith grew out of a sympathetic understanding of human needs and aspirations in a changing world. It was nurtured by his love of people and his respect for the innate dignity of man. It was a living, energizing principle of action—valid for both the domestic and the foreign fields. It sought out the forgotten man at home and gave him a new deal; abroad it held out the friendly hand of the good neighbor. Since it was a liberalism based on human needs, it never permitted itself to be confused or misled by those who spoke in the name of freedom but sought only Government protection of special privilege. It always asked, freedom for whom, freedom to do what? Freedom of the mind and spirit was championed. Freedom to fight against want and fear and the means to make the fight effective were fostered.

It is true enough that the American people were heartened by the buoyant Roosevelt smile, and inspired by his friendly confident voice. But the true power of the Roosevelt personality lay in the fact that it was a perfect symbol of the bold, confident, and human program that he championed in the dark days of 1933. Who could see that smile and hear that voice without recalling that at the depth of a depression which found the Republican administration utterly resourceless and impotent, a man emerged who held that a government of the people and for the people had the power to lick any man-made depression. Who can fail to recall that the Roosevelt personality symbolized the salvaging of the banks and the protection of the small depositors; the protection of the worker's right to have a voice in his wage and working conditions; the safeguarding of the small investor from dishonest stock manipulations; the protection of the consumer against economic royalists and utility company jugglers; the guarantee that the farmer's investment of toil and money would not be wiped out by burdensome surpluses or by drought damage; the harnessing of the great resources of the Tennessee Valley and elsewhere to bring light and power to the people; the development of social security that would permit the aged to live out their lives in freedom from fear and want; the declaration of a new economic bill of rights; the timely warning of the menace of fascism; the development of the Grand Alliance of Russia, Great Britain, and the United States that overthrew nazism; the blueprint for the United Nations that would secure a lasting peace through the maintenance of Big Three cooperation. Running through the rich legacy of accomplishment which Roosevelt bequeathed to us is a very simple political faith. In his words: "Government has the definite duty to use all its power and resources to meet new social problems with new social controls." Liberal government must rely on "the wisdom and efficacy of the will of the great majority of the people, as distinguished from the judgment of a small minority of wealth or education."

And Roosevelt went from victory to victory because the great majority of the American people are liberal and he reflected truly their needs and aspirations. I say to those who may be faint of heart about the prospects of liberalism today that only a liberal program and a liberal leadership will satisfy the American people. Temporary set-backs will not change the course of our development, because liberalism means devotion to the welfare of the vast majority of the people. For whom do the liberals speak? Among others, for the two-thirds of American families who still today have incomes of less than $40 a week. For the two-fifths of American families who—after a period of unprecedented profits and so-called "high wages"—have savings of less than $40.

How can the American people be anything but liberal in their political outlook? How can any political party truly serve the people unless it is liberal? And if it is liberal, how can it fail to be victorious?

Why shouldn't the vast majority of the American people want a national health program that will put competent medical services within the reach of all the people on the farms and in the cities by a proved American method?

Why shouldn't the American people want a national program for full employment with wages above the minimum required for health and decency? Why shouldn't a people of great racial minorities insist on fair employment practices so that all can fairly earn an honest living?

Why shouldn't they want a program that will provide homes and not merely housing for veterans and all others?

Why shouldn't they insist on free educational opportunities that will at least wipe out illiteracy—347,000 draft registrants could sign their names only with an "X"—and provide facilities for higher education for those who want them?

Why shouldn't they want effective safeguards against the cold strangling hand of increasing monopoly—safeguards that will keep the door of opportunity open to them and their children?

Why shouldn't they insist on a program that will serve the interests of 90 percent of the American people—particularly when the ultimate interests of the top 10 percent rest on the broad shoulders of the bottom 90 percent?

How far we have drifted from the liberal course in the 14 months since Roosevelt's death!

The economic bill of rights which Roosevelt enunciated shortly before his death, and which President Truman so recently reaffirmed, remains still a program in the blueprint stage fighting for adoption and implementation.

And wherever else you turn on the legislative front—whether is be minimum wage, or national health insurance, or the protection of collective bargaining, or veterans' housing, monopoly in industry, poll tax, price control, or full employment—you find that a coalition of the Republican Party and a handful of Democrats has entrenched itself in opposition to the will of the great majority of the American people. The American people, according to the opinion polls, want price controls retained—a 75-percent majority has expressed itself for the continuance of OPA. Yet in the face of that desire, Republicans, almost to a man, voted for a series of inflationary amendments. Aided by a strong minority of reactionary Democrats, the Republicans succeeded in emasculating effective price control and starting up the vicious cycle of boom and bust.

The Republican Party is the defender of wealth and property, but in its characteristic short-sightedness it never concerned itself with wealth and property lost through unemployment. The last depression cost us $350,000,000,000 in unproduced wealth. The next Republican-sparked depression will cost us many times more.

The Republican story is the same for veterans' housing, labor relations, the 65-cent minimum-wage bill—a consistent record of defending the privilege and profits of the few at the expense of the many. There have been some Republicans who have proclaimed their support of the liberal objectives, but they have not been able to see their way clear to support the specific measures proposed to carry out the objective. These are the people Roosevelt described as the "yes, but * * *" fellows. There have been a few Republicans who have said "yes" with no if's, and's, or but's. I honor their spirit, but they have truly been voices crying in a Republican wilderness. But day in and day out, in peace and in war, on small issues and large, on measures to tax and measures to spend, the Republican Party has been the consistent defender of profit and privilege.

No; the record of the Republican Party on domestic legislation offers no hope or comfort to the great liberal majority of Americans—farmers, small businessmen, labor, veterans.

On the fateful international front the same illiberal coalition of the Republican Party and a handful of Democrats has instigated the desertion of the Roosevelt program of international cooperation. Having stubbornly courted economic disaster on the home front, it pursues with equal heedlessness a course that can only end in atomic warfare.

When the menace of nazism threatened the overthrow of democratic civilization the Republican Party blindly preached isolationism as the road to security. Pearl Harbor made some reluctant converts to international cooperation among the Republican brethren, but how easily these ex-isolationists fell from grace. When American food is needed in the war-torn countries, food to feed peace and freedom, how fertile are our Republican friends in devising "yes, but * * *" tinged with all the old isolationist shibboleths. When American financing is required to speed rehabilitation and the restoration and expansion of world trade, the isolationist strain reappears in the Republican fold. When the give-and-take of true negotiation is called for at the Foreign Ministers Conferences the Republicans dig in behind our atomic-bomb monopoly and refuse to budge, come hell or high water.

And yet when a leading Republican isolationist who voted against lend-lease and against conscription becomes a convert to internationalism, the event is regarded as so extraordinary as to justify the award of a medal for civic virtue. The judges, of course, were not familiar with the Emerson admonition, "I cannot hear what you say because what you are and what you do thunders in my ears to the contrary."

We have scarcely buried the dead or tabulated the lists of the missing of the war not yet officially terminated. Yet defeatism is rife among diplomats; war fears and war talk are increasing among the people; and government officials are building their policies as if another war were inevitable. Is American policy without responsibility for the grave deterioration of international relations since Roosevelt's death? Has America carried forward the Roosevelt program that was proved in the crucible of war and found good? You know the answer.

The foreign policy of the United States today has paid too much for the support of the Republican Party—it is too much the policy of the minority party. While there may be Democrats who would thwart the Roosevelt program for peace, as they would thwart his program for prosperity, the grave watering down and enfeeblement of his foreign policy must be charged to the price we have paid for a so-called bipartisan policy that makes too great a concession to the party of ex-isolationists, of nationalists, of Russophobes who even in the face of the onrushing Nazi hordes voted to make lend-lease to Russia illegal. Instead of the Republican Party sharing the leadership in a genuine good neighbor policy, we have always had to drag them along, to cut down our pace in order to get them to go along.

In a world gripped in a crisis of confidence how in the name of common sense and simple fairness can a policy tainted with isolationism and nationalism restore confidence?

The Republican Party rides the twin horses of isolation and reaction. And if a few Democrats cling to the tails of the horses, they may give the appearances that the journey is bipartisan. But you will not be deceived—it is the Republicans who are in the saddle.

Where then shall the great majority of liberal Americans find their political vehicle? Where will the workers, the farmers, the independent business and professional men, the young veterans, find the kind of political action that will work militantly for the Roosevelt brand of liberalism, for prosperity, and lasting peace.

Where, then, are liberals to go? Surely they cannot go to the Republican Party, for the Republican Party has shown throughout its history an instinctive ability to rid itself of liberals. Since the death of Lincoln, practically every liberal in the Republican Party has been crucified. The Republican Party crucified its great liberal internationalist, Wendell Willkie, and drove out Senator Norris. The Republican Party has driven out Willkie's fellow Indianian CHARLES LAFOLLETTE. It is in the process of crucifying Stassen, another liberal internationalist. The Republican inquisition in New York is now examining the heretical views of Congressman BALDWIN, paving the way for a purge.

No, I say, there is no hope for the liberals in the Republican Party, which has been dominated by the holders of wealth and privilege, whose very core and being is the conservative principle that what is good for the privileged few must therefore be good for the Nation—the very opposite of the great liberal principle.

I know there are some who feel that there is nowhere to go except into a third party. I quite understand the reasons which lead to that conclusion—and I share their indignation. I know that it is a characteristic of Americans to go down fighting if they go down at all, and the liberals of this country will not take lying down the defeat of liberal principles by the major parties.

Yet liberals know the long road and the great obstacles in the way of effective success for a third party. Liberals know the electoral laws in many States would prevent them from getting the names of their candidates on the ballots, or from being recognized as a distinctive political party. Liberals know what happened to some of the most colorful and courageous liberals in our history, such as Theodore Roosevelt and "Fighting Bob" La Follette.

I would like to urge a road to liberal victory that has not yet been fully tested—that liberals lend their efforts not only to electoral victories in November but to exerting their full pressure on the Democratic Party from the ground up between elections, that liberals take an active part in local and State elections, in the State conventions and in the national conventions which make the party what it is. Bad Democrats sometimes get nominated, in effect elected, in Democratic primaries. The only way liberals can stop them is to step in and see to it that conservatives don't get elected in the primaries.

I have seen case after case in national conventions where old-line politicians threw the entire vote of their State delegations to a conservative Democrat. Yet the Democratic Party in those same States could not win in the November elections without the support of the liberals, who for the most part had nothing to say about the choice of the nominee in those vital stages when their voice would count most.

That is the reason I appeal to liberals to come and help us build this Democratic Party from the precinct and the ward way up to the national convention—into a truly liberal party—and make its nominees from constable to President truly liberal public servants.

I know the Democratic Party is not the party of unqualified liberalism, and I know that many of its members, particularly from the South, are more conservative than the conservative Republicans. I don't mean—and the record will bear me out—that all the conservative Democrats are in the South—you have your job cut out for you in other parts of the country, too. But as a southerner, I particularly deplore this southern conservatism from the very bottom of my heart. For historically the South is the cradle of American liberal ideas. Look at the founders of our liberalism—Jefferson, Jackson, and Wilson—southerners all—and the South was Franklin D. Roosevelt's second home. The heart of the South has always beaten in liberal rhythm. But vested interests, absentee landlords, an absentee-owned press, the poll tax, limited suffrage, have kept the liberal spirit of the southern people from being fully reflected in either candidates or platforms.

I am a Democrat who loves his party and is proud of its matchless contributions in war and peace to the greatness of America. I am a southerner who loves his southland and is proud of the glorious contributions the South has made to democracy. That is why I feel strongly that the South must take the lead in reaffirming the liberal faith of the Democratic Party.

The major well-spring of American liberal democracy is the political philosophy of Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia. The Jeffersonian concepts of human dignity and personal liberty have inspired and sustained the liberal cause to this day.

In the succeeding generation came Andrew Jackson, of Carolina—since both North and South Carolina claim his birthplace, I hope I am enough of a politician to arrange a pair on that one—Jackson, of Carolina and Tennessee. And, while Jackson is generally praised for adding to the democratic stream the rugged equalitarianism of the pioneer spirit, his major contribution to democracy is to be found elsewhere.

In the eighteen-thirties the East began to industrialize and workers began to organize. In the ensuing contest between labor and the emerging monopolists Jackson threw the weight of his party and his administration to the side of labor and against monopoly, to the side of the many against the few. Similar movements abroad were encouraged and supported—the French Revolution of 1830 and the Chartist movement in England.

In our own century another southerner, Woodrow Wilson, carried the liberal democratic principles cradled in the South to the international council tables in search of a just and lasting peace. Those events are most vivid in my recollection. I made my very first campaign speech for his peace program and against the Republicans, who were destroying it.

As a southerner I will fight with all my power to prevent our glorious democratic tradition from becoming sullied by the forces of reaction. As a loyal Democrat I will fight against the denials of democratic rights that can only result in the defeat of my party.

But today the South is being reborn. Henry W. Grady's dream of the New South is coming to birth. There is a New South, as he said, living, growing, breathing every hour. You know these forces operating in the South today, and daily they are gaining momentum, in spite of the embittered counter attacks of the reactionaries, and the intimidations of the bigots. But in this struggle for the heart and soul of the South, we need the liberals, primarily of the South, and then of the whole country. You will not recognize the South in 10 years. The more you help us the quicker will we achieve our ends.

President Roosevelt said: "I have always believed, and I have frequently stated, that my own party can succeed at the polls only so long as it continues to be the party of a militant liberalism."

The master political analyst was absolutely right. Only a liberal Democratic Party can be a winning party. You have only to look back on the political history since 1900 to see how the Democratic Party fared when its Presidential candidate tried to out-Republican the Republicans.

If the forces of reaction should by some mischance be permitted to capture the Democratic Party, if the unholy alliance with reactionary Republicans should make the party merely a tail to the Republican kite, if the filibuster and the poll tax are permitted to strangle the development of the party's liberal destiny, then as surely as the Republicans once split away from the Whigs, we shall see the development by the independent liberals who now vote Democratic of their own liberal party—we shall have forced the creation of a third party.

I do not ask that liberals come to the Democratic Party unconditionally. I don't ask you to join a moribund, reactionary, or privileged Democratic Party. I am expecting that we shall keep the Democratic Party true to the ideals of Franklin D. Roosevelt predominantly the liberal party of this country—even with defects and shortcomings. It is that Democratic Party which has within it millions of your kind of liberal who call on all liberals to heed our Macedonian cry to come and help us.

You are quite within your rights to tell the Democratic Party that you as liberals will not join forces with it unless it shows not only in words but in deeds convincing proof of its liberalism; and unless it shows a real hospitality for your help. If you should be repudiated and rejected, and find no welcome—in spirit, in policy, in candidates—then the responsibility for a third party will fall squarely on the shoulders of the Democratic leadership and they will themselves be to blame for their inevitable loss.

But if the Democratic Party remains true to the liberal faith, to the living, vibrant liberalism of Franklin D. Roosevelt—if it takes the lead to make the economic bill of rights a reality—if it takes the lead to build an effective peace policy and to restore to the international council tables the atmosphere of friendly cooperation among the major powers—then it will continue to enjoy indefinitely the confidence of the great liberal majority of America voters, and go from victory to victory at the polls. But more, it will have won for America the position of moral preeminence which is the responsibility of its unmatched power. It will have earned the undying gratitude of the anxious war-weary peoples of the world who will begin to see for the first time in human history the dawn of the lasting peace in the new and better world.

To you who have dedicated yourselves to political action let me leave you with words both of comfort and commendation. I shall not disparage the holy ministry which pleads for the souls of men. But I rejoice also in the work of those who in the pulpit of politics serve the needs and the aspirations of men as well. If you help to bring health, peace, knowledge, leisure, and inspiration into the lives of men, women, and children, you, too, shall have served your God as well as your fellow man.

When the range of your vision brings into the sweep of your eye all the tragic need there is, all the heart-touching suffering your fellow beings endure, all the obstacles which the selfish and cruel circumstances have thrown across their paths, you will sometimes be discouraged. But when you cast your glance back over history, when you see how far the race has come, led and nurtured by those who have fought their battle, you will gain a new confidence. You live in a day which is unique in all history. There was for the human race never such hope for the good life and an enduring peace as there is today. This glorious future is stretching out its hand to us. We do not now have to create; we but have to grasp it and firmly hold it. You will never be alone as you go bravely ahead, for remember His words, "Let not your heart be troubled, for lo! I am with you."

Potsdam Agreement Must Be Revised or Fail, Bellamy Says

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the fourth in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called A Trip Through Hell, and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

The Potsdam agreement, which is the basic law for the governing of Germany by the four victorious Allied Powers, provides, among other things, that the control council shall consist of the four military commanders in chief—American, British, Russian, and French.

Gen. Joseph T. McNarney, commander of all American troops in the European theater, is our representative on that council.

The Deputy Military Governor for the United States occupied zone is Gen. Lucius D. Clay. General McNarney, as our representative, sits constantly with the commanders of the other occupation zones to work out the future of Germany. No action can be taken without unanimous vote.

The Potsdam declaration and the other fundamental orders issuing out of it are full of inconsistencies, as I look at it. It consists primarily of two parts, one which might be called punitive, and the other, sweetness and light, and they do not hang together.

Neither is the punitive portion itself logically constructed. For example, the purposes of the occupation as regards reparations and the level of postwar German economy are defined as:

(a) Elimination of the German war potential and the industrial disarmament of Germany.

(b) Payment of reparations to the countries which have suffered from German aggression.

(c) Development of agriculture and peaceful industries.

(d) Maintenance in Germany of average living standards not exceeding the average standard of living of European countries (excluding the United Kingdom and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics).

(e) Retention in Germany, after payment of reparations, of sufficient resources to enable her to maintain herself without external assistance.

The illogicality in the punitive portion of the Potsdam agreement and its later refinements lies in the fact that there is no serious effort being made to treat German economy as a whole, despite a pious declaration in the agreement that such will be the endeavor of the four powers.

The industry of Germany was more thoroughly integrated than that of any other modern country, including the United States. We are accustomed here, in the automobile and airplane industries, for example, to have parts made in many different regions of the country and sent to a final assembling point.

But that process of infinite specialization has been carried even further in Germany than anywhere else, and, therefore, it is impossible to get an automobile truck concern, like the Daimler-Benz factory outside of Stuttgart, started again after its terrible air bombing, because many parts necessary for the truck were made in the Russian zone, with which we have practically no interchange agreement whatever, others in the French, with which we have little, and still others in the British, with which we have much better relations.

Coal is the key to the whole industrial problem in Germany, and most of the coal comes from the Ruhr, which is now in the British zone. Coal production in the Ruhr is not up anywhere near its prewar level, nor is it likely to be because of the shortage of manpower and the very low food ration which the British have been able to scrape up for the Ruhr coal miners.

Despite an obvious intent on the part of the Ruhr miners not to mine any more coal than they have to for their conquerors, it is only fair to say also that a man cannot perform the hard labor of a miner on an insufficient diet.

RUHR IS KEY

Until the final disposition of the Ruhr is settled in the peace treaty, there will not be any considerable resurgence of German industry. To say that there is no German industry worthy of the name today is stating but the simple truth. One can safely dismiss the sensational stories which occasionally come out of Germany that the Germans are now turning out cameras by the million and automobiles likewise. It simply is not so.

There is no way it could be done. The German factories are all completely policed by the Allies and accurate records are made of production. Let us hope this will continue indefinitely.

In carrying out the details of this plan of controlling production, various categories of industries have been set up.

It is provided that the production of arms, ammunition, and implements of war, as well as all types of aircraft and seagoing ships, will be prevented. All industrial capital equipment for the production of certain other items is to be eliminated, such as synthetic gasoline, synthetic rubber, synthetic ammonia, ball bearings, heavy machine tools, heavy tractors, magnesium, beryllium, specific war chemicals and gases, and radio transmitting equipment.

Among the industries steel is the most important. The productive capacity of steel in Germany is set at 7,500,000 ingot tons, but the allowable production of steel in Germany is not to exceed 5,800,000 ingot tons.

CONTROL IS COMPLETE

Like limits are put on the production of nonferrous metals, chemicals, dye stuffs, heavy engineering machinery, electroengineering machinery, transport engineering, agricultural machinery, optical goods, mining industries, paper, textiles, etc. The control is complete and is being carefully policed.

It is hard to say exactly what the Russians are driving at in their conduct toward their allies in Germany. One suspects that the primary purpose back of their noncooperative behavior is to make good little Communists out of the Germans as fast as possible. But the fact is that there is no exchange of information or products worthy of the mention between the Russian zone and the other three.

The French are terribly worried about their future security and one cannot blame them very much, because twice in the last quarter century the Germans have inflicted terrible damage on France. The French want the Ruhr. They want the Saar. Most American officers in Germany, military and civil, with whom I have talked, would be willing to give them the Saar and would stand for the internationalization of the Ruhr; that is, setting up an allied control commission to operate the Ruhr and divide the coal produced there according to an allotment agreed on by the four powers.

The French do not want this, but I believe that they will have to yield on this point or else confront the certainty that there will be an economic debacle in central Europe which will very likely throw all the Germans into the arms of Russian Communists, which the French do not want any more than we do.

CONFLICT EXISTS

Now, let us come to the sweetness and light portion of the Potsdam agreement, which I maintain is in conflict with the punitive portion.

This portion states our pious purpose to convert the German heart to the democratic way of life, so that the country may ultimately take its position among the decent nations of the world.

I say there is an irrepressible conflict between the two divisions of the Potsdam Declaration, and until this is resolved at a higher level than that of the generals in the field we shall never get anywhere in Germany. This is a job for the President of the United States, the Premier of Great Britain, and Marshal Stalin. Until we make up our minds whether we want to smash Germany utterly or really give her a chance to rehabilitate herself, we shall be floundering around in the dark.

I maintain that it is grossly unfair to put a decision of such magnitude up to the military men whom we have entrusted with running our portion of Germany.

Statement by the Minnesota Postwar Council on Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD KNUTSON
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by the Minnesota Postwar Council on Prices, "Sit tight on ceiling prices, subject to justifiable increases."

That is the advice of the Minnesota Postwar Council to the people of Minnesota, both sellers and buyers, both management and labor, both landlords and renters. In the present critical period of change, with so many uncertainties on every hand, there is one way for everyone to promote his own selfish interests on the long-range basis. That is to fight against the present threat of further inflation.

The war itself is over, but our economy is still largely on a wartime basis, because reconversion is far from being complete. We accepted price control in our stride during the critical period of fighting for the preservation of our principles and our country. Consequently, we should be equally determined to exercise price control voluntarily now during the equally critical period of reconversion leading to the restoration of a secure peace economy and the enjoyment of our individual liberty.

The Minnesota Resources Commission and the Council's Reconversion Committe on Expediting Materials have both pointed out that our State is dependent on other sections of our country for many finished goods and many partly procesesd goods. This situation puts many Minnesota distributors, fabricators, and manufacturers at the mercy of out-of-State producers who, in their turn, may find themselves forced to raise prices under a great variety of causes. Furthermore, increases approved by OPA, but not in operation on June 30, should have the same standing as increases in effect at that time. We must, therefore, in this period of adjustment, agree to some increases which calm, impartial, judgment would justify.

One of the functions of the Minnesota Postwar Council, created by the 1945 Minnesota Legislature, is to "furnish the people * * * suggestions or recommendations concerning postwar projects and needs." The Council, by a vote of 15 to 0 (5 of the 20 members were out of the State) offers the following specific program in connection with the present price control situation:

1. Let us hit this situation and not put ourselves on the defensive.

2. Let sellers inform buyers that they are basing their prices on the last OPA ceiling prices, subject to justifiable increases. We commend those who have already publicly announced their intention to follow this policy. The spotlight of public disapproval can be expected to show up the comparative few who follow the short-sighted policy of raising prices to gouge the public.

3. Let landlords, distributors, and manufacturers be guided by their conscience, not by the fleeting gain of the moment.

4. Let buyers buy only what they really need, and consider the wisdom of saving some of their present purchasing power for future needs at the reduced prices which we are confident free enterprise will produce in due time.

5. Let buyers not duplicate orders with different sellers.

6. Let us all make the black market over into the white American market.

7. Let us all let Congress know what we are thinking and doing.

Appropriations, Seventy-ninth Congress, Second Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the total appropriations and funds made available by permanent statute for expenditures by the various departments in this session of Congress totaled $39,500,000,000. That does not include about $1,500,000,000 that was provided in a deficiency bill in December which undoubtedly was expended in the last half of the 1946 fiscal year.

In addition to this amount that is made available there have been enormous loans by the Export-Import Bank totaling three or four billion dollars and enormous loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the terrific amount of Federal obligations growing out of the old housing programs which are still hanging on. I am fearful of that situation.

Total, deficiency and miscellaneous	4,678,738,677
Grand total, 79th Cong., 1st sess	39,504,734,744

The most discouraging factor in connection with the whole situation is that appropriations and funds made available by Congress were above the budget on an over-all basis. I submit a table indicating that situation:

Agriculture	81,001,000
Coast Guard		$17,674,000.00
District of Columbia		4,750,000.00

Federal employees' pay increase		177,300.00
Second deficiency		126,061.35
Third urgent deficiency		14,352,622.00
Third deficiency		240,706,246.97
Total	664,003,025	480,339,718.82

Our expenditures are running at a terrific rate. I have in front of me the Treasury statement for July 16, indicating expenditures for the first 16 days of July at $1,685,000,000—the item for the Veterans' Administration alone is running $263,000,000 and at the rate of approximately $500,000,000 a month.

The Bureau of the Budget has continued its inefficiency all the way through and has in general submitted estimates which were ill-considered, and they have done little to keep those estimates down.

But the picture presents a more serious situation than the Budget, because this year, as is shown in the table indicating the items that were above or below the Budget estimates, the Budget figures have been exceeded when everything is taken into consideration by an over-all figure of $184,000,000. This makes perhaps the worst record of any Congress.

The total amounts made available from all sources are $39,504,000,000. There has never been a time when so many subterfuges were used in trying to prevent the face of the appropriation bill from telling the truth about how much was in it. This has been especially noticeable in the naval bill, in the agricultural bill, the military bill, and State, Justice, Commerce.

One good thing about the reorganization bill is that it will do away with reappropriations, but that will do no good if we are going to continue such things as have been done this year, that is, the transfer of one appropriation to another which is in effect a reappropriation of funds.

The whole enormous spending program of the Government cannot be controlled except by the election of a Republican Congress. It is going to be necessary to do that if we are going to get rid of the bureaucracy which infests the United States and keep them from controlling us forever.

Misleading Amendment Dies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article which appeared in the Cleveland Plain Dealer July 22, 1946, relative to the so-called equal-rights amendment:

MISLEADING AMENDMENT DIES

By failing to produce the two-thirds favorable vote necessary to send the measure on to the House, the Senate has killed for the time being at least the so-called equal-rights amendment to the Constitution, the purpose of which was to give women the same rights as men under Federal and State laws.

The purpose of the proposed amendment was commendable, but as has been contended by its vigorous opponents—which include the National Consumers League, the League of Women Voters, labor and religious organizations and a host of others favorable to the feminist movement—the actual effects of such an amendment would have been retrogressive.

Inasmuch as not even the Constitution can alter biology or age-old social customs, any benefits accruing to women under this amendment would have been largely theoretical. On the other hand, the weaker sex (physically) stood to lose many of its important gains if this amendment were adopted. It would, in all probability, have invalidated all the State laws obtained over the years for the special protection of women in industry and in the marriage relationship—special protections made desirable because of the feminine biological make-up and the natural place of women in society.

It is well that the amendment was defeated in the Senate, opening the way for the quiet burial of this issue.

Let's Get to Work and Do the Job

REMARKS
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the people of this Nation can look forward with assurance to the most prosperous period in our history, if we go to work and produce what we need to supply the demands of our increase in population and family units.

In spite of the war and the great losses we sustained we nevertheless increased our population by 10,000,000 since 1940.

We also increased our family units 3,000,000 which creates the demands for new homes, and all the things that go to make up a home, more furniture, more home appliances, more automobiles, more of everything.

The increase in family units creates the need of more doctors, dentists, nurses, grocery stores, drug stores, theaters, churches, school houses, parks, playgrounds, ad infinitum.

The national income will naturally increase with the increased production which should reflect a decrease in national taxes, providing we do not squander our surplus in needless expenditures. We have a public debt of $270,000,000,000; we must reduce that to a minimum as soon as possible; we recently loaned to Great Britain $3,750,000,000, which added to our national debt. I opposed the British loan because I did not think we need to go into more debt in order to stimulate production in the United States. We have all we can do to produce what we need for ourselves. Foreign trade will never represent more than 10 percent of our production in this country and at present we need the very things to supply our own needs that foreign countries will be asking and bidding for.

What we need most in this country is to stimulate our own production of goods and services and after we have put our own house in order we can then look for markets for our surpluses. We should not neglect our returning veterans who fought for the liberty and freedom of our institutions. Following is a summary from the United States News of what we have to do and have in order to provide labor for our own people and to raise their standard of living to what it should be:

POSTWAR BIGNESS OF THE UNITED STATES: MORE PEOPLE, MONEY, BUSINESS—OUTLOOK FOR INCREASED PRODUCTION, INCOMES, AND STANDARD OF LIVING

This country is turning out to be a much bigger country than it was before the war. That fact is dawning on people very slowly, but it is a fact that is to take on more importance as time goes on.

Food supplies that would have meant surplus before the war now are short of needs. Housing that was considered adequate back in 1940, with some vacant dwellings, now is acutely short. The office buildings and factory buildings that were partly vacant before the war now are overflowing. Almost everywhere the country is breaking out at the seams.

Yet "normal" continues to be regarded as 1939 or 1940. Industry has been striving to return its production of automobiles, houses, refrigerators, and other goods to the prewar level, expecting that this level of production might go far to satisfy demand. Farmers often feel that there is something unnatural about today's demand for food. Price controllers have been trying to push industry's profits back to a 1936–39 level on the ground that the dollars earned then were as much as industry should normally be entitled to earn.

Population of United States, for one thing, now is nearly 10,000,000 greater than it was back in 1940. That means 10,000,000 more people to feed and clothe and house and provide with the gadgets that go along with American civilization. This increase in population is centered in the lowest age groups and means that there will be a much larger than prewar "normal" demand for all the things that are needed to provide for youths as they grow up.

Family units have increased proportionately more than population. Where the country had 35,125,000 families before the war, it now has 38,175,000 units. This increase of more than 3,000,000 families explains in part the almost explosive demand for new houses. With a larger number of families, there is need not only for more houses but also for all the things that go into houses, for furniture and kitchen equipment and vacuum cleaners and other things. With more families, too, there will be more children, and more children will increase demands for more schools. More people and more families mean more cars, which will complicate the country's traffic problem and lead to urgent need for more and better highways.

Production: The increase in the number of people in the United States during war years is a basic increase in the country's size that has far-reaching importance.

The labor force: The number of persons over 14 years of age who are working or seeking work, has grown nearly 6,000,000 to a total of 61,501,000. In part this is an abnormal increase because many persons who entered the labor force during the war—women, older people, children—are not leaving that force after war's end. This means that industry and Government and other occupations need to provide many million more jobs than before the war. The work of these added millions, in turn, is to increase the volume of goods and services available for enjoyment.

Industry's production rate is to be held much higher than before the war if jobs are to be provided for those who want jobs and if the needs of the millions of added people are to be met. In 1940, industry produced at 25 percent above the average of 1935–39 and it was considered something of a boom year. Now, industry, with all of its troubles, is turning out goods at a rate nearly 70 percent above 1935–39, and that level of operations is to rise sharply.

Steel to support that level of industrial operations could be turned out, with capacity operations, at a rate of nearly 92,000,000 tons a year. Actually, steel is being produced at about 85 percent of that rate. Before the war, steel was produced and used at a rate of 60 to 70 percent of a capacity of less than 82,000,000 tons. Prewar conceptions of the scope of industrial operations have to be revised.

Farm production, too, has risen sharply and will need to stay higher to provide food for the Nation's larger population. Farmers are producing food at a level nearly one-third higher than in the 1935–39 period. They are doing this with fewer workers and with inadequate machinery. The very high level of farm output still is not high enough to meet demands for farm products. A large slice of this demand comes from abroad and may be temporary, but United States agriculture as a permament thing must supply more food and fibers for more American people who are inclined to eat and dress better than before.

Income: The country's growth needs to be measured on still another basis.

Money supply: The currency and bank deposits in the hands of individuals and business, is vastly greater than it was back in 1940. Where the available money was $66,000,000,000 before the war, it now is above $150,000,000,000. Money supply alone is not an indication of the degree of growth in industry or in activity, but it does show that growth is not to be hampered by any shortage of dollars. It shows, too, that, if money should start to turn over more rapidly, things might get out of hand.

Income payments to individuals are a better measure of growth. Those payments back in 1940 were $76,000,000,000. They now are at an annual rate of about $159,000,000,000. In 1929, which always has been considered the real boom year, income payments reached $81,000,000,000. It can be seen how greatly the Nation's income level has expanded since that time, although an increase in the living-cost level of about 30 percent offsets in part the increase in level of income. Farmers and wage earners, in particular, have had increases that far exceed prewar living costs.

Income increases open the way to enjoyment of more goods and services and, thereby, to higher standards of living, provided those goods and services are turned out. People are traveling much more by airplane than formerly. Railroad travel is far above any level of the prewar past. Food consumption is at a record high. Clothing soon will be produced and sold in a volume above anything in the past. Within 6 months the production of automobiles and other consumer durable goods will exceed any prewar production.

Government: There is another side to this picture, however, with growth not confined to the income and production side of the picture.

Spending by government, too, is on a new peacetime scale. Before the war, the Federal Government, with all its New Deal activities, was able to spend at a rate of only $9,000,000,000 a year. In this peacetime year, started July 1, the Government will spend at a rate of $37,000,000,000, and it may spend at a somewhat higher rate than that when more veterans are given terminal-leave pay.

Public debt, which must be supported by the activity and income of the people, has grown at a very great rate. A debt that frightened people when it was around $51,000,000,000, before the war gets only passing attention now that it is above $250,000,000,000. With incomes high and activity high, people are not concerned with debt. That concern comes when incomes and activity are declining.

Tax payments likewise have gone up in a striking way. In the New Deal days, there was much groaning over a tax burden that amounted to a maximum of $6,000,000,000 a year. In this new fiscal year, started July 1, it is probable that taxes of all kinds, paid to the Federal Government, will exceed $38,000,000,000. Where the country was unable to balance a $9,000,000,000 budget before the war, it will more than balance a $37,000,000,000 postwar budget.

All these figures add up to the fact that the United States in 1946 is quite a different country than it was in 1940. The old conception of the Nation's size is having to be revised in the light of experience and of wartime growth. Before the war, New Dealers complained that the trouble with the country was that it had never become accustomed to big figures. They argued that, if people only would overcome a tendency to take fright at the mention of $100,000,000,000, everything would be all right. In this postwar period there is no evidence that the public is shocked by figures that are bigger than anything dreamed of 10 years ago.

Almost everything about the United States, as the Pictogram shows, has become bigger in the war years. This means that old views of markets and incomes and wage payments and production and other measurements of well-being must be revised.

The Atom Bomb and Its Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Long Prairie (Minn.) Leader of July 11, 1946:

THE ATOM BOMB AND ITS CONTROL

The demand that the United States give away the atom-bomb secret has some interesting angles when analyzed. For example:

1. The demand comes largely from Americans themselves. Outside a few political leaders in some foreign countries, particularly Russia, there is little concern anywhere about the possession of the secret by America. Here in America the demand is heard chiefly from the same class of people who have made so much trouble in the world by insisting that policies of appeasement be adopted to satisfy aggressors and save the world.

2. The demand here in America that we give away the atom-bomb secret is based almost altogether on a lack of faith in America. It is based on the idea that if we keep the secret the people of other countries are going to be impressed with the fear that we have some diabolical intention to kill them and take their countries away from them, and that this fear can be allayed only by giving them the secret of this new war weapon.

It is not clear that the people of the world have any such fear. In fact, there is more reason to believe that some folks here in America are libeling their own country. Certainly there is no basis for such a fear on the part of peoples in other countries, and it is our belief that no one realizes this better than they do themselves. In two wars, with plenty of opportunity to grab, we have come home without asking a cent of indemnity or a foot of land. We have hurried to the relief of peoples who have been attacked by aggressors. We have given our boys and our resources. We have made unparalleled sacrifices for all these peoples and have asked nothing but that the common decencies of democracy be established.

What is there in our record that should make any American think that the world distrusts us?

On July 4 we returned the Philippines to the Filipinos. One can go back in history to the time of Adam and not find a single instance of any other country showing its nonaggressor purpose as America has done in its treatment of the Philippines. We believe that the people of the world have faith in America even if some Americans do not seem to have. It is more than likely that if there could be a world-wide vote on what to do with the atom bomb, the overwhelming sentiment would be that America keep the secret and the people would so express themselves because they know the record and therefore believe themselves safer if the secret remains here in America.

3. The demand is that some kind of an organization, representative of the nations of the world, be set up and that the secret be turned over to it to control and manage.

The suggestion is appeasement gone to seed.

Remember, such an organization would be made up of—

(1) Nations that would have given nothing; and

(2) America that would have given everything.

In the case of the secret, no other nation has anything worth while to give. The other nations would thus get the secret and we would get nothing but the hope that our sacrifice would help convince the rest of the world that our intentions are good and that we are not going to sneak up in the dark and slaughter them.

And then, what about this proposed organization? Keep in mind that we have not as yet been able to establish a world peace organization that is much else than a debating society. Keep in mind that every time the UN in convention assembled get around to talk about anything but good health, fresh air, and sunshine, Mr. Gromyko gets up and walks out. In other words, keep in mind that UN is impotent, hamstrung, and hogtied, and then ask yourselves before falling for this latest appeasement proposal, what are the chances of making a second organization effective? What assurance could be given? What guaranties could be provided? Remember that two terrible wars have shown pretty conclusively that treaties of international agreements become mere scraps of paper when dictators find them in their way. Before we burn our bridges behind us and surrender the secret of the bomb to another international organization, let us wait at least long enough to find out whether the first one is going to get anywhere.

4. The demand is based on the further fear that if we do not turn over the secret, other nations in a few years will develop a bomb.

Well, what of it?

If they do, it would at least be an open and aboveboard action and it would not be done secretly and by stealth as could be done while the rest of the world was resting in the fancied security of the world-control organization. Scientists of other countries will, of course, develop some kind of a bomb and this will be true particularly if Uncle Sam loans these countries the several billion dollars that they will have to have for experiment and manufacture. It is significant that most of these Americans who are yelling the demand for the bomb secret surrender are in the forefront of the brigade that is insisting we make foreign loans. We know about as well as we know anything that not one country in the world today, and particularly Russia, has the billions necessary for atom bomb experiment and manufacture unless they are able to borrow it from us.

But returning to the fear of the appeasers that other countries will develop bombs of their own, we repeat, "What of it?" America will be at least five or six and more likely 20 or 30 years ahead of any of them, and we think that even the appeasers ought to have faith enough in the genius of America to believe that our country can keep ahead so that what competition there might be could never catch up—that is, if we can head off the uplifters and restrict our loans abroad. We doubt very much if any future would-be dictator, regardless of his own atom bombs, would start running amuck when he did not know and could not find out what Uncle Sam had stored up for him.

We are going to have more demands from the appeasers that we surrender the atom bomb secret, so it is just as well for America to be on guard. These people are indefatigable as appeasers always are. However, if they would put some of their energy into reminding the world of what America's record in behalf of peace is and of how unselfish our purposes have always been, perhaps they might be able to convince themselves of the good intentions of their country—something the rest of the world, we are sure, has been convinced of long, long ago.

H. R. 7037 Will Not Benefit the Needy Aged, Needy Blind, Needy Widows and Orphans of Kentucky

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. ROBSION
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 7037 proposes to amend the Social Security Act and provide that the Federal Government will match dollar for dollar the sums put up by the States for old-age pensions. The present law provides that the Federal Government will match dollar for dollar up to $20 for that purpose. In other words, a State would have to put up $20 before the Federal Government would put up $20, making $40 in all.

Only a very limited number of States under the present law have been able to match the $20 of the Federal Government. Very few States pay as much as $40 for the needy aged. Kentucky, under its laws, cannot pay more than $30. It can be seen at once that Kentucky does not come up to the requirements of the present law and this law increasing the Federal matching to $25 would not benefit the needy aged of Kentucky at all.

I wish also to point out that under this amendment there would be approximately $27,000,000 of benefits go to the needy aged of the various States. However, the State of California would get approximately one-half of this $27,000,000 and only a very limited number of rich States would receive any benefits. An overwhelming majority of the States would be cut out entirely. I regret to say that Kentucky, on an average, pays only about $11 to the needy aged. I have stated many times that this sum is totally inadequate and there should be a substantial increase, for a real needy old person should not receive less than $30 a month and, under the present law, they could receive $40 a month if the State of Kentucky would put up $20 a month to match the Federal funds.

This bill does provide for an increase matching the Federal funds for aid to dependent children and for the needy blind but the amount of money that the Federal Government can put up under the present law is greater than the amount Kentucky has been able to match and therefore, the increase provided in this bill would not benefit the needy blind or needy aged in Kentucky. This bill cannot benefit, in these respects, no one except the needy aged, the needy blind, and dependent children of a very limited number of rich and powerful States.

Kentucky is a very large Federal income taxpayer and she receives less in Federal money for the amount paid in than any other State in the Union. I cannot give my support to this bill as it would mean increased Federal taxes for the people of Kentucky for no benefits derived therefrom. The bill does contain some provisions which would be helpful and desirable for World War II veterans and for certain workers.

I am against the rule because if this rule is adopted, this bill cannot be amended. If this rule is adopted, no substitute bill can be offered. I, therefore, shall vote against the rule.

The States and the Federal Government should provide adequately for the needy aged, the needy blind, and the needy dependent children, and I trust that at the next meeting of the Kentucky Legislature they will increase the pensions to each one of these groups but there is no possibility of such an increase as will meet the matching of Federal money under the present law. Why should the Federal taxes of Kentucky be taken to enable one State to secure approximately one-half of all the benefits this bill would provide for the needy aged and other groups? It is my hope that the rule will be defeated so that those of us who are opposed to the inequitable provisions of H. R. 7037 may offer appropriate amendments or a substitute bill that will be more just, equitable, and fair to the people of Kentucky and the overwhelming majority of other States.

Full Production and Full Employment the Goal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT B. CHIPERFIELD
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, no one likes industrial chaos and economic confusion. No one gains by it. This includes labor, management, and the American people.

For this reason I was highly pleased with the recent statement of Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, when he said with reference to full production:

> Our major need is increased volume of production. Our safety lies in getting through this period of transition with no major increases in costs or stoppages of production. Major changes will be cumulative in effect and may start the chain of dangerous inflation. Wage earners can best stabilize their wage dollars by helping to increase volume of production which can wipe out the scarcities and the danger of runaway inflation.

It shows that this great labor leader and his organization have a keen grasp of one of the best methods of preventing runaway inflation and that any price control law must have, as one of its primary purposes, the full production of the commodities it controls.

I cannot help at this time but call to your attention it was not the American Federation of Labor that first broke the price line. It was the conception of its leaders that they should bargain within existing price ceilings. Let me remind you they stayed on the job and bargained within the price ceilings while others struck and caused, not a bulge, but a definite and serious break in the price lines.

You have but to recall the statements of the administration, including President Truman's advisers, first saying you can raise wages without raising costs. Then as soon as wages were increased, in the next breath announcing there would have to be price increases to meet the wage increases. It is a policy which results in a vicious circle under which no one can gain.

You will remember the flood of industry-wide strikes which immediately followed. This was at a time when the American Federation of Labor leaders were protesting inflation, the betrayal by the administration of breaking the line, and being put in a position of distinct disadvantage because of their policy to remain on the job within the price lines.

As a result of such inconsistent and mistaken labor policies on the part of the administration almost complete economic chaos resulted.

Under these chaotic conditions it is truly fortunate that we find Mr. Green with his feet on the ground, advocating a sound labor policy. As he pointed out in the Illinois State Federation of Labor Weekly News Letter of July 13, 1946, strikes should be used only as a last resort after collective bargaining has failed and where there is a real grievance:

Strikes are not the result of sudden action and thoughtless action on the part of the workers concerned. To be sure, there may occasionally be spontaneous or so-called "wildcat" strikes, which occur when human emotions get out of hand, as when a shop steward loses his temper over what he feels is an unjust treatment of a grievance. But usually this type of stoppage is very short and the workers involved are back at work the next morning.

Most strikes come only after prolonged negotiations with management after countless hours of discussion at union meetings, and after a democratic vote of all union members. The strike is an economic weapon of last resort, utilized only when all other methods fail. When all other methods to reach a reasonable fair settlement do fail, the strike is the only means available to workers by which they can protest against what they consider unfair or unjust treatment at the hands of management.

To the workers involved a strike is a trying and a terrible experience. It disrupts the worker's income and jeopardizes the security of his job. Workers don't go on strike lightly or without cause. They strike only when pressed into it by force of a real injustice which they can no longer tolerate.

Behind every strike there is a deep-seated grievance, behind every stoppage there is a wrong that calls for adjustment and correction. In most cases that grievance and that wrong go to the very roots of the economic well-being of the wage earner and his family.

Mr. Speaker, when there is a fuller realization between management and labor that they both have the same objectives, there can be no question but the people of America can look forward with confidence to a period of sound economy in this country.

Just what are these objectives? Certainly they include full employment and full production for the benefit of all. A return to freedom as against regimentation; the American's individual rights as against state socialism. Private enterprise, not government, makes jobs and prosperity for all.

Let us hope the day will soon return when there is an equal opportunity for all to prosper according to their skills, ability, and diligence, without class consciousness, and under laws which are fair to all.

Festus Boy Says People of Italy Appreciate Help From America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article from the July 18, 1946, edition of the News Democrat, Festus, Mo.:

FESTUS BOY SAYS PEOPLE OF ITALY APPRECIATE HELP FROM AMERICA

(By John Stewart)

Italian-Americans in Festus and Crystal City should be gratified to learn that their gifts of money, food, and clothing to less fortunate relatives and friends in war-torn Italy are being regarded as nothing less than Heaven-sent by those needy people.

Just a few weeks ago I left an Italy which was slowly and painfully climbing from the melancholy depths of almost universal hunger and poverty caused by a war for which it may or may not have been partly responsible. Certainly no one argues the fact that the people who have suffered and are still suffering most had very little to do with the evil designs of their Fascist leaders. It is an unfortunate fact that too many of the well-dressed and well-fed Italians today are the same people who managed to get along fairly well with the Duce gang while the people who are squeezing out a bare existence are the people who wanted no part of war or world conquest. With these people, as with the common folk of almost every country feeling the pain of war, their lot seems to be death, suffering, and hunger—nothing else.

To one who has seen tiny, dirty, ragged children roaming the streets at all hours of the day and night begging, and old women going through garbage cans of United States military installations, coming back to America is like entering a glittering fairyland, where the streets are paved with rock candy and the houses built with sugar lumps. Even with our shortages of food and clothing, the ordinary American is a baron by Italian standards and his cottage more than a villa on the Isle of Capri.

Exclusive of Germany, perhaps, no country in the world experienced war's fury as did Italy. Fortunate, indeed, and unusual is the smallest village which does not bear deep scars of combat. Damage in each varies, from towns like Cassino, which were utterly pulverized, to cities like Rome which was only superficially bombed on the outskirts. But hunger and disease go where bombs do not.

Italy is slowly getting back on her feet, thanks to the aid extended by her people like those in Festus and Crystal City and through agencies like UNRRA and American Relief for Italy, the latter organization largely sponsored by Americans of Italian descent. Everywhere I went in Italy I met people who had relatives in America. These people spoke of their American kin much as a child would speak of his patron saint. They spoke excitedly of packages which their American relatives and friends have sent them and many say they do not know what they would have done had it not been for the clothing and other supplies they received from this country. Many Italians are too proud to accept outright charity from organized relief agencies but gladly received these gift packages from members of their families in America. It is regrettable that sometimes these packages fail to reach their destinations, many times due to corrupt postal workers in Italy, but most of the parcels do go through.

I don't know whether the Twin Cities have a local chapter of American Relief for Italy or not, but such an organization could certainly contribute much to the rehabilitation of Italy. Shortly before I left that country, a large shipment of ambulances and medical supplies arrived which were donated by that organization. The people know where the help is coming from and they appreciate it.

There are three things which the destitute Italian people need desperately and immediately—food, clothing, and medical supplies. These things are available only to the rich, who can afford to pay exorbitant prices. Nowhere in the world does the black market operate so viciously as it does in Italy, and the ghouls who prey upon human misery seem to have no limits to which they will not go. Necessities of life are theoretically rationed, but in reality they go to the Italians with the most lire. The only way to beat the black market seems to be for the country to resume normal production but immediate relief is urgently needed.

On June 2 the people of Italy voted overwhelmingly for a republic. Thus did the country which mothered the world's first republic reject many years of rule by the house of Savoy, the royal family which in the nineteenth century brought about the unification of Italy under one monarch. Aside from the fact that the house of Savoy united the country, many American observers agree with the voting population that a republic is advisable at this point in Italy's history. Many critics of the monarchy point to the cordial relations it had with the Fascist regime and to the fact that many members of the royal house espoused the cause of fascism and its aggressive campaign for another Roman Empire. To thrift-minded Americans, the fact that legion of counts, barons, dukes, and princes receive handsome stipends from the public treasury for no apparent good reason is another argument for a republic.

Leftist strength was strongly apparent in the recent elections, although a middle-of-the road organization, the Christian Democratic Party, secured a plurality. To prevent a complete turn toward communism, it is necessary for Italy to get back on its feet quickly and effectively. America, as the greatest democracy on earth, can do much to guide the long-oppressed people of Italy toward sane government.

But all in Italy is not gloom and misery. The people still sing and laugh despite their tribulations. One may still go to the Royal Opera house in Rome and hear Beniamo Gigli sing in "Tosca," and one may still visit the Borghese Art Gallery. Italy, although poor in the things we consider necessary to life, offers much to the tourist, to the poet, and to the lover of art. In tradition, Italy is rich, for her sun-bathed cities mirror many civilizations. Her silent ruins tell the glory of the Roman Empire, her cathedrals and museums portray the brilliance of the Renaissance, and the wild beauty of her seacoast seems to reflect her proud spirit.

Bullies of the Ballot Box and Thieves of Elections Prepare To Again Rob the People of McMinn County of Their Right To Vote

OF

HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, the hardened, bold, impudent attitude of the Biggs-Cantrell machine in their utter contempt for and defiance of public opinion, the law of the land, and the blood-bought rights of the veterans who are running for office in McMinn County, Tenn., and the decent citizens of that county is the most shocking example of brutal bossism that has ever before challenged public opinion in this country.

The battle line in McMinn County is but one sector in a Nation-wide fight for a free ballot and an honest count.

There is no finer citizenship in this country than the overwhelming majority of the people of McMinn County. Yet for the past 10 years they have been disfranchised and elections have been repeatedly stolen by a machine headed by five men.

Cowed and assaulted by the pistols and blackjacks of armed deputy sheriffs and policemen, and distressed over the absence in the armed service of 3,526 of their boys, it has become a common saying among the people thus robbed of a voice in their government:

"McMinn County is a good place to live, but of course we can't vote."

Returned soldiers, sailors, and marines who have faced death on the battlefield refuse longer tamely to submit to being robbed at the ballot box by the machine. Five of their number are candidates for public office in the election of August 1.

They are determined to have an honest election and a fair count.

The Cantrell machine, and the two Democratic election commissioners have announced that again by the use of armed deputy sheriffs, prison guards and policemen, with criminal records they will take the election by force and fraud.

The biggest steals are always in Etowah, where Frank Cantrell, the brains of the machine, is mayor and controls the police force. Paul Cantrell is the democratic candidate for sheriff.

I have heretofore pointed out that the democratic election commissioners have repeatedly appointed officers to hold elections who are "repeaters," that is, men who through long practice are expert in stealing elections.

At precinct No. 1 in Etowah, Roe Rucker, policeman, who recently, while in company with his brother, William Rucker, chief of police, shot an Etowah druggist in his drug store, has been appointed election officer. William Rucker while chief of police served as an election officer in Etowah in both the August and November elections in 1942. He stole both of said elections and for his theft in November 1942, was convicted in the United States District Court, fined $500 and sentenced to jail for 60 days.

At the other precinct in Etowah, Erwin White, who has been a deputy sheriff, has been appointed officer of and will conduct the election. One of his judges is Horace (Biscuit) Farris, foreman of a State prison camp in Meigs County.

Here is the record of Erwin White. In the August 1942 election, White as officer held the election at precinct No. 3 in Etowah, in the rear of the Cantrell Banking Company's building. He was armed with a pistol. Bob Biggs, democratic judge, was armed with a pistol and a blackjack. Tom Long, the doorkeeper, was armed with a pistol and blackjack. The Republican judge was not permitted to watch the count.

Erwin White was again appointed as officer to hold the November 1942 election at precinct No. 3. He was armed and when M. A. Barnett, the Republican watcher, caught him in the act of repeatedly calling ballots marked for the Republican candidate for Congress, White and Bob Biggs, a democratic judge who was armed with a pistol, forcibly threw Barnett out of the building and drove him from the polling place.

This conduct of White is set out in detail in the ouster suit prepared by me, and filed by Attorney General Beecher Witt against J. C. Cate and R. R. Webb, election commissioners for McMinn County. This suit drove them from office.

The present democratic election commissioners, George Woods and Pat Mansfield, well knowing White's record, appointed him officer to hold the November 1944 election, at the third precinct in Etowah. All day long Sam Waters, a State highway patrolman, armed with a large pistol, swaggered in and out of the room in the old post-office building, where the election was held. When the polls were closed, Erwin White took the ballot box and ran across the street with it to the rear entrance of the Cantrell Bank building. He carried the ballot box into the building, the door was slammed in the face of the other officials, and the Republican judge, clerk and watchers were held on the outside of the building, while White's wife stood guard at the closed door, until he had time to switch the ballot box, a pasteboard carton, for another one of like appearance.

At this precinct the returns as made up gave the Republican candidate for Congress 218 votes. Two hundred thirty-eight voters at this precinct made affidavits they voted for the Republican candidate for Congress.

In the face of this record of White, his appointment can mean but one thing. That is, he has been appointed to steal the election at this precinct from the GI candidates and to rob the voters of their right to vote and have their votes counted as cast.

The elective franchise is the sovereign, sacred right of the citizen to a voice in his government. It is the highest privilege of the citizen. It can be lawfully denied him only by a conviction for a crime involving moral turpitude.

The constitution of our State provides: That elections shall be free and equal, and the right of suffrage, as hereinafter declared, shall never be denied to any person entitled thereto, except upon a conviction by a jury of some infamous crime, previously ascertained and declared by law, and judgment thereon by court of competent jurisdiction.

How much longer will criminals, the lowest in the revolting category of crime—election thieves—be permitted to place the fine citizens of McMinn County and the veterans of that county on the level of convicted felons by depriving them of the right to vote?

Surely we do not rate our citizens lower than the statesmen of Rome placed a Roman citizen—Cicero had this to say of the dignity and rights of a Roman citizen:

> It is an outrage to bind a Roman citizen; to scourge him is an atrocious crime; to put him to death is almost a parricide; but to crucify him—what shall I call it?

The reply of the people of McMinn County to the bullies of the ballot box, the thieves of the elective franchise, should and we hope will be:

> It is an outrage to bypass honest men and appoint confirmed thieves to hold elections; to intimidate, beat, or shoot a citizen to rob him of his vote is an atrocious crime; to put him to death if he resists your attempt to steal his vote is a crime against the man murdered and against the life of this Republic.

By section 2087 of the Code of Tennessee voters are given the right to witness the count of the ballots. This section of the code reads as follows:

> Reading and numbering the ballots: When the election is finished, the returning officer and judges shall, in the presence of such of the electors as may choose to attend, open the box and read aloud the names of the persons which shall appear in each ballot; and the clerks, at the same time, shall number the ballots, each clerk separately.

The leaders of the machine have stated their intention that if the GI candidates or their friends undertake to enter the polling places in McMinn County for the purpose of witnessing the count to see that the ballots are honestly counted that they will be met and repelled by armed force.

In every county of Tennessee except in McMinn and Polk Counties and other counties where elections are stolen, the citizens are permitted to enter the polling places and watch the count. No honest election official objects to being watched—a dishonest one should be watched.

Neither a deputy sheriff nor a policeman has the right to hold an election in Tennessee while armed. Neither a deputy sheriff nor a policeman in Tennessee has any right to be armed with a pistol or blackjack while holding an election and he has no more right to use a pistol or a blackjack to intimidate or assault a voter than a robber or a burglar has to be armed and to use a pistol or blackjack in the perpetration of a robbery or a burglary.

Under the laws of Tennessee the citizens of McMinn County have the right and power to enforce an honest election on Thursday, August 1, 1946.

Resolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein a resolution relating to Palestine, adopted by the Department of Massachusetts of the Italian American Veterans of the World War at their eleventh annual convention held at Boston, Mass., on July 20, 1946:

Whereas the world is just emerging from the bloodiest war in all history; and

Whereas the war and the sacrifices and hardships which it entailed was begun by the cruelest and most inhuman treatment of peoples with a design to subjugate and enslave all mankind; and

Whereas the Allied nations of the world bitterly fought the enemies of mankind with the avowed purposes of establishing for all the peoples of the World the fundamental freedoms laid down in the Atlantic Charter; and

Whereas these freedoms, the avowed purposes of the sacrifices made were freedom from fear, freedom of worship, freedom from want, and freedom of speech; and

Whereas the people of the Jewish faith in Europe were the first and principal victims in the planned purposes of the enemy, suffering noncombat casualties, including 6,000,000 deaths, the uprooting of what little security and home they had; and

Whereas the cessation of hostilities has left hundreds of thousands of these people homeless, beggared, and deprived of the common decencies of mankind; and

Whereas the doors are shut to these people by most of the nations of the earth and they are wandering, and those not wandering are concentrated in camps and under conditions little, if any, better than those which prevailed in the Nazi confines; and

Whereas the people of the Jewish faith in Europe, referred to as displaced persons are truly people without country or home; and

Whereas by heritage and by modern effort the people of the Jewish faith have a just claim to a home in Palestine; and

Whereas Palestine appears to be the only hope of saving these human souls; and

Whereas by mandate of the civilized nations of the world, the United Kingdom of Great Britain has been given the supervision, but not the ownership of this land of Palestine; and

Whereas numerous studies and commissions have resulted in the recommendation for the immediate opening of the doors of Palestine to admit 100,000 of those displaced persons into Palestine; and

Whereas Great Britain herself under the original Balfour Declaration made commitment to the Jewish people that Palestine shall be their homeland; and

Whereas plain common decency and the interests of humanity require the alleviation of the distress of these people for their own sake and for the sake of the rest of the world; and

Whereas not to open the doors of Palestine as a homeland to these distressed Jewish people would be the complete denial to them of the "four freedoms" for which the most terrible war in all history has been fought: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Italian-American War Veterans in convention assembled at Boston, Mass., on the 20th day of July 1946, That the Italian-American War Veterans favor the establishment of Palestine as a homeland of the people of the Jewish faith and urge the immediate admission to Palestine of at least the 100,000 people recommended by the recent inquiry commission; and further

Resolved, That the United States of America take an active and implementing part in the furtherance of these objectives.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, not only do conscientious, patriotic Americans differ as to the advisability or necessity of making the British loan, which in reality is a gift, but, even within a short period of time, the same individual may find himself having difficulty in deciding what course he should follow.

As an illustration of that fact, I here reprint two speeches of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], the chairman of the Rules Committee and a Member of the House who has served as long as, if not longer than, any other present Member.

On July 8, 1946, the gentleman from Illinois made the following speech from the well of the House—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pages 8393 to 8396:

THE BRITISH LOAN

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 138 which provides for the British loan. It is an open rule. It provides for 16 hours of general debate, after which the joint resolution will be considered for amendment under the 5-minute rule. It waives points of order and consequently gives to each and every Member the right and privilege that I have always believed should be his.

Mr. Speaker, I am for the rule because it has long been my policy and belief that whenever any legislative committee reports a bill the House should have the privilege of passing upon it. That is the reason I am bringing in the rule.

However, Mr. Speaker, I greatly regret that up to now I have been unable to come to the conclusion that I can support the joint resolution for the British loan.

REMEMBERS BROKEN BRITISH PROMISES

This is the first time in these many years, Mr. Speaker, that I have been unable to bring myself to support a so-called administration measure; but I have had a great deal of experience and knowledge of past dealings with Great Britain before and during the First World War and during this World War, too. I might say right here that during the war just concluded I have never said one word which might be construed as reflecting on Great Britain or any of our gallant Allies; but as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs before and during the First World War I observed the actions of Great Britain.

LORD BALFOUR'S PROMISES

Time will not permit me to go into all the instances.

I will only call attention to the fact that when Lord Balfour and his commission arrived here in the First World War, pleading in my presence for our aid and assistance, they declared they were fighting with their backs to the wall.

I recollect what pledges and promises and assurances they gave us then; but while they were pleading for aid the British were ransacking our mail sacks, copying our cables, and giving to the English Board of Trade invaluable information, all to the cost and detriment of our own trade.

Though the United States made loans and advances and credits to Great Britain for the aid of the smaller nations of Europe, evidence in the State Department will show how they failed to keep promises and profited on their own allies.

FORCED RUMANIA TO BUY THROUGH GREAT BRITAIN

The British said they needed eighty million or eight hundred million dollars, I forget which, to presuade Rumania to come into the war on the side of the Allies, for loans and for armaments, since Rumania had neither money nor arms.

Yet after inducing Rumania to come in they failed to furnish the promised money and forced the Rumanian Government to buy war matériel through the British at a profit of from 25 to 50 percent.

I took the matter up at the time with President Wilson and with Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo so that our country would make the loans direct and the small nations could buy thier supplies from us directly without paying an exorbitant toll to Great Britain.

I recall all the promises the Balfour commission made, including those about Palestine, but England, as you know, has never seen fit to keep those pledges.

AGAINST OUR BEST INTERESTS

I simply wish to say that during all the years of history Great Britain, to my knowledge, has never done anything for our Nation. We saved her twice at great sacrifice, and I cooperated to the utmost. I regret that today I cannot advocate making this loan; in my heart I feel it is against our best interests. I know that Great Britain today is circularizing the entire world, pointing out that she can extend longer credits and can supply the needs of those countries to better advantage than we can.

I feel that the loan it is proposed to make to her will be used not only to compete with our commerce, as she has done heretofore, but will be used in a manner that is bound to be to the disadvantage of our Nation, and to strengthen not only British commerce but British control over the vast colonial empire, to maintain the British nobility and the haughty lords in splendor, and, worst of all, to support new Fascist governments, reactionary governments in exile, with their floods of propaganda against existing governments, after we have expended billions upon billions of dollars, 300,000 American lives, and nearly a million casualties to bring about the defeat of Hitler and those who were wedded to the Fascist form of government. It has been charged that the British Government has used our lend-lease advances and equipment for the support of the so-called governments in exile, mere puppets of British imperialism, in defiance of the will of the people.

Consequently, I feel our efforts and our sacrifices would be nullified and even wasted if we should aid Great Britain to continue in her policy of strengthening Fascist countries and Fascist leaders everywhere.

UPHOLDS TOTALITARIAN GOVERNMENTS

British politics intrigues and schemes and plots everywhere.

We all know of the tacit support given Hitler Germany and Mussolini Italy by the Chamberlain tory government.

In Spain, Argentina, Greece, the Middle East, Indonesia, China, Palestine, Turkey, Egypt, Portugal, everywhere British business has an interest, the British Empire has interfered. Franco could not long remain in power without British support.

Their plotting did not stop a single day during the war, and it is going on now.

BRITAIN SEEKS AMERICAN ALLIANCE

Unfortunately, our foreign policy seems to be tied to Great Britain's all over the world.

All this British plotting has the aim of bringing about the Anglo-American military alliance against the whole world advocated by Mr. Churchill and his tories.

This is obviously in violation of the advice given us by George Washington.

Unfortunately, for political reasons, we did not enter the League of Nations; but almost before the ink was dry on the treaties England was aiding Germany against France, and over sharp French and Russian protests permitted the Germans to enter the Saar and Ruhr Basins.

GREAT BRITAIN ENCOURAGED GERMANY AGAINST RUSSIA

It was Great Britain that encouraged the German military and later Hitler to war against Russia. Germany was fully aware of English intrigues, and aware that Russia also knew it. Hitler believed he could play one nation against another, as in France he pitted party against party to divide France and strengthen the Fascist sympathizers. He expected to overrun Europe and Russia with British support and then defeat England.

I FORETOLD HITLER PLANS MARCH 18, 1938

Realizing the deadly danger of Hitler to all democracies, with intuitive knowledge of his future plans, on March 18, 1938, I delivered a speech on this floor setting forth his aims. History shows how accurate my prophecy was. I insert a few paragraphs from my speech of that day:

"EXPRESSED BELIEF IN SECRET CONSPIRACY 3 YEARS AGO

"Three years ago I voiced belief that a secret or tacit agreement existed between Hitler, Mussolini, and Japan, but my warning went unheeded. The strategy practiced by those countries conformed exactly to that predicted by Professor Masaryk, who was intimately aware of Germany's ambitions.

"In the Orient Japan pursued a course toward domination of the yellow races, apparently with preassurance that Italy and Germany would so engage the attention of the European democracies that interference in China would be impossible.

"In Ethiopia Mussolini's war machine grinded to its conquest while Hitler's silence gave approval.

"Internal dissent in Spain, nourished by the dictator countries, finally flamed into civil war, and the legions of Italian and German soldiers took stand in battle against the established government.

"Hitler, demanding the return of Germany's lost colonies, only cloaked his purpose of European aggression, and it was long ago clear that he would one day climax the years of planned propoganda in Austria by an invasion of that country. His seizure of Austria is but a prelude of more ambitious plans. Peace- and liberty-loving Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Hungary, and the other small independent nations now see his shadow across their lands—Memel, Danzig, and the Polish Corridor, Alsace-Lorraine, and the much-desired Ukraine.

"For the time being, engaged in consolidating his gains, he may utter reassuring words to Poland and Yugoslavia. But they have only to recall his utter disregard of treaties, and his oft-repeated statements as to his ultimate aims, to realize how necessary it is that they prepare to resist invasion, for invasion is bound to come.

"AMERICA MUST TAKE NOTE OF WHAT IS GOING ON IN THE WORLD

"One may properly ask, How does all this affect America? Who knows? In this fateful hour, with all the civilized world well nigh breathless, I do not feel that we should follow the vacillating policy of Great Britain, who, in the opinion of many well-qualified students of international affairs, may be the next prey of the remorseless triumvirate. Many ripe scholars feel that the suppression of Great Britain will mean the consummation of a plan to form three great powers outside of North and South America. I doubt very much that France, which is fighting domestic problems with her back to the wall, and Russia, despised by the capitalistic groups of the world, could, after the disappearance of the other countries I have named, long withstand being dismembered also. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind but that Hitler, Mussolini, and the raving-mad Japanese war lords are in a conspiracy to divide the entire world among themselves, or at least as much of it as they can manage to grab.

"POLISH LEADERS SHOULD NOT FORGET TREATMENT ACCORDED POLES IN PRUSSIA

"Great Britain, rather late, is commencing to realize its danger. Does Poland realize her danger?

"The leaders in Poland might well harken back to other days, and consider the former treatment of Poles in Prussia.

* * * * *

"Recalling this, and viewing the present prejudice which governs in Germany, Poland should properly estimate the future insofar as her relations with that country are concerned.

"AMERICA MAY NOT BE AS SAFE AS SHE FEELS

"Up to about 12 years ago we confidently believed ourselves properly protected against possible attack from any and all quarters; but in view of the increased and ever-increasing knowledge of aviation and mammoth airplane carriers, are we really free from military danger?

"If this nefarious triumvirate should effect the dismemberment of the great British Empire, what would become of Canada? Could we still feel free and at ease without present-day Canada?

"Only a little while ago I read in the public press about concessions that had been or were contemplated to be granted by Mexico to Japan in Lower California. That recalled to my mind the tentative offer by Germany in 1917, in the Zimmerman note, to give Mexico a part of the United States if Mexico would join Germany, and the offer to Japan of the Philippine Islands in return for military aid. When those audacious offers were first brought to light it was thought they were sheer allied propaganda, but we were convinced of the authenticity of these reports by documentary evidence that came into possession of our Government.

"BELIEVE AMERICA'S MEMBERSHIP OF THE LEAGUE WOULD HAVE BEEN BENEFICIAL

"I am confident today, beyond all doubt, that had the United States joined the League of Nations it would have strengthened and preserved the League in full vigor and effectiveness and we would not have present-day conditions, with all democracies of Europe either destroyed or on the verge of destruction. I still believe that under the terms of the League Covenant we could have precluded the mad rearmament race by close adhesion to and renewal of the provisions of the Washington Arms Conference after the 10-year limit, to the lasting benefit of all civilization. At the conclusion of the Washington Arms Conference the United States felt fairly easy; and it was only our absence from membership in the League that led first Germany, then Italy, and, shortly thereafter, Japan to withdraw from membership in the League. Then trouble began. The plot thickened. Now we have the fruit.

"Moreover, I feel that if Great Britain and France had taken a firm stand against the initial rearmanent of Hitler, Mussolini, and Japan, and had not been lulled to sleep by undependable peace assurances, they would have been in position 2 years ago to stop Mussolini and Hitler in their mad rush toward a menacing world conquest. Should we, then, follow the vacillating and always unloading policy of Great Britain, or should we be ready to properly defend ourselves and our possessions against any and all?

"I LIKE TO FEEL THAT I CAN CHANGE MY VIEWPOINTS IN ACCORDANCE WITH CHANGED CONDITIONS

"And so, in conclusion, let me say that in view of the alarming world conditions to which I have alluded, I shall vote and work for the passage of the pending bill. I was just as conscientious when I opposed large Army and Navy appropriations in past years as I am conscientious today in supporting this bill. I have changed my views because and only because world conditions have changed. When I get so old or so benumbed of brain and character that I cannot change my view in accordance with changing conditions and a changing world, it is time for me to be carried out feet first, and I want to be.

"I have criticized conditions and things at times, and I shall do so again whenever I see anything that I think merits criticism. But I love this country. I will vote any amount of money necessary to protect it from enemies either within or without. Today, perhaps more than at any other time in its history, the United States of America stands out against the dark and stormy seas of racial persecution, intrigue, conspiracy, and jealousy as the one and only enduring beacon light of hope.

"Let us strive to preserve and promote this priceless heritage for ourselves and posterity. I do not expect to be here forever, but I do want the Stars and Stripes and a democratic form of government to endure here forever."

SUBMITTED GERMAN PLANS TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

Having received accurate information from reliable private sources in Europe, I was able to submit to President Roosevelt detailed plans of that murderous gang, the German military clique, not only to build up a fifth column and spread disruption and suspicion and distrust throughout North and South America, and to discredit every step taken by the administration to prepare for the coming conflict, but even a military plan for invasion of our country by military forces from the north and from the south.

URGED PRESIDENT TO INVESTIGATE

I then urged President Roosevelt to appoint a committee, or to designate men whom he could trust, to make a thorough investigation to protect our country, and perhaps to be able to persuade Russia that, despite the obvious unfriendliness of Great Britain's aims toward her, it would be to her own benefit not to join Hitler and Mussolini and the vicious Japs in their dastardly world-wide plot to destroy the democracies everywhere so they could divide the world among themselves and rule unopposed.

Those are my underlying reasons, Mr. Speaker. Let me say that I have read the report of the minority and cannot, of course, subscribe to some of the statements they set forth.

NOT PREJUDICED BY BRITISH BETRAYALS

Some of my friends may feel I have been prejudiced against Great Britain because of Chamberlain's heartless sacrifice of Czechoslovakia to Hitler, or because of Foreign Minister Bevin's shameful and untrue statements about the Jews.

Others will think I have been turned against Great Britain because that Government has willfully and deliberately violated its solemn pledges and the treaties under which England was given the mandate over Palestine; or because of recent charges that English monarchists supported Sir Oswald Mosley's Union of British Fascists.

CAN RISE ABOVE PERSONAL FEELINGS

I should be less than human, Mr. Speaker, if these breaches of international good faith and political morality had had no effect on me; but I trust that I can always rise above personal feelings in matters of national interest, and let me say right now those betrayals, bitter as they are, could not by themselves have prevailed upon me not to go along with my party in this crucial issue.

ENGLAND IN BETTER FINANCIAL POSITION

I believe Great Britain is in better financial position, Mr. Speaker, than we are. All she owes is about $80,000,000,000. We owe directly about $272,000,000,000, which is the figure it stands at after the effort of the gentleman from North Carolina before me, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. DOUGHTON, reduced it from $300,000,000,000. But we owe a great deal more than that. England has never repaid the loan made after the First World War, and when we were unmercifully abused and called a nation of Shylocks and otherwise criticized.

Now on this loan we are going to charge only 2 percent interest; but there are no interest charges during the first 6 years, which brings the actual interest down to 1.62 percent. Yet the United States will pay a higher rate of interest and at the same time extend our debt. I prophesy that when the interest payments become due they will pay us, not with drafts, but with abuse.

We are not four times richer than England, nor do we possess the fabulous wealth held by the British Empire. She, of course, comes to us as usual with crocodile tears, pleading that she must be saved for our sake, when in fact she owns enough securities in our country and throughout the world that she can easily raise this money by disposing of one-tenth of her holdings.

The Empire has vast stores, in every quarter of the globe, of raw materials and resources such as we neither possess nor control—tremendous unmined gold reserves, diamonds, rubber, tin, aluminum, critical and strategic resources worth many billions. In addition, she has obtained plants, machinery, and tools worth hundreds of millions of dollars she now plans to use in competition with us.

CAN SELL OWN BONDS

Mr. Speaker, as the situation now exists I feel that the Constitution of Great Britain does not preclude her from issuing bonds and selling those bonds to her own people as we would be obliged to sell the bonds to our people. I am of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that we have not only performed our duty toward Great Britain but more.

On the other hand, let us look at what Great Britain did for us during the 200 or 300 years that she owned and controlled the North American colonies; nor can I find anything she has done in the interest of the people of the United States and our possessions since we secured our freedom and our independence from her.

If there is any gentleman here who can tell me what she has done to assist and aid us I would like to know it.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. For about 12 long months she stood on the firing line alone, protecting the interests of freedom while we were preparing to join her in the latter days of the war.

Mr. SABATH. And we came to her rescue.

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Now she is preparing, as I view it, for another war instead of devoting her time to bringing about peace in the world. All her acts are such that they tend to make me feel and believe that she desires to continue to strengthen her control over the 500,000,000 colonial people that she has held in thrall these many, many years, and who have tried and are trying and pleading for their independence, for their liberty, and their right to self-determination.

As one who believes in democracy, I have at all times urged and pleaded that it should be the policy of our country to aid the just aspirations of these aspiring peoples, held in thrall by the British Empire against their will and exploited by the British monarchs and their commercial representatives.

My efforts in behalf of a free Ireland, a free Czechoslovakia, a free Poland have been followed by my aid to the freedom and liberty of other nations and other peoples.

I have at all times urged aid to those people who aspired to freedom from their oppressors and the monarch's yoke.

I cannot now support a loan which will make that yoke tighter and more galling.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I gather that the gentleman is against the loan. Now, is that because Great Britain refuses to carry on her program to open Palestine or because the gentleman thinks she does not need the money or because she will not repay it?

Mr. SABATH. I have stated my principal objections.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Which one of the four?

Mr. SABATH. I have stated my principal objections.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SABATH. The fact that Great Britain sold out and betrayed Czechoslovakia; that she has kept the word pledged by Balfour in 1917 as to Palestine; her refusal to carry out the recommendation of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry to permit a hundred thousand unfortunate people driven from their homes, the few that are left, go to Palestine—those are not my reasons. They do show that Great Britain has never kept her promises or pledges and history in years to come will bear me out.

My reasons are, as I have stated, that she is in as good position to raise the money as we are; in fact, better. She can dispose of her holdings in the United States.

Furthermore, the so-called loan will not help our commerce; it will consist principally of a line of credit and will be used to compete with our business, which means that she will produce goods with the machinery, the plans, the tools, and the material which we furnish her thus enabling her to beat us to the punch, as she is trying to do in Mexico, South America; yes, the world over.

Those are my reasons; the loan is against the best interest of our country.

Examination of the charges and rentals and debits piled up against us to reduce the lend-lease credits from $30,000,000,000 and equalizes our advances under so-called reverse lend-lease would prove her unfairness.

I wish Members could interrogate some of the officers and men who were stationed in the British zones, sent there to defend the Empire, as to the charges made against our armed forces.

REGRETS NOT ADVOCATING THE LOAN

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I just want to say that I agree with the gentleman on those reasons, and I am wondering if he is not becoming dangerously near what we call an isolationist insofar as Great Britain is concerned.

Mr. SABATH. No; I am not. If I thought this was to be so understood, I should not be here. I have my own convictions, and I cannot help myself, sir. Those are my views. I have seen so much that I cannot help but feel that Great Britain again is taking advantage of us. I have seen her fail to keep her word in the past. Personally, I again say that I regret profoundly that I cannot bring myself to advocate this loan as urged by the administration.

Furthermore, I fear that our administration is, unfortunately, being misled and imposed upon by a Republican lawyer of Wall Street having nothing in common with the administration, John Foster Dulles, who, outstanding though he is as an international lawyer in international finance and investment, naturally makes recommendations and gives advice to our State Department which, I feel, are in the direction of his speaking and experience and contrary to my own. Has he not done business with Hitler? Has he not represented IG-Farben and other cartels which served Hitler? Was he not a leader in America First and violently opposed to our leader, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and his policies? His views are not my views, and I am not here to aid any group of bankers or captialists against the American people who, after all, will have to foot the bill and pay these loans.

DUTY TO PERFORM

I actually deplore and regret that for the first time I cannot, as I have during the last 13 years, support the recommendations and policies of the administration.

However, I have a duty to perform. Some of my friends say, "Oh, you know, you should not oppose the administration." I am not opposing the administration. I am trying to aid the administration, because I believe they are being advised by unfriendly interests, by people having no real feeling for the welfare of the administration or our country, because some of those advisers have represented interests that have been and are opposed to our own.

What I am saying is for the RECORD, and for the future, that posterity may pass upon my remarks, as with my prophecies on March 18, 1938.

On the day the question of voting in favor of or against the loan or gift was up for final decision in the House, July 13, 1946, the same gentleman made the following speech. I quote—Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page A4057:

THE BRITISH LOAN

(Extension of remarks of Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH, of Illinois, in the House of Representatives)

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, having been obliged to preside at a meeting of the Committee on Rules this morning to consider the granting of a rule on the atomic energy control bill, and at a further meeting this afternoon for a rule on the price-control bill, I have missed the opportunity of obtaining the floor to explain my position on the British loan joint resolution and, therefore, ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, at the time I presented the rule making in order that joint resolution providing for the British loan, and urged its adoption. I expressed my views on Great Britain's unfair and selfish policies and tactics. I stated that she has failed in the past to keep her pledges and promises, and has always sacrificed the rights and interests of other nations and peoples whenever it was to her benefit.

I do not retract now what I said then.

I asserted that my long familiarity with Great Britain's record made me reluctant to support the loan, believing that Great Britain is in a position to reconstruct her own economy.

HAVE ALWAYS HELD MY COUNTRY'S INTEREST FIRST

Immediately my motives were questioned and my position distorted by those isolationists and reactionary forces opposed to all progress and real democracy. Yes; even some of my friends have assumed to think that my opposition was based only on the unfair treatment of Czechoslovakia and the Jews. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I am deeply interested in the welfare of Czechoslovakia, and of Jewish people everywhere, now and in the future, but I am an American, right or wrong, first, last, and always.

I resent most strongly the insinuations and implications that have been made.

Mr. Speaker, in 40 years in this House, and in more than a half century of unbroken public service, there has never been a time when I have not held paramount the welfare and interest of my own country, America.

HOPES LABOR GOVERNMENT WILL FOLLOW LIBERAL POLICIES

Since I made that speech I have observed that some of the outstanding British tories are criticizing and opposing the loan. Consequently, I came to the conclusion that the defeat of the loan would be capitalized by that reactionary group against the present Labor administration, in the effort to overthrow it. The Labor government has not, it is true, been as fair and liberal as I had expected, but I hope in the future it will follow more humane and more liberal policies, and I am confident no part of this loan will or can be used in any way to support a Fascist government anywhere, or in further repression of her colonial people.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN HAS POINTED OUT BENEFITS AND AMERICA'S DUTY

On last Wednesday I had a long conference with the President, who urged the passage of the bill because it would serve our own best interests and would aid in the adjustment of international commercial and political problems, and because, as the most powerful Nation on earth, it is our duty to, and we must and will, assume the world's leadership, and making the loan is essential to sustain the world leadership we have attained.

LOAN SUPPORTED BY AMERICAN LEADERS

For years, in urging the passage of legislation recommended and requested by our Presidents, I have argued that as Chief Executive of this Nation the President has sources of information more complete than any one of us can possibly have, and that his knowledge is such that he is familiar to a much greater degree with the needs of the whole Nation and the world.

Moreover, the former Secretary of State, the Honorable Cordell Hull, in whom I have always had the utmost confidence, who entered this House when I did, and whom I have known for 40 long years, has, in company with many other outstanding American leaders, urged favorable action on the loan.

On the other hand, I have heard and have received communications from many former isolationists and reactionary leaders opposing this loan, and I cannot bring myself to the point of joining with them, many of whom, even now, as is their custom, have unfairly and unjustly questioned my motives; their company, as well as their viewpoints, I have never cherished.

AMERICA MUST TAKE LEAD; SHALL SUPPORT BILL

In view of all this, Mr. Speaker, and believing that the accused should have the benefit of the doubts, and believing further that America can, will, and must take the lead in rebuilding the world for a lasting peace, for justice, and democracy, and freedom for all, I cannot avoid the conclusion that I should support this joint resolution.

It may be that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] will ask and receive permission to revise the foregoing remarks or to withdraw one or the other speech from the permanent RECORD, but, to illustrate my point, I am quoting them herewith so that they will be printed in the permanent RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The Ordeal of Wendell Willkie

OF
HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY
OF VERMONT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Wendell Willkie this country and the world suffered an immeasurable and catastrophic loss of leadership. As it was said of Lincoln, so it shall be said of Wendell Willkie:

He held his place—
Held the long purpose like a growing tree—
Held on through blame and faltered not at praise.
And when he fell in whirlwind, he went down
As when a lordly cedar, green with boughs,
Goes down with a great shout upon the hills,
And leaves a lonesome place against the sky.

It was my unforgettable privilege to have been closely and intimately associated with Wendell Willkie back in 1919 and 1920 when we served as associate general counsel for the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. at Akron, Ohio. He had charge of all matters affecting labor, corporate, and individual, covering all the branches around the world as well as the plant at Akron. I was the tax attorney for the corporation, its officials, and its employees. We had an office to ourselves. His law textbooks backed against mine as we sat opposite each other across the double desk. Problems of my department were discussed with him and vice versa. I was somewhat older and longer in the practice of the law. He was not too long away from his law school. Those were very interesting and never-to-be-forgotten days.

Then he and I decided we should go on to other fields of endeavor. So I went first and Wendell followed, but from the day we left Firestone to the day he died our intimacy continued and our friendship grew stronger over the years.

This is preliminary to and justification for my putting into the RECORD an article by another friend, Russell W. Davenport, who knew Willkie as it was given to only a few to know him.

The people lost a great champion and the world a crusader sans peur et sans reproche when Wendell Willkie, great soul that he was, friend of the people, unselfish advocate of a better world, slipped out of this vale of tears and into that bourne from which no traveler returns. His place will never again be filled.

So, Mr. Speaker, under permission heretofore granted, I am including as an extension of my remarks an article by Russell W. Davenport, which appeared in the Atlantic Monthly some months ago, entitled "The Ordeal of Wendell Willkie":

THE ORDEAL OF WENDELL WILLKIE

(By Russell W. Davenport)

(Out of long intimacy and the knowledge of certain factors that have never been made public, Russell Davenport has drawn this portrait of a man who helped change America. Some readers will disagree with his estimate of Wendell Willkie, and some will say that his deep, poetic feeling for his friend has carried him beyond the ordinary limits of the historian. Whatever the eventual verdict of history on these points, however, each of us should face two questions squarely: Where did I stand in those times of crisis? And how much did Wendell Willkie, by word or deed, help to clarify my thinking?—The Editor.)

I

Five years ago the United States was an isolationist power. It is true that the American people never actually voted for isolationism, whether in 1920, 1940, or 1944. Yet the doctrine was always in the offing. It was a powerful factor in our national life; it influenced our policy-makers; and it entered into the calculations of other nations in our regard. With the possible exception of Russia—which had, however, favored collective security during the thirties—we were more withdrawn into ourselves than any other major power.

Today, that situation has been completely reversed: there has been a bloodless revolution as dramatic as any in history. No longer is America isolationist in comparison with other nations; rather, other nations are isolationist in comparison with us. It is no exaggeration to say that the American people as a whole are now the most world-minded on earth. Even the average Britisher seems to be less keenly aware of his involvement in the affairs of the world—especially those of the Pacific—than the average resident of the Mississippi Valley.

There are, of course, a number of obvious reasons for this profound and dramatic change. The war itself taught us lessons for which no amount of oratory could be a substitute. And the explosion of the atomic bomb, which was not only heard but felt all around the world, reverberated most particularly in American hearts, to the advantage of the internationalist thesis. The revolution in attitude can be credited to no one thing, no one man. It has its roots in millions of humble homes, whose sons went forth, many at the cost of their lives, to repair the errors and misconceptions of the past. It is profoundly democratic in nature.

Yet if we look back with the historian's eye we can see that in the process of their change the people were represented preeminently by two spokesmen, who saw things very differently, but who were in fundamental agreement concerning the international crisis of their time. These two leaders, who died within 6 months of each other, were Franklin Roosevelt and Wendell Willkie. In tracing the causes of our bloodless revolution, the historian of the future will have to understand both of those men.

He will, however, find that they represent very different historical problems. The record of Mr. Roosevelt is basically official and will certainly be supplemented by copious memoirs and documents from the files of his advisers. Mr. Willkie also made an official record as the Republican candidate in 1940; yet this was in fact only supplementary to his basic contribution. Mr. Willkie played his historic role primarily as a private citizen. As Archibald MacLeish has so poignantly pointed out, he never succeeded in winning election to a major public office—never even held such an office—yet he achieved world-wide influence. He exercised power, not through victory, but through defeat.

And just because the Willkie record is primarily that of a private citizen, there is danger that its significance will be lost. This danger is not merely sentimental. Naturally Mr. Willkie's friends want him to get full credit for his historic task; yet the real question is not the credit, but an understanding of the time. Wendell Willkie was a product of his time in every sense of the word, and any historian who fails to understand him will fail to understand the crisis out of which he emerged. If the people of the future do not know him, they will not know us; and they will not know how the revolution came about.

Wendell Willkie was a striving American who began life in a small midwestern town. He believed—as Americans congenitally must—in growth, development, "progress." And he practiced what he believed. The great truths that he represented so forcefully at the end of his life had always lived within him in potential form, as many who knew him in his younger days will affirm; yet their expression as practical political doctrine required a kind of unfoldment of character, like a tree developing from a seed; and this unfoldment was born of long—but successful—struggle. In this sense he was traditionally American.

Yet Mr. Willkie's career was not merely a struggle: It was an ordeal. He was the protagonist of a gigantic drama. The dynamic of this drama was that he would not accept, would not stoop to represent, a status quo—whether this was a Hoover status quo or a Roosevelt status quo. Those have been two phases of American history, both of which have failed—and seriously failed—to answer the questions of human freedom pushing up through the bloody soil of the twentieth century. These questions of freedom—of freedom, specifically, in a technological age—were Wendell Willkie's questions. But they were fatal questions to ask and answer honestly, because so many of the answers lay beyond the political understanding of the American people in the critical years from 1938 to 1944.

And just because people were not then ready for those answers, Wendell Willkie is a tragic figure. His tragedy can be understood not in the secondary sense of sorrow (for he was the most buoyant of men) but in the classical, the primary sense of fate. Like Abraham Lincoln, he represented a struggle in the American soul, a conflict which Americans had not yet resolved in his lifetime. He represented unfulfilled aspirations involving certain decisions that the people had not yet dared to make. Because he faced these aspirations—because he embraced them as his own—his leadership could not materialize in political office in his time. It was his task to be faithful to realities which we, as a nation, were as yet unable to grasp. But his enormous influence lay in the fact that he lived up to that faith—that he was faithful to the unfulfiled.

II

Everywhere you turn you hear the comment that Wendell Willkie was not a "practical politician.' Yet this impression of him is wholly false. To speak personally, I have worked with a good many politicians; I have taken instructions from them, and have in some cases even ventured to advise them; and I will say without any reservation that Mr. Willkie was one of the two or three really practical politicians I have ever known. Those who think him "impractical" forget the incredible political feat that he accomplished; to emerge from the public utility industry (the most hated of that day) and capture the nomination of a party which he had only recently joined; to roll up the biggest popular vote in the history of that party; and thereafter, in defeat, to use that party as an instrument for holding the Nation on its course through its most perilous crisis. None but the most astute and realistic of politicians could have accomplished that. It is the record, not of a dreamer, but of a shrewd and practical man.

What do people mean, then, when they call Wendell Willkie "impractical" in politics? They mean, essentially, that he was not making the right moves to win office in his time. This was in large measure true. But it was not because he was "impractical"; it was because he did not want to hold office, except on certain terms. And the terms were that the American people must be willing to face those questions of human freedom which they had failed to face, and which their leaders had failed to face. They must be willing and able to vote for the unfulfilled answers to those questions. And Wendell Willkie did not want to be voted into office on any other basis.

And for that matter, by 1944, he did not even want a nomination, he did not even want a chance to run, unless this proposition was first made clear to the politicians who wielded power in the name of the people. He could not appease those politicians—not one of them—and still adequately represent the unfulfilled truths within the people which the people wanted him to represent. And since those politicians were seeking a status quo, Mr. Willkie, and with him the American future, was frustrated.

The same point is illustrated in the riddle of the Wisconsin primary. Almost everybody wonders why Willkie chose to run that race, in which he failed to win a single delegate. Undoubtedly Wisconsin was a political miscalculation; yet the answer to the riddle is not so simple as that. Plenty of politicians had warned Mr Willkie of defeat; the risk was large and he knew it. The riddle can be understood only if we recognize that there was one indispensable move he had to make in 1944; he had to meet the isolationists head-on. He had to show that the isolationists could be defeated, or else—which is what he actually did show—that they were capable of defeating, through the international issue, everything we cherish for the future of America.

It is doubtless true that if Mr. Willkie could have predicted his defeat with certainty, he would have shrewdly devised some other, less costly way to meet his issue. But he had to meet it somewhere, somehow, and he had to meet it, not just with words, but at the risk of total loss. Wisconsin is a riddle if we think of Wendell Willkie as a man seeking office. But it acquires meaning—tragic meaning—when we think of him as he really was, a man engaged in the development of political truths which the people, and more especially their politicians, were not yet ready to grasp.

The principle also emerges—to take a third and final illustration—from his attitude toward the New York gubernatorial election of 1942. There was a concerted move to draft Mr. Willkie for Governor of New York in that year. Great pressure was brought to induce him to seize the Republican nomination. But he rejected the idea. There were, of course, certain political risks involved, and many people suppose that his rejection was based on these. But this was not the case. The proposition had almost no political appeal for him. Instead, he chose to take a trip around the world.

It is difficult, even to this day, for many of his friends to understand this; they think he was mistaken. But the idea that he was mistaken is begotten, again, of the fallacy that Wendell Willkie was seeking office. He was indeed seeking office, and seeking it with all the vigor and passion of an ambitious man; yet the office had to have meaning in terms of those inner and unfulfilled aims for which he was working. The governorship of New York, however useful as a means of reaching the White House, had no such meaning.

Mr. Willkie could in fact see two roads to the White House in 1942. One road led through Albany; the other, through Moscow and Chungking. And the Moscow-Chungking route was of necessity his; not because it was the shortest, or the easiest, or the surest—for it was none of these—but because it involved the future; because it dramatized, and so hastened, the arrival of that inevitable time when Americans would think in terms of all the peoples of the earth. Maybe you could not get to the White House that way in 1944. But if you were faithful to the hidden potentialities of America, you could go there no other way.

III

What were these hidden potentialities which thus dominated the career of one of the shrewdest of American politicians? It is a fair question, but an exceedingly difficult one to answer. Wendell Willkie was not a systematic philosopher. His vision of America is nowhere wrapped up in a package; it is embedded in speeches and papers dealing primarily with the practical issues of the time, and only secondarily or by inference with the future. I should like, however, to take the license of a friend who had the benefit of many long and intimate conversations with him. With a little interpolation for the sake of brevity, I think that the kind of world he looked forward to can be made clear.

There exist on earth today three dominant ideas affecting the political and economic outlook of mankind. These ideas are: The idea of organization, as developed especially by Germany; the idea of community, as developed especially by Russia; and the idea of individual liberty, as developed by Great Britain and the United States. Each of these ideas contains truth; yet each, carried to extremes, is productive of evil. The idea of organization is indispensable to an industrial age; yet the Nazis carried it to such an extreme that it reared itself against us as the antichrist. Russia has carried the idea of community to an extremo which excludes individual liberty. And we ourselves have sometimes carried individual liberty so irresponsibly far as to endanger the economic security of millions.

If we visualize these three ideas at issue in the world, we can understand much of what Wendell Willkie was striving to accomplish. He understood all three. But more than this, he understood the interrelation of all three. He knew that an industrial society cannot survive as a democracy if any one of these ideas is lacking. Hence the great task, the task of the future, is to find a kind of synthesis by which they can operate, not only simultaneously, but in combination.

It was because he could see the necessity for combination that Wendell Willkie was so misinterpreted by the politicians. One of the reasons he appealed to Republicans was that he understood industrial organization. But he also baffled Republicans—who accused him of being a New Dealer—because he saw just as clearly that an industrial society cannot survive unless the requirements of the community are met, and that these requirements—of security, of stability, of health and education—involve us inescapably in a strong and extensive Federal Government.

But at the same time Wendell Willkie knew that both the idea of organization and the idea of community must be modified by the concept of individualism. He knew that if this modification is not made, our civilization will fall a prey to the state. It is scarcely necessary to stress the intensity of his belief in liberty. Privately, it took the form of an impassioned insistence on personal independence. Publicly, it molded his every policy. "Freedom," he was fond of saying, "is indivisible." He hated the word "tolerance." "If men are equal," he would ask, "why should one group talk about 'tolerating' another?" He took positive joy in the defense of minorities, and was never afraid to carry his ideas to their logical conclusion. In one field this logic led him to the equality of the Negro; in another, to the limitation of the powers of government, however large; in still another, to an insistence on real competition in industry, real enterprise. He never forgot that somewhere along the line, individual liberty involves individual risks; that, without risk, men are not free.

Now, clearly, this idea of individual liberty is in conflict at many points with the other two dominant ideas of our time. The conflict exists, not only beyond our shores, but right here in our midst. Mr. Willkie was deeply involved in it, and he sought constantly for a way to resolve it.

The conclusion that he finally reached, which very few of his contemporaries have understood, was that, as between the three ideals I have sought to outline, there is no necessary conflict at all. There is no necessary conflict, for example, between a broad social security program (the community idea) and the rights and opportunities of individual liberty. This supposed conflict, on which the Republican Old Guard has based most of its campaigning, is not inherent in the ideas themselves: it is created by men. And it is created, for the most part, by one particular evil: the effort of some men to exclude other men from the benefits of their resources and their labor. In domestic affairs, this exclusion takes the primary form of monopolistic practices—not merely economic, but also political and social. Among nations it takes the form of nationalism. Wendell Willkie knew deep in his bones that the evil of exclusion is the great curse of our time. He knew that only by breaking down artificial barriers, whether economic or political, whether national or racial, can we hope to satisfy the basic requirements of an industrial age—work security, and freedom, for every individual.

IV

Had the world been at peace, Mr. Willkie's main attack might have been directed at monopolies whether private or governmental. But with the world in chaos he swung the attack against nationalism itself, and against imperialism. We must make good note of the fact, however, that his attitude toward nationalism was no sudden realization, born of an emergency; he had battled nationalism all his life. The theory of one world, for example, was the fruit of a lifetime of effort to express, in concrete political form, the universal laws of freedom. There was, however, one special discovery that he made on the one-world trip. He discovered, tangibly, the enormous influence of America. It became overwhelmingly evident that if national barriers are to be broken, America must take the lead. The United States, he found, possessed the resources, the good will, and the traditions of political and economic freedom requisite for leadership, and no other nation did. This discovery clarified his life's work. We in the United States were taking the idea of individual liberty for granted. But it cannot be taken for granted. We must seed it and cultivate it; we must encourage it; we must, where necessary, fight in behalf of those who profess and practice it. The aim of our foreign policy must be an unfoldment of our national will, to spread and strengthen the idea of liberty. For if we do not spread and strengthen it, no one else will; and if no one else does, it will be overcome and superseded elsewhere by other ideas; and if elsewhere, then also here.

A friend of Mr. Willkie's recently said: "The very phrase 'one world' has entered into the language and is no longer even used in quotes. It is used as a kind of shorthand for a whole set of ideas and a whole way of thinking." That is correct. One world is a complete philosophy. Like all the great concepts of the human mind, it has applications on many levels. It applies to the maintenance of peace, because war anywhere in the world means war for us. It applies economically, because depression anywhere in the world means eventual depression here. And it applies politically, because the maintenance of freedom here requires its maintenance elsewhere. The one-world philosophy is thus exceedingly complex; yet its central idea is divinely simple—that one man anywhere in the world is related to, is tied in with, all men everywhere in the world. The political purpose of mankind, with America taking the lead, is to make this inescapable relationship productive of work, security, and freedom, equally and universally.

This doctrine, therefore, envisions a world in which the so-called sovereign powers of nations shall be limited, the absolute power to make war curtailed, the absolute power to levy unilateral tariffs modified, the absolute power to harm other nations denied. It envisions a world that is open to trade and expansion, education and the franchise. It envisions a world in which peoples of all colors and creeds will be guaranteed equal rights and opportunities, free franchise, free speech, and free education. One world is a free world.

To the "realists" among us, all this may seem hopelessly idealistic. But to the man who collected more votes than any other Republican candidate in history, it evidently did not seem hopeless at all. For in pursuit of it he gave his life.

We cannot, indeed, regard Wendell Willkie's death as a mere failure of the physical heart. His heart failed; yet the ancients, when they used the word "heart," had a more profound concept than ours. For them, the heart represented the soul; when it was broken, an inner element of a man's being was broken, and a physical collapse could well follow after. Wendell Willkie's heart was broken in this way. It was broken by his own friends; by the desertion, after Wisconsin, of associates who had been sharing the load; by the discovery that only a handful were willing to go the long, hard road with him all the way. This was no mere sentimental indulgence: it was a question of his own human resources. In the years between 1940 and 1944—the years of Wendell Willkie's international unfoldment—he reached the limits of his strength.

Go back in your mind to 1940—that grim and terrible year, with democracy in full retreat before Hitler's armies. This was a crucial time for the United States, with a Presidential election in the offing, and Pearl Harbor just around the corner. The isolationists, growing stronger by the hour, were planning to seize the Republican Party as their political vehicle. In this they had made substantial progress. Many Republicans, of course, were fighting isolationism. But most of the party's official leadership was following the isolationist line on the life-and-death issues of foreign policy. Mr. Willkie's rivals for the Republican nomination at Philadelphia were isolationists. And the Roosevelt administration, which also had its "practical politicians," was moving with a caution that at times seemed like appeasement of that dangerous doctrine.

In casting up the account for that period, the future historian should ask himself what would have happened had Senator TAFT or the then almost frankly isolationist Thomas E. Dewey been nominated at Philadelphia. What would have happened on such issues as selective service, the destroyer deal, or lend-lease had the titular Republican leader followed his advisers in manufacturing negative criticism of all administration policies? The answer is not to be found in the size of the Republican vote. The realistic answer is that the Roosevelt administration itself would have been afraid to push those measures, or even (in some cases) to propose them.

Wendell Willkie's leadership was different. On November 11, 1940, less than a week after his defeat, he went on the air with what has already become a historic speech. "A vigorous, loyal, and public-spirited opposition," he said, "is vital to the balanced operation of democracy." But such opposition must be constructive and responsible; it must be a loyal opposition, working primarily in the interests of the country, rather than in the supposed interests of party. It must be free to agree with the administration as well as to disagree.

The great test of this theory came a few months later. Would the loyal opposition support the hard-pressed British Isles by means of the lend-lease bill? There were many crises in Mr. Willkie's brief political career, but I am satisfied that this one was the most critical of all. During the weeks immediately following the introduction of the bill, he emerged as one of the truly great American statesmen—a citizen of the world. He was never in doubt, of course, about his stand on lend-lease; but he did nourish a forlorn hope that the Republicans would not make an issue of it. If they did, he would have only one course; and as a shrewd and practical politician he knew that that course would split his party wide open. While he waited for the situation to develop, his switchboard was jammed with telephone calls, his after-dinner conversations, always brilliant, became tempestuous. Then Dewey and Hoover came out against the bill, and the issue was drawn. Wendell Willkie brushed aside the politicians and came out for it.

The result was exactly what he had expected. The Republican organization, blind to the overriding issue, branded him as a traitor. Even the Willkie amateurs who had fought so frenetically for him 6 months previously were split apart. But his course was now clear. During the campaign he had devoted much of his energies to domestic issues; now the international issue absorbed almost all of them. He flew to London to see for himself whether Britain had any chance of surviving; hurried home to testify before the Senate and to stem the rising tide of lend-lease opposition within his own party, which the New York Times described as "more and more a strictly party stand." Today Wendell Willkie's testimony in the gloomy atmosphere of February 1941 reads like inspired prophecy. Britain, he said, was not beaten. And democracy would survive.

In my perhaps prejudiced opinion, the "loyal opposition" theory saved this country. By breaking up partisan opposition to a series of absolutely critical measures it gave the administration its opportunity to mobilize the Nation for war. Many observers—and I am one of them—believe that the mobilization was accomplished just in the nick of time. In any case, it is clear that from 1940 to 1943 the cause of democracy depended on the American war measures, which in turn depended very largely on opposition support. Had there been no lend-lease it is doubtful whether the Germans could have been stopped at Alamein or at Stalingrad. And it is well to remember that the Congress came within one vote of demobilizing our Army 4 months before Pearl Harbor (renewal of the Selective Service Act).

Through the "loyal opposition" Wendell Willkie set himself up as a kind of immovable fulcrum on which the administration could set its wartime levers. There was never any "alliance" between Franklin Roosevelt and Wendell Willkie—rumors of this were fabrications of a hostile press. Nevertheless, while attacked by the Willkie people on his foreign policy, Mr. Roosevelt astutely understood that Mr. Willkie would fight the isolationist at any political cost, and he learned to lean heavily on his shaggy opponent whenever the life-and-death issues of the Nation were involved. The result was that from 1940 through 1944 the United States came closer to having a truly national government than in any of the other major crises in its history. Lincoln had McClellan to cope with; Wilson had Lodge. Franklin Roosevelt's opponent, however, undertook to combat the destructive forces which always do appear in a crisis, and against which Mr. Roosevelt could have battled only at the risk (which Wendell Willkie took upon himself) of losing all.

That this struggle cost Mr. Willkie his life, there can be no reasonable doubt. Almost nobody really knows the magnitude of the load that he had to carry. Some people know the load that he carried at the office—the intense interviews, one pushing against the other; the incessant telephone calls ringing in from all parts of a continent; letters at the rate of thousands a day; requests for speeches at the rate of five or six hundred a month. Still others know the story of his mind, the probing of the future, the weighing of issues—the load of responsibility that his leadership entailed. Still others are familiar with the political load—the shrewd decisions, the granting of his support here, the raising of his opposition there, the rallying of forces at some far-distant point to undermine an entrenched isolationist. Each of his associates knows that particular part of the load he or she helped to carry. Almost no one knows it all.

But of course the biggest single load was the load of the party. On issue after issue he was forced to oppose his own people first. The list is long and massive: the destroyer deal and aid to Britain; selective service; lend-lease; the occupation of Iceland; the extension of selective service; the revision of the Neutrality Act; increased aid to Russia and China, and a better understanding of those essential partners; the definition of war aims; the drive for an international organization with power to act. On all these, and more, he had to overcome the Republican leaders before he could challenge his official opponent, Franklin Roosevelt, on the real, the far-reaching issues of America's destiny.

And in the end the party was his undoing. The motto for his life might be "Et tu, Brute"; for it was the desertion of self-styled friends and associates that hastened, if it did not actually cause, his death. He was not disillusioned by these desertions; he was shrewd enough to know that few men are capable of sacrificing their own interests for the principles that they profess. But he was practical enough to see that each defection from the cause merely added to the impossible load that he was carrying. Immediately before and after the nomination of Thomas E. Dewey, when hundreds of professed "One Worlders" were yielding to the forces of political expediency, the tragic little scene was reenacted almost every day: "Why, so-and-so was one of the best friends I had in the world. He went all out for the limitation of sovereignty. How can he do this now?" The complaint was not merely personal. It was the complaint of a giant dedicated to a cause which he recognized as greater than himself: a cause that was too big to carry all alone.

VI

Wendell Willkie has won more since his death than he won during his lifetime. The San Francisco Conference convened—as he advocated, and as the administration promised in the campaign of 1944—before the end of hostilities. A United Nations Organization has been created and is now offered to the peoples of the world for their ratification. Above all, the spirit of America has changed. We are no longer hanging back. The power of public opinion in the United States has become—as Wendell Willkie always believed it would—the greatest single force working for international action.

Yet this is after all only the first battle of the peace. The real objectives of one world lie far ahead of us, and the constant danger is that we shall fall short of those objectives without realizing it. There is here involved a point that gave Mr. Willkie endless difficulty. Because both Roosevelt and Willkie had an international view, people carelessly assumed that they were in agreement on foreign policy. The assumption was encouraged by the isolationist press seeking to embarrass Mr. Willkie. Yet the foreign policy of one world is very different from the foreign policy promulgated by the White House in the critical years. The Roosevelt administration was internationally-minded: it was not one world-minded. And in this regard the Truman administration is still a question mark.

The difference lies in a definition of American interests. The Roosevelt administration always tended to fall off in the direction of power politics, or what Mr. Willkie called "expediency," with the idea that our interests could best be served by entering into the old game of balance and control. As a practical man, Wendell Willkie knew well enough that power politics cannot be entirely excluded from the affairs of mankind, whether at the personal, the occupational, the national, or the international level. He believed in strong men—and strong nations.

Yet he insisted that the United States must rise above the level of power politics, as the term is generally understood, in those critical situations in which the future destiny of men is at stake. The United States, he believed, must represent not merely a power but a doctrine. Specifically, it must represent the doctrine on which this Nation was founded, in which we have always believed, and through which alone our long-range interests can be served—the doctrine of indivisible freedom, the very core of one world.

The weakness of our present position in world affairs is that the other great powers are far more certain of their aims than we. But why are they more certain? It is because we have failed to declare, because we have failed strongly to assert, this doctrine of freedom—the only doctrine in which we, as Americans, can believe. In a game of power politics the American people will never have clear aims, because they seek no goal that power politics can win. That game is merely a means of evading the fundamental issues of the world, which Americans must eventually meet if they are to survive on their own terms of freedom. Insofar as we indulge in it, we fail to work for our own ultimate survival.

Therefore, while it is true that since Mr. Willkie's death we have made great progress, have indeed won in the first battle in the struggle for one world, we must be careful not to make the same error that so many made during his lifetime. We must be careful not to confuse a well-meaning internationalism, based on "cooperation" between wholly sovereign powers, with the great vision embodied in the doctrine of one world. The former was achieved to the credit of all concerned at San Francisco; the latter still lies before us demanding the lifelong labor and devotion of those who understand what it means. But what was merely a hope when Wendell Willkie was alive has now, with the atomic bomb, become a necessity.

The danger is that, having achieved so much, we shall lapse into self-satisfied contemplation of our own progress. This danger was well illustrated in the recent Syrian affair. In that unhappy incident we permitted ourselves to be dragged down to the level of sheer power politics by giving our unqualified backing to Great Britain in a struggle for empire in the Middle East. And simultaneously, by refusing to back De Gaulle in his demand for an international conference on Middle Eastern affairs (to include both Russia and the Arabs), we failed to represent the doctrine of freedom as Americans know it. We had, of course, good and "expedient" reasons for giving a blank check to Britain. Yet we had similar reasons for setting up the appeaser Darlan in 1942—and against that move Mr. Willkie thundered with all his might. The fact is that, in Syria, we muffed an opportunity to take a first step in the formulation of an American world policy that would work to our interst. As a result, we still stand before the world without any real policy of our own.

One world is a proposed world policy, and it is genuinely American. During Mr. Willkie's lifetime we were not sufficiently developed as a people to give it our confidence, and the result was that Wendell Willkie died without witnessing the fruits of his labor. Yet in a profounder sense those fruits are not ripe even yet. If he were alive today, Mr. Willkie would be highly gratified by the enormous change in the American attitude—yet he would be the first to warn us against self-satisfaction.

Were he in the thick of political affairs, the overwhelming vote of the Senate in ratifying the United Nations Charter would constitute a personal victory for him in his struggle with his own party. Yet he would surely have pointed out the danger of leaving further progress to the Senate. For this we have his own words: "Unless * * * the people * * * of all the United Nations fundamentally agree on their purposes, fine, and idealistic expressions of hope such as those of the Atlantic Charter will live merely to mock us, as have Mr. Wilson's Fourteen Points. The "four freedoms" will not be accomplished by the declaration of those momentarily in power. They will become real only if the people of the world forge them into actually."

The era in which that actuality must be forged has now dawned. We must do it—or be destroyed. And to this end, those of us who have been indoctrinated into the principles and aims of One World will do well to remember Wendell Willkie's ordeal. For now it is our turn. In Wendell Willkie's death our cause has suffered a terrible loss. American leadership is still weak; our steps toward peace are still uncertain; the recognition of human liberty on a world-wide basis is a goal that lies far in the future, and between us and that goal rise many years of heartbreak. The responsibility for coping with all this now falls upon the shoulders of those who could once afford the luxury of waiting to see what Wendell Willkie would do. His ordeal is now ours.

Yet if we will also remember the nature of that struggle, we shall in the end, inevitably, succeed. For it is neither a struggle for power nor a struggle for office. It is a struggle that surpasses power and office, and therefore surpasses defeat. It is a struggle to realize the deepest aspirations of mankind. It is a struggle to raise above the earth a banner emblazoned with the battle cry: Freedom Is Indivisible.

And—as Wendell Willkie demonstrated—even to make this struggle is to win it.

All Palestine Should Not Suffer for the Crimes of a Few Terrorists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. CELLER. I am deeply shocked at the bombing of the King David Hotel in Jerusalem, which cost so many lives. Britons as well as Jews were killed. This violence is indeed regrettable. But the British themselves are not entirely blameless. The basis for this crime is the procrastination of the British in their failure to carry out their pledges to establish a Jewish national homeland in Palestine.

This catastrophe is clearly the work of a small number of desperadoes, a tiny fraction of the population of Palestine. The Jewish community as a whole and the Jewish Agency in particular have disowned and fought the members of the so-called Irgunists who are the culprits. Responsible Jews and Jews in authority in Palestine want no truck with these terrorists. I am happy to state that the Hagannah set up by the Jews with the aid of Britain to meet the pogroms of the Arabs has had nothing to do with the violence and bombing. This is admitted by the British. While we do not excuse such terrorism, we are aware that it arose out of what Britain did 3 weeks ago in suppressing and imprisoning Jewish leaders of responsibility and in raiding the constituted authority in Palestine—the Jewish Agency. The British thereby undermined public confidence. They had placed the terrorists on the same level with acknowledged and responsible leaders of the Jewish community. The British had thereby opened the door to anarchy. These desperadoes chose this particular moment to blow up the King David Hotel to create discontent with the constituted Jewish leaders and to bring about an armed revolt.

I urge the British Government not to go down the slippery path of vindictiveness and reprisal. We have seen how in many parts of the world irresponsible British force begat more force. Repression will inundate the Holy Land in a sea of blood. Forceful retaliation will injure British prestige everywhere and will alienate whatever Jewish friendship Britain has.

The following is a necessary program:

First. There must be a complete stoppage of force.

Second. All Jewish leaders must be freed and the Jewish authority restored.

Third. Concentration camps must be opened and several thousand Jewish prisoners freed.

Fourth. There must be a forthwith decision on the highest possible level to admit immediately into Palestine 100,000 Jews.

Such a program will restore confidence, together with hope and a constructive spirit. That is the only way peace can be achieved.

If President Truman's advice had been followed last year, Palestine would now be a flourishing and peaceful community. Jewish refugees now suffering agonies in Europe would have been saved and returned to normalcy. The Arabs by this time would have been reconciled. The entire world would have been freed from the distressing problem of a goodly portion of displaced persons.

Britain herself is well aware of the part she played in this tragedy. Nonetheless, we appeal to her not to destroy in Palestine the most constructive achievement of the Jewish people in modern times. She must not use this sorry event as a pretext to destroy the Jewish effort in Palestine or to slam shut the doors to refugees.

I counsel that the British take no vengeance. The American people will not be misled. They will not place the blame for this unhappy act of a few derelicts upon an entire peaceful people.

President Truman should pursue with all the power at his command the request for the admission of 100,000 Jews into Palestine. Despite this outrage in Jerusalem, there is no less justice for their admission now than when the President made the request a year ago.

RFC for Veterans

OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, on June 10, 1946, I introduced H. R. 6725. It was introduced on the same day by Representative KEARNEY, of New York, and in the Senate by Senator TUNNELL and a number of other Senators. I regret that it has not been possible to secure passage of this legislation at this session of Congress. In the event, however, that an extra session is called, the sponsors of the bill will ask that it be considered, and I am certain that when the Congress understands the importance and benefits to be gained from this legislation that it will pass without much objection being made to it.

The purpose of the bill is to promote maximum employment, business opportunities, and careers for veterans in a free economy. The idea is that veterans do not want special gratuities or hand-outs; they want to have businesses of their own. It is with this in mind that the Veterans of Foreign Wars and other veteran organizations have, after much study and consideration, decided to sponsor this measure.

Veterans' unemployment is the most serious problem confronting the Nation today. Not since Pearl Harbor have we faced more of an emergency. While the problem of veterans' unemployment is not as dramatic as Pearl Harbor, yet the speed and efficacy with which we meet this emergency now will determine, in the long run, whether we remain the most powerful nation on earth. The problem is just as simple as that, and the choice is ours.

It would require volumes to expound this situation in detail, but the urgency of doing something about it is so self-evident, we believe, that a simple statement of facts will suffice.

The emergency is alarming. Today there are far too many veterans who are unemployed. Believe it or not, but at this hour there are nearly 2,500,000 veterans who are claiming unemployment compensation. The number drawing unemployment compensation is expected to increase, as there are one million and a half more men who soon will be discharged from the armed services.

The tragedy of this army of unemployed veterans lies in the fact that the longer they remain idle and are obliged to receive relief, the less likely they are to succeed in competitive free enterprise when they do find work. It is a natural law that those who are unemployed are less likely to be employed profitably than those who are already employed, or those who are members of a well-organized program, such as that provided for in the bill I have introduced. Idleness brings evil consequences. We do not want to put malicious thoughts into anyone's head, but a shrewd demagog or charlatan could easily arouse this immature army of veterans to a point where there could easily be sown the seeds which could result in shaking the foundation of our society. Such a situation would harm the veterans and the country for generations to come. With millions of veterans having no jobs of any consequence, the sinister political implications could easily exceed the abuses of the Grand Army of the Republic following the Civil War. For the protection of the veterans, for their welfare and prosperity, and for the good of all the people, we must act now to guide this enormous new force into productive and profitable channels.

Regardless of optimistic predictions which anyone can possibly make about veterans being fully employed in the future, the cold, unpleasant facts to the contrary stare us directly in the face.

Veterans are already facing acute unemployment problems which will be further aggravated. The veterans are at a disadvantage because of their loss of job opportunities, job property rights, job seniority, experience, financial gain, and contacts suffered by them during their war service.

Because of the time which they have lost in war service, veterans will have greater difficulty getting into and staying in business than the average businessman and professional person. Seven million veterans have no reemployment rights under the law. Of these, 4,000,000 had no occupation of any consequence before they entered military service, and have no particular job to return to now. There are more than 350,000 disabled veterans of World War II who have registered for employment but cannot find it. However, experience shows that the majority of disabled veterans can be trained in gainful competitive occupations if the economic opportunity is opened for them.

The cruel irony of the veterans' unemployment situation is that there is a wide open gap in our economic machine which could be filled by the veterans. We have modern plants, surplus equipment, and material which were developed during wartime, and only 50 percent of those plants are now being utilized. To win World War II we created the arsenal of democracy. Are we going to let this arsenal of democracy, now adaptable for peace, slip away from us by allowing it to go to waste? Paradoxically, at the same time, we have backlogs and shortages of consumer and durable goods which will not be supplied for years. Furthermore, we have an unprecedented demand for American goods and services throughout the world which staggers the imagination. Yet we allow to slip through our fingers this greatest opportunity in the history of America to increase our prosperity, and to raise further the standard of living.

We have untold natural resources within the continental limits of the United States that are still untapped and not developed. We have more than 11,000,000 acres of good land yet to be opened up. In some of our possessions we have hardly scratched the surface to develop the natural wealth to create employment. For example, take Alaska. Veterans who have served in Alaska, or who know of Alaska, would like to go there to develop its natural wealth, business, and industry. In that vast Territory there are only 40,064 whites and 32,458 aborigines. Alaska has more natural resources than does Scandinavia, and a better climate than does Scandinavia, yet in a smaller area the Scandinavian countries support 12,000,000 people.

Alaska needs only a business program to push its economy off dead center. A program of industrial, business, and trade development sponsored by the Veterans' Corporation would start the ball rolling. Who are better suited to this challenging job than our veterans who have already won tougher battles in war than the economic battles of Alaska? Let us return again to new opportunities for veterans in our 48 States and possessions.

We have hundreds of thousands of enemy patents, processes, and trade secrets which we captured at good cost in lives, blood, and sweat. Who are most entitled to the benefit of this new stock in trade? Is it the large corporations or monopolies that do not need them, or should the veterans have first call on these business and professional assets?

Is it not the first duty of the Congress and of the Nation to help the veterans to recapture the losses which they suffered during the formative years of their lives, in business, finances, know-how, contacts, and other advantages which they would otherwise have acquired had they not served their country during time of war?

In that war of survival, 90 percent of our people relied upon the remaining 10 percent actually to fight their battle for them. With the return of the 10 percent who fought the battle and were not killed, shall we leave any stone unturned to make easier for them their progress into civil life?

Before the war we had a technological unemployment of several million persons in the general labor force. With the phenomenal technological wartime advancement in man-saving machines to replace workers gone to war, we will now produce increasingly more and more peacetime products and utilize fewer and fewer people. In this new postwar technological unemployment the veterans will be at a great disadvantage. During the recessions and depressions between World War I and World War II, there were as many as 1,500,000 veterans on the relief rolls at one time. With three times as many veterans of World War II as of World War I, it is clear that the inevitable cycle of boom and bust will make more than three times as many World War II veterans unemployed. In the boom, veterans, as a group, will be the last to profit. And in a bust the veterans will be the first to suffer unless we take action now.

Suitable jobs and economic opportunity are the principal desires and needs of the veterans. They do not want charity. Unemployment compensation and bonuses are sought only when opportunities are not available. At best, veterans' unemployment compensation and bonuses are only temporary palliatives. These measures, according to present estimates, will cost the taxpayers $40,000,000,000, whereas experience in projects similar to the Veterans' Corporation, indicates that the Veterans' Corporation would otherwise save the taxpayers many millions of dollars. Furthermore, the Veterans' Corporation would be an economic asset to the Nation to assure an ever-expanding economy.

Now that we have reviewed briefly the need of the Veterans' Employment and National Economic Development Corporation, let us examine the way in which the Veterans' Corporation will attain its objectives. Two years of intensive study, research, and a wealth of experience have gone into the drafting of this legislation by authorities in Government, veterans' affairs, labor, industrial engineering, trade, economics, shipping, and foreign trade.

The proposed Veterans' Corporation is charged specifically with solving veterans' short-range and long-range problems without displacing other workers. And we emphasize—without displacing other workers. In fact, the very nature of the projects contemplated would provide employment and business for others as well as veterans. The Veterans' Corporation would create jobs and economic opportunity through loaning powers and technical services to self-liquidating projects, established businesses that can employ additional veterans in agreement with existing labor contracts, and new businesses that will employ veterans. And naturally, the Corporation will make loans and give technical advice to veterans themselves who are qualified to conduct a business.

The passage of this bill is immediately necessary and urgent as no other agency can perform these exact functions.

The Veterans' Corporation, like the Smaller War Plants Corporation or the RFC, would not compete with private banks, but would help them indirectly. Like the RFC, the Veterans' Corporation would make loans in areas where private banking is not interested in operating. The Veterans' Corporation, like the RFC, is not designed to make money, but like the RFC will not lose money. It will thus, by creating gainful employment for veterans in a competitive free enterprise, save the taxpayers many billions of dollars that would otherwise be paid to unemployed veterans.

To attain the objectives of this program, the Corporation will loan money at 4 percent, and the Treasury will obtain the money at much lower rates of interest thus providing an ample spread to defray all costs of administration and operation. It can, therefore, be seen that neither the Government nor the taxpayers will bear any part of the cost of this important program.

Let us consider for a moment how our veterans can strengthen our world position and help to prevent World War III by peaceful means.

After other American wars, the veterans have opened new frontiers. The veterans who returned from the War of 1812 opened up the plains beyond St. Louis. Veterans of the Civil War built western railroads and developed the mountain valleys along the Pacific seaboard. The veterans of World War II have no remaining frontier in the old sense. But they have a far greater frontier in the new sense—a business frontier, a technological frontier, an industrial frontier, and a vast new frontier in overseas trade. However, no frontier has ever developed without some sort of Federal assistance. Could our veterans prevent World War III? Let us examine the possibility of our veterans preventing World War III.

Among the features of the bill are provisions to enable veterans to trade abroad to supply the great new demand for American goods and services. They have helped liberate many of the countries where they can now trade. They can promote friendship and confidence in countries such as China, Korea, the Philippines, India, Iraq, Iran, Turkey, and France. As an example of how the Veterans' Corporation could strengthen the United Nations, consider the case of China. The Government of China is now interested in having our discharged veterans, who are capable of serving as technical and business missionaries, to aid in the modernization and economic strengthening of their country. In China and other countries that are open to Americans and to our veterans, we can open vast new and perpetuating markets for American goods and services. This will create fuller employment for veterans and for all American workers, businessman, and professional people. This peaceful economic approach to China and to other countries would eliminate promptly many of the serious trouble centers and secure the peace.

Who knows? The fate of our Nation may well rest with our decisions now. High military authorities state that peace will not last 10 years unless we strengthen our position in this breathing spell to engineer a permanent world structure for security. Our foreign observers are disturbed and report that the United States faces a dilemma. Many soldiers are returning disillusioned; in most cases the ver- nations they helped to free are now fearful that we are going to let them down by not assisting them with our technical know-how in modernization. It is a dangerous phenomenon. Our money alone will not buy the respect and support of other nations.

It is predicted by many authorities on world affairs that the United States may abdicate its present world leadership. The eyes of the world are upon us in peace as they were in the recent global war of survival. The 45 smaller members of the United Nations look to us as their main hope.

In the course of history every nation preceding us attained world leadership, reached its zenith, and then subsequently lost its position of leadership. We can demonstrate to the world that we can retain our leadership in peace as we did in war. If we put our own house in order promptly, we are more likely to continue that world leadership that we retained during this war at such a frightful cost of lives, blood, sweat, tears, and treasure.

Our veterans who went to war and who fought the battles were trained and equipped by the best organizational methods known to modern science. That organizational genius gave us the Army, Navy, Air Force, tools, and strength of atomic power beyond the capacities of any other people. Now our veterans have earned their right to benefit from this same organized procedure for reestablishing a prosperous peace.

Through the benefits of the Veterans' Corporation, the veterans of our wars are privileged to participate in strengthening the United States which in turn will strengthen the United Nations organization to wipe out the scourge of war. The veterans, therefore, can make a great contribution in developing our economic relations with the peoples of the world to knit together a friendly fabric in exchange of trade and ideas. Who are better equipped by training, overseas experience, patriotism, and travel to reach these objectives for the United Nations organization than the 20,000,000 living veterans of our wars?

Our veterans will be numbered among the leaders of the next generation and can become the backbone of the Nation. Our veterans are selected from the cream of the crop of 140,000,000 people. Physically, psychologically, and educationally they are the finest essence of our people.

Yet after World War I most veterans required two decades to find themselves. We can turn our national clock ahead and avert this unhappy time loss for veterans of World War II by utilizing profitably our veteran human resources now. The development of a favorable climate of opportunity for the 4,000,000 veterans who have heretofore not been employed, or have no particular job to return to, now constitutes in itself a specific problem in which the Senate and the House are vitally interested as well as the families of the veterans.

The science of organization is one of the many unique contributions America has given the world in war and in peace for the benefit of mankind. Organization and the spirit of our people won the war. If we apply this same genius for organization and business enterprise promptly to assist our veterans in their assimilation into civil life, it will prove to be our Nation's best insurance. This program will go far in securing our economic stability. This program will assure an ever-expanding prosperity; and it may secure the peace of the world. This program will demonstrate to our fellow Americans and to the world that our free enterprise, that our form of democracy, and that the great American experiment in government is successful.

Veterans' Administrator, General Bradley, said in addressing the thirty-first annual convention of Kiwanis International:

> Four million veterans will be unemployed next fall unless new jobs continue to be created.

The Administrator said also:

> It is time we stopped indulging in the sacrifices of veterans and worked harder instead to fulfill their wants. It is time we took stock of the promises we made while they were still overseas. The Veterans' Administration with its GI provisions can offer only a narrow foothold to veterans. Although jobs are the No. 1 issue, our Administration is limited to helping veterans with only training for jobs.

The Veterans' Employment and National Economic Development Corporation Act is the answer to General Bradley's alarming statement. It is our direct interest to veterans and to all our people in every community to pass this legislation in the Seventy-ninth session of the Congress. This program will be of no expense to the taxpayers. On the contrary, it will reduce the taxes as it will reduce the cost of government and reduce the billions of dollars paid to idle veterans.

What we then find by experience that we can do with veterans, we can do for all the people. This program can well serve as the pilot operation in profitable and practical social engineering, and one of the most important milestones in human history.

The Veterans' Employment and National Economic Development Corporation would thus open up for unemployed veterans, and veterans without much hope, many gainful career opportunities. Moreover, the benefits of this Corporation for veterans' employment will in turn open a new segment in our economy, and stimulate increased prosperity for all Americans, and fortify by peaceful means our national security.

Address Before National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a speech I made before the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs in Cleveland, Ohio, on July 8, 1946:

This convention is an example of democracy at work. It is more particularly a most impressive example of the acceptance by women of their responsibility as citizens—to think constructively and to make their thinking articulate.

Citizenship is without sex. It makes no distinction between the rights and responsibilities of men and women. Since the granting of suffrage to women the only differential between men and women as citizens has been the availability and acceptance of leadership.

Some claim that the availability of leadership to women has been unfairly limited. I have no sympathy with this view because it is only those who "make the breaks" that "get the breaks." In other words, to increase the availability of leadership, we must by our own actions create and force that increased availability. If we are to claim and win our rightful place in the sun on an equal basis with men then we must not insist upon those privileges and prerogatives identified in the past as exclusively feminine.

To some extent, women have made the "breaks" for greater leadership opportunities. Especially is this the cas in their superb performance in many fields during the war. Their contribution to the war was far beyond anything that anyone had even hoped for. Even the hardest cynics now acclaim their performance.

But now the challenge to women is to match their amazing wartime record with the battles for peace and the orderly reconversion to normal living. While their war records will be difficult to match, they are far better equipped for the task of winning the peace because they possess certain abilities and understanding of matters basic to peace that men do not possess.

Dirigo—"I lead"—is the motto on the official emblem of my own State of Maine. Women of this Republic could well adopt it as their motto. The question is, Where can they exert leadership. The answer is, Everywhere: (1) in the home as wives and mothers, (2) in organized civic, business, and professional groups such as your own, (3) in industry and business, both management and labor, (4) in public offices, such as legislatures and schools, (5) in politics, and (6) as public citizens.

Perhaps the most lasting and basic influence of women is in the home for behind all men, great or small, are women. This might appear too obvious for mention. But it is too often that we overlook the obvious. Can the dynamic influence of Eleanor Roosevelt be denied when you compare the respectful number of women appointments in the Roosevelt administration to the almost complete absence of such appointments in the Truman administration?

For lasting world peace, the wives and mothers in all nations must get together for a common understanding—in like manner the business and professional women. I am confident that the women of the world will reach a real and genuine understanding, if given the means of communication and personal exchange, far more satisfactorily than men have yet been able to.

The fight for decent conditions in communities, for improvements in food, housing, school, recreation, and health facilities, must come from the women of the home—the wives and the mothers. Yes, even the critical fight against disastrous inflation, black markets, and uncontrolled price rises must be led by the housewives. If necessary, they should be the leaders of a buyers' strike—those who have the courage to refuse to buy at unreasonable and profiteering prices.

Much, if not most, of the past leadership of women in this country has come through civic organizations and through organizations such as your own. It would be unnecessary and presumptuous for me to elaborate on this type of opportunity of leadership. Yet, I do want to take this occasion to urge you and your organization to continue your splendid contribution to women's leadership, and to urge you to extend your beneficial influence as widely as possible.

Women, such as you, individually can provide leadership in industry and business. You have already proved your leadership ability in the field of management. But there is a discouraging dearth of women leaders in the field of labor and labor relations. Women constitute a great part of the labor force. If there is any one way that labor unions can improve themselves, and members benefit it is to have more women labor leaders, qualified for their jobs.

The Government is no more important than the home, just as the home is no more important than the Government—both can control and influence the other, both are dependent upon each other. But in the past the women have permitted the balance to swing too heavily to the Government's influence over the home rather than having the home exercise its proper influence over the Government.

How can this be remedied? By taking a greater interest in our greatest investment, our biggest business—our Government—in seeking and accepting public office. In this way women can bring the wholesome viewpoint and influence of the home more directly into the formulation and administration of Government policy.

In the schools as educators women have and will continue to instill in coming generations the very will to peace and the very necessary guards to insure that peace.

Women fought for the right to vote. They won this battle, but they haven't followed through. They do not take the proper advantage of their voting privilege. With one-half of the population, women could easily become the most powerful single group in the electorate.

In other words, women should become more politically minded, regardless of party. They should be conscientious voters. They should develop the incentive and perseverance to organize politically into articulate groups that espouse their views, opinions, and desires on vital issues, and independently of party affiliation.

They should be workers and officials in political parties in influencing the platforms of the parties, in getting out the maximum vote, in demanding strict administration adherence to platform promises, in stimulating women to vote and be active, and in demanding only the proper representation of women based upon population and degree of public, both political and civic, activity. They should seek public office, and their appointments to high Government positions should be vigorously advocated, supported, and even forced by organized groups whether political or nonpolitical like yours.

All of these phases of activity are summed up in the observation that women must give greater meaning to their role of public citizens. For the protection of the family, the basic principles for governing a wholesome family life should be emulated to a greater degree in the administration of our Government. The basic principles of our Government should stem from the home. In one sense of the word, the United States Government is really one big family—the all-American family.

American women have reason to be proud of what they have done so far in influencing greater participation by women of other nations in their governments. An American-educated woman of China, Madame Chiang Kai-shek, has led the political emancipation of the women of China. Japanese women, under our occupation of that country, have been given the right to vote and hold office and are emulating American women by seeking and obtaining public office in Government places such as the Japanese Diet. This in itself is the greatest promise against future Japanese war lords. It is a shining example of how women can make the most effective contribution to the enforcement of a lasting peace by becoming leaders in their own nation and then graduating to the roles of leaders of the world.

It is regrettable that so few women have been chosen to participate in the UN, and that none sit as members of the Security Council. It is amazing when one realizes that women constitute at least one-half of the world's population.

But this can be attributed to women themselves for lack of interest and aggressiveness—and the will to public careers—in this and other countries. We can't become leaders of the world until we have become leaders within our own Nation. Our influence upon others must come from within ourselves individually. In as great a measure, our influence, as a Nation upon the rest of the world in creating and maintaining permanent peace, must first flow from within this country.

"Jim" Stuart (James A. Stuart) Editorializes on the Atomic Bomb

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, recent discussion in the House and in the Senate in connection with pending legislation for control of the atom serves to recall some editorials in August 1945 on the subject of the atomic bomb and the limitless possibilities in the use of the atom—in the use of the energy of the atom in war and also in the pursuits of peace. This pending bill is highly controversial and it is not now my purpose to discuss the proposed legislative procedure in connection with this new development in the history of man.

It is sufficient to say that the use of the atomic bomb in bringing World War II to a final end back in August 1945 marks the ending of one period in the history of civilization. It also marks the beginning of a new era in the conquest which man has waged to conquer the impossible. The dreams of men in ages past were realized when the Government of the United States harnessed the atom. The ending of one phase of man's existence was accomplished when the atomic bomb was successfully used. The important date, of course, was August 5, 1945, when the military forces of the United States dropped an atomic bomb on Hiroshima in the Empire of Japan and destroyed that city. This history-making episode was followed by the use of the atomic bomb with deadly effect on Nagasaki, Japan, and this city was destroyed on August 9, 1945.

Thousands of columns of news stories and editorials were written by the ablest news and editorial writers in our country, describing these events and philosophizing on what they meant to the future of the world. Among those who took a hand in the discussion following the use of the atomic bomb was James A. Stuart, commonly known as Jim Stuart, editorial writer of the Duluth News Tribune, of Duluth, Minn. Mr. Stuart is rated one of the best and outstanding men in his profession. He is a modest man, but those who associate with him recognize his ability, his learning, and his high standing in the newspaper world.

As I have said, a great deal was written about the atomic bomb following its first use on August 5, 1945. History was being made and those who contributed to the literature on the subject was my fellow townsman, James A. Stuart. While others wrote with interest, none excelled Mr. Stuart in his contribution to the current discussion and editorial comment.

THE ATOM: MASTER OR SERVANT?

Mr. Stuart's first editorial on this subject appeared in the Duluth News Tribune, of Duluth, Minn., for Friday, August 10, 1945, as follows:

During the last several years, as news leaked out concerning the attempts to break the atom and harness its energy, at times we have discussed, in the abstract, its potentials. The only conclusion reached, lacking the information as to what was actually being done, or actually found, was that the possibilities of the atom were limitless. And that does not begin to express it.

Now atomic development has actually begun. It has been harnessed to the extent that its destructive potential has actually been put to use. No doubt this destructive potential will be looked upon in a few years as a mere hint of the power available.

That is, if its use in war does not eliminate the human race.

The great question now facing the world is: Will it be master or servant?

But, with the development of the atom begun—and we cannot tell how rapidly it will progress—we venture the prediction that an absolutely new era is opening, during which every idea of progress, business, perhaps health and human habits will have to be revised, and new adjustments made. The possibilities will turn into probabilities and many of them into actualities—perhaps very soon.

Power projects as we have them now, may be rendered worthless; gasoline for machine power may be outlawed, for harnessed atomic energy can be used to operate every vehicle in the streets or on the right-of-way in all countries of the globe, every ship on every sea, and every plane in every sky.

Atomic energy can be utilized in the growing of crops, can be made to control the weather; heat houses, thereby doing away with the present essentials of heat; operate every known contrivance, and make life easier for the housewife and even make the hobbies of men and women more enjoyable, as well as less costly, with the time to indulge them.

Even the many things predicted as coming following the reconversion from war, many of which, under present situations cannot be, may become possibilities or better. Reduced cost of living, greater ease, more leisure, and other economic changes will present problems to our Government and our industrialists for adjustment. The changes will be radical; and, if rapid, will be staggering. Secretary of War Stimson says the development will be slow. How does he know?

Some will still declare such forecasts delusions; but the same was said of the railroads, the steamboats, the telephones, even after they were actualities; and you will recall the story of the farmer and the giraffe. Also there are lots of people who "can't see the forest for the trees."

It is not my purpose to go into a laudatory discussion of the quality of Mr. Stuart's masterpieces. His editorials speak for themselves and the next time he discussed this subject was in the Duluth News Tribune for Sunday, August 19, 1945, in which the following editorial appeared:

COMMENTS

(By Jim Stuart)

This selection from Watchers of the Sky, by Alfred Noyes, should need little or no explanation or comment, in view of the world-shaking revelation of August 6, 1945, re: The atomic bomb. Its potentials as a servant of man are forgotten in considering its might as a slayer of man. In the following, Galileo's daughter is represented as writing from her convent to a friend:

He made his telescope;
And O, how vividly that day comes back,
When in their gorgeous robes the Senate stood
Beside him on that high Venetian tower,
Scanning the bare blue sea that showed no speck
Of sail. Then, one by one, he bade them look;
And one by one they gasped, "a miracle."
Brown sails and red, a fleet of fishing boats.

Whereat old senators, wagging their white beards,
And plucking at golden chains with stiff old claws
Too feeble for the sword-hilt, squeaked at once:
"This glass will give us great advantages
In time of war."

War, war, O God of love,
Even amidst their wonder at Thy world,
Dazed with new beauty, gifted with new powers,
These old men dreamed of blood.

War was the dream
That filmed those old men's eyes. They did not hear
My father, when he hinted at the hope
Of opening up the heavens for mankind
With that new power of bringing far things near.

There certainly is an excuse for us to gloat somewhat over the new weapon with which to conquer our enemies, for the object is to put in effect the ideal that all men must be treated as equals, none forced to accept isms they do not believe in, and each to be free to live and earn his honest due. But the words of the poet are worth absorbing, for not all peoples of the earth are as altruistic as we. The lust for power, even the passion for killing still exists in too many places. Man's instincts need restraint.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the friends of Mr. Stuart all agree that his best editorial is found in the Duluth News Tribune for August 26, 1945, wherein he tunes in with the spiritual possibilities and quotes from the Book of Revelations. Mr. Stuart's editorial on this reads as follows:

COMMENTS

(By Jim Stuart)

"I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea." That's from Revelations, by St. John the Divine, and to be found, if you wish direction, in the Great Book from which we often quote.

We were reminded of it by two things, recently: The atomic bomb, for one, for we believe it is the introductory chapter to a completely new world. It may be some time in coming, and it may come so fast that we will prove unprepared for it. The other reminder was a letter from Dana Akers, of Superior, complimenting us on our editorial of August 10, on The Atom: Master or Servant? Mr. Akers said that he had always believed that "a new earth" would be brought about by scientific research and discovery.

So it struck us that if ever the verse we have quoted from Revelations is to have any sense, which, without interpretation, little of Revelations has, now is the time. The trouble with the book, which some scholars consider great and others look upon as rather daffy, is its interpretations are wide enough and different enough to fill a record world library of their own. Which furnishes us with one ground for doubt as to the value of Revelations. If it was for public consumption and human guidance, what was the point in making it so mysterious, so fraught with chances for misdirection, so loaded with bases for controversy? That does not make sense.

But there may be a good deal in the Akers' suggestion. If what we look upon as the possibilities are half true—and the chances are we have not even scratched the surface—it will be a new world, and, we hope, a better one. It may hold possibilities so awful that no human being powerful enough to use it will dare the consequences. Which would mean the end of war. If there is anything in prayer, let's indulge and talk straight in our prayers. Maybe God is at last moving in the "mysterious ways His wonders to perform." But which way, and with what effect on mankind—self-control or self-elimination?

BIKINI REPEATS LAST YEAR'S PERFORMANCE

It seems appropriate, Mr. Speaker, to pay tribute at this time to Mr. Stuart, whose editorials demonstrate his profound grasp of the significance of the atomic bomb. On June 30, 1946, our time, another atomic bomb was exploded at Bikini; followed today, July 24, 1946, our time, with another atomic bomb experiment in that far-away place. Thus would the recent vehement arguments in the House of Representatives over the procedure to be followed in the control of atomic energy blend with the realism of future warfare possibilities if the United States for the third time in history is called on to save the world from despotism, tyranny, terror, plunder, atheism, and the hordes of evil. Let us hope that people like Mr. Stuart, and my able colleagues who just recently discussed the atomic-bomb problems, and those people and those organizations dedicated to world peace, may convince some rulers on this globe that what is good for billy goats can be used by this country in the interests of peace.

Motor Equipment for Disabled Veterans

OF

HON. EDWARD O. McCOWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. McCOWEN. Mr. Speaker, I am speaking today in the interest of H. R. 6304 by Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I desire to urge the immediate passage of this bill which was introduced in the House May 3, 1946. If this bill is to become a law in the Seventy-ninth Congress, there can be no further delay. The Congress will soon either recess or adjourn. Let us have action now.

To furnish a car at a $1,500 cost, with special equipment enabling a disabled veteran to drive it, is certainly no great thing to do for each one. When the large amounts of money voted by Congress to give to Britain—yes, I say to give to Britain, and to rehabilitate other foreign countries, is considered, is it not time to do something really helpful for the disabled veterans?

I need not enter into any lengthy argument for the furnishing of motor equipment for disabled veterans. The case needs no argument. If it did, it has already been well argued on the floor of the House by the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] and others. In my opinion, this is the least we can do for these veterans in the closing days of this Congress.

May I urge that many Members of this House get very active now to speed passage of this bill, H. R. 6304, in every way at the command of each. Petition No. 32 is on the Speaker's desk to bring the bill out of committee, if the committee does not act now.

THE SURPLUS PROPERTY DEBACLE

The failure of veterans generally to be able to get surplus property for their own use is a fact well known, and one that rightly causes the returned veterans from World War II to be keenly disappointed, to put it mildly. The administration that has been handling surplus property, or those who have control of that administration, are to be seriously criticized for the very poor service rendered by that agency. There are many things that this Congress could do that it has not yet done to benefit and help disabled veterans in particular, and other veterans as well.

Other United States Loans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, it was a surprise to me to learn the extent of foreign loans already made by the United States through the Export-Import Bank. Under permission given by the House, I place the following article from the July 24 number of the United States News:

UNITED STATES LOANS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Great Britain now gets a dollar loan of $3,750,000,000, of which $300,000,000 already has been advanced by the United States Treasury. This is the biggest of the United States loans abroad, but is by no means the whole story of this Government's foreign lending.

The United States Export-Import Bank, which has operated since 1934, is handling all other United States Government loans to foreign countries.

It has a lending authority of $3,500,000,000 and is likely to get another $1,250,000,000. It has paid out $1,054,682,938 in foreign loans, and credit lines still open to foreign borrowers total $1,956,172,019. Repayments amount to $327,483,634.

General Housing Bill

OF
HON. GEORGE E. OUTLAND
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. OUTLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement from the Washington Post of July 23, 1946:

THE WORST HOUSING IN UNITED STATES HISTORY NEEDS YOUR ATTENTION RIGHT NOW

It would be naive to presume that the passage of any one bill will effectively cure all of our housing problems, but we believe the Wagner-Ellender-Taft general housing bill, S. 1592, is a big step in the right direction, that it will help alleviate the situation and, therefore, should receive your favorable consideration right now.

We believe this bill is well planned and well advised. It is designed to end the crazy quilt of several Government housing agencies. It permits more low-income families to obtain decent homes. It provides more liberal loans for home ownership at lower interest rates, and extends the time of repayment. It provides protection against economic adversities at both individual and national levels. This bill is of such vital interest to the national welfare it deserves your attention right now.

We further believe that the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill * * * approved by the President * * * already passed by the Senate * * * now under study by the House Banking and Currency Committee should not be allowed to die during this session * * * thus postponing it another year. Such urgent legislation deserves action by the House Banking and Currency Committee and a vote by the House of Representatives * * * right now.

Please, gentlemen of the Seventy-ninth Congress * * * before you adjourn to go to your homes, find the time to vote on this measure which will help provide homes for others too.

St. Louis Post-Dispatch Pays Deserved Tribute to Retiring Member of House of Representatives, Hon. John J. Cochran, of St. Louis

OF
HON. WILLIAM R. THOM
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. THOM. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives is losing one of its most forceful and useful Members when the Honorable JOHN J. COCHRAN, of St. Louis, Mo., retires from this body with the end of this session.

Mr. COCHRAN has been in the forefront of many fights in the House for justice and public decency, and he quits at this time only to battle with disease which has so cruelly struck him down in the midst of his useful career.

For many months from a wheel chair, and with pains wracking his body, he remained on the floor of the House faithfully to represent his constituents, and his recent absence from debate and from the deliberations of the body is missed, I dare say, by every Member of the House, regardless of politics.

I am reproducing herewith excerpts from a recent editorial about him which appeared in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch:

TO MR. COCHRAN

It is at no risk of extravagant statement, we think, to say that JOHN J. COCHRAN, who withdrew yesterday from the primary, is just about the finest public servant Missouri has ever sent to Washington. He is held in admiration, affection, and esteem by men of all parties, creeds, and stations in life, and his seat in Congress, which he has held for 20 years, was secure for the remainder of his life.

Yet, typically, Mr. COCHRAN chose not to continue in public office. "I am not willing," he said, "to render part-time service to my country as a Member of Congress in this critical period, nor am I willing to let my present illness interfere with full and complete service to my district." There are many who wish he had not made this decision; who prefer to have Mr. COCHRAN even as their nominal representative. But that is not the Cochran ideal of public service.

In the last two decades, the redhead from Kerry Patch has compiled a record that should be an inspiration to all Members of Congress. He has ever been keenly alert to the needs of this community and to the State as a whole. Not only his constituents, but citizens from other congressional districts, placed upon him staggering burdens which he always performed promptly and cheerfully.

In national matters he has likewise distinguished himself. As chairman of the Committee on Accounts and as a member of the Committee on Expenditures, Mr. COCHRAN has saved the country many millions of dollars that otherwise would have been paid out in extravagance or graft. He was constantly vigilant, when phony claims were presented, to prevent raids upon the Treasury.

His voting record was consistently intelligent and progressive. He supported Mr. Roosevelt and the New Deal because it was instinctive of him to be for the common man and the underdog. His knowledge of Washington affairs was encyclopedic and many a newspaperman has been dependent upon Mr. COCHRAN for information about them.

His popularity has grown steadily. As far back as 1932, when all Members of the House from Missouri were elected at large, Mr. COCHRAN led the ticket. That term he was the only St. Louisian in Congress and represented the detailed interests of the whole city at the Capital. Last time he ran the Republican organization, knowing it was impossible to beat him, refused to back an opponent.

In the last few years, despite cruel suffering and the loss of both legs, Mr. COCHRAN has gallantly carried on. Now he feels he must retire and he has asked his district to support for his seat Frank M. Karsten, his able secretary.

A salute to JACK COCHRAN!

The Housing Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. SAVAGE
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, I would very much dislike to see Congress adjourn without first passing the Wagner-Taft-Ellender housing bill, which has already passed the Senate. This bill has cost the country thousands of dollars to reach its present stage and should now be passed by the House, notwithstanding the opposition of the eager real-estate lobby.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from today's Washington Post. This is another one of those splendid Post editorials which describes the situation in full:

HOUSING DELAY

The praiseworthy work done by the Senate in evolving a practicable long-range housing program now stands a good chance of being nullified by inaction of the House Banking and Currency Committee. The Senate passed the Wagner-Taft-Ellender bill on April 15 after a thorough study of means to combat the housing morass in which the country now finds itself. The House Banking and Currency Committee received the bill on April 16, yet the measure is still unreported, and only today is the committee belatedly resuming hearings.

Housing Administrator Wilson Wyatt ascribes the delay to powerful lobbies opposing the public-housing provisions of the bill. Several committee members apparently have fallen prey to these groups and have done their bidding in holding up action. This is not only another indication of the pernicious influence of lobbies in blocking worth-while legislation; it is also an indictment of the short-sighted self-interest which motivates the lobbies. They neglect the fact, as Mr. Wyatt points out, that nine-tenths of the bill is concerned with private housing which in the long run will benefit the very groups that are objecting to the proposal.

Essentially the Wagner-Taft-Ellender bill has a sixfold mission. First, it centralizes all the score-odd housing activities of the Federal Government under the leadership of a proposed national housing agency. Second, it seeks to promote home building by private individuals and concerns through more expansive loan and investment insurance and through the liberalization of loan terms. Third, it provides for governmental loans to localities for slum-clearance projects. Fourth, it sets up low-interest farm building loans through the Department of Agriculture. Fifth, it inaugurates a public-housing program of 125,000 units a year in a field in which returns are not sufficient to interest adequate private capital. Finally, it calls for additional technical research to be financed by the Government. By no rule can this plan be considered an infringement on the rights of private enterprise. On the contrary, it supplements private enterprise in resurrecting the country from a 17-year neglect to provide adequate housing for the American people. To oppose it on narrow grounds is to stymie the only broad constructive effort yet made to look to our present and future housing needs.

It is touch and go now whether the bill can be reported out in time for the House to pass it this session. But the effort is decidedly worth making. To allow it to lie over until the next session without an all-out attempt to enact it would be an inexcusable slight to millions of homeless and shabbily housed people who are looking to Congress to help them.

GI Terminal Pay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER A. LYNCH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks. I am including a letter from the Army Times. I have heretofore expressed the very decided view that terminal-leave pay for the enlisted man should be paid in cash, the same as commissioned officers. The letter follows and to my mind gives unanswerable arguments for the payment in cash:

ARMY TIMES,
Washington, D. C., July 22, 1946.
The Honorable WALTER A. LYNCH,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LYNCH: The proposal of the Senate Military Affairs Committee to pay accrued unused leave to enlisted and former enlisted personnel of the armed forces in nonnegotiable 5-year bonds instead of in cash, as voted overwhelmingly and unanimously by the House of Representatives on June 11, is in our opinion unnecessary, unjustified, and unfair.

The Senate Military Affairs Committee, in amending H. R. 4051, states that it seeks to lessen the inflationary effects of contemplated payments to enlisted and former enlisted personnel by providing for the issuance to them of 5-year, nonnegotiable, nontransferable bonds on which no loans can be obtained.

The report of the committee states that "sentiment has been widespread, both in the Congress and in the country, that justice and fairness require equality of treatment of officers and enlisted men with respect to their leave rights and benefits."

Nonetheless, the committee failed utterly to provide that equality of treatment when it recommended that payment of the obligation to enlisted and former enlisted personnel be, in effect, postponed for 5 years.

Terminal-leave pay to officers was justified during and since the close of World War II under the provisions of an act of May 8, 1874, which authorized "in the discretion of the Secretary of War" leave of absence without deduction in pay or allowances up to a maximum of 120 days. Pay for unused leave has been made to officers in cash.

For Congress to countenance, on the one hand, the removal of price controls; substantially higher wages in Government, industry, and the armed forces; reduction of taxes, increased public works spending; and then defer for 5 years—through the issuance of nonnegotiable bonds—pay for earned, but unused leave to enlisted and former enlisted personnel on the grounds that it lessens the dangers of inflation is, in our opinion, indefensible. It is neither economically sound nor morally justifiable.

Terminal leave pay is not a bonus, either for officers or enlisted personnel. It is not a wage increase. It is not a sop to politics. It is a debt now owed to the enlisted and former enlisted personnel of the armed forces. It was earned in the same way that officers earned the leave for which they were paid in cash upon separation. It was earned in large part on the battlefronts and under other wartime conditions that made it impossible for earned leave to be used as earned.

There is justification for paying officers for unused leave in cash, and there is the same justification for paying enlisted and former enlisted personnel in cash. There is a very real justification for treating officers and men alike.

While the enlisted personnel of the services was earning the terminal leave pay which they have not received, civilians patriotically poured billions of dollars into negotiable war bonds, and today are cashing in those bonds at will.

During the war the officers and enlisted personnel of the services also poured a huge percentage of their earnings—especially while fighting overseas—into war bonds, and unless the terminal leave pay so long overdue to enlisted personnel is paid in cash, they, too, may have to cash in their war bonds. Payment of terminal leave in cash will not adversely affect the Nation's economy any more than the day-to-day cashing in of war bonds by civilians and former service personnel.

The committee agrees that sentiment in favor of granting terminal leave to enlisted personnel is widespread. The fact that 380 members of the House of Representatives voted unanimously to make payment for unused leave in cash is further evidence of that sentiment. To substitute a 5-year nonnegotiable bond-payment plan at this late date is inequitable in the extreme and makes a mockery of the committee's own statement that justice and fairness require "equality of treatment."

If terminal leave pay is to benefit enlisted and former enlisted men, it should place the money in their hands when they need it most; that is, in the first crucial months of readjustment to civil life—not 5 years from now when they will have had time to reestablish themselves. Certainly if they are paid in bonds, such bonds should be negotiable war bonds.

If Congress is to place enlisted men on "equality of treatment" with officers—as the committee sets forth—then provision should be made for payment in cash. That is the form in which officers have been and are being paid, and it is not recalled that the President, the Budget Bureau or the Congress made any comments on the inflationary aspects of such payments.

Apart from the equities of the case—and there are many—it should be realized that not all enlisted and former enlisted men would spend their terminal leave pay immediately upon receipt of it. Those who have no real need will bank the money, or otherwise save or invest it. Furthermore, cash payment will result in considerable reduction of Federal disbursements for unemployment compensation by making it unnecessary for many former enlisted men to claim jobless pay.

It is hoped very earnestly that the members of the Senate and the House will give consideration to the justice and the equity of the points outlined above. We would very much appreciate receiving from you an expression of your opinion on the merits of the case for payment in cash instead of 5-year, nonnegotiable, nontransferable bonds, for publication in an early issue of Army Times.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD G. STAGG,
Editor.

Tribute to Hon. Burton K. Wheeler, of Montana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON OF COLORADO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 24 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, politics is a hard, heartless, treacherous experience. Loyalty and gratitude take easy flights in this cruel game. A good illustration is the defeat of BURTON K. WHEELER at the hands of the very men in Montana for whom he has dedicated his life. Senator WHEELER throughout his whole hectic political career has championed the cause of the persecuted, the minority, and the helpless. For them he created powerful political enemies. Nevertheless, they turned on him and in the spirit of reckless crusade destroyed him. In today's Times-Herald George E. Sokolsky in his column These Days analyzes and comments wisely on the Montana election. I ask unanimous consent to insert this excellent editorial in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THESE DAYS

(By George E. Sokolsky)

Few men will be more missed in the United States Senate than Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, for his experience has been great, his integrity beyond question, and his understanding of national and international questions of the highest order. He has served with distinction and competence for nearly 24 years and in a world distracted by vulgarity and cheapness in high places, he stands a monument to the finest American traditions.

WHEELER is opposed to war. The very radicals and liberals who have fought him this year used to regard him as a veritable Solomon of wisdom and an outstanding and pristine liberal whom they lauded with paeans of praise as they now besmirch his name with the ugliest of smears. Certainly history has already established the purposeless horrors of World War I. It was a futile, useless war which only served to pave the way for World War II.

It wrecked Europe, brought a fierce depression upon this country and paved the way for fascism and communism. It destroyed many monarchies but did not really establish democracies. Instead, it made possible the careers of the three most evil men in history, Stalin, Hitler, and Mussolini in the order named.

WHEELER was opposed to World War II. But he was no longer regarded as a liberal, for he had remained a believer in democracy, which is an offensive word to those who have succumbed to Communist propaganda in support of a totalitarian state.

He recognized the New Deal as a confused and embryonic American imitation of European totalitarianism. Always a true liberal, he supported the New Deal only as far as it conformed to democratic traditions.

He fought valiantly on the floor of the Senate for democracy and American idealism; therefore he was smeared by this bund of acid throwers and nightsoil slingers as a Fascist and a reactionary. The fifth columnists of hate turned all their scorn upon him, forgetting his services to the best causes of mankind for more than a score of years.

Another element entered into this campaign. There is a group of men in New York, terrifyingly financed, fanatical in their zeal, utterly ruthless in their methods, un-American in their concepts, honest in their purposes but immoral in their tactics, who have made a god of Hitler as some of the peoples of Asia worship the devil. The focus of all their thinking is Hitler. They have no relations with their God, no worship, no faith, no beliefs—except that Hitler was the most potent creature on earth therefore the greatest menace to them. They offer no positive idealism, only a prolongation of hatreds. They judge all questions, all issues, all men by their relationship to Hitler. Anyone who opposed our entry into the war to make the world safe for Stalin is regarded as pro-Hitler, pro-Nazi, pro-Fascist.

These men are not Communists. Many of them are rich capitalists engaged in business. But they have gone completely mad on the Hitler issue; the defeat of Germany, the death of Hitler, the trial of his associates, the rise of Stalin, the peril of world communism, even the dangers to the United States, means nothing to them.

They seek to kill off in American political and public life every man who at any stage opposed the so-called Roosevelt policies, and that, in spite of the enveloping evidence of his deceit and trickiness. They are political paranoiacs, with a ferocious persecution complex, to which some of them add a guilt complex for the years during which they betrayed their own kin and coreligionists.

They are surrounded by paid employees, job holders who receive munificent salaries to keep this pot of hate and revenge boiling. Their jobs depend upon keeping Hitler's memory alive, which they do.

They are now soliciting funds in New York for PAC on the grounds that PAC fights anti-Semitism, which it, of course, does not do. In fact all this activity keeps Hitler alive in the United States, which is good fund raising. It is important to bring all this into the open and the Wheeler defeat in Montana does just that.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP A. TRAYNOR
OF DELAWARE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. TRAYNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Gaelic American:

THE BRITISH LOAN

Under the lash of administration leaders, the so-called British multibillion loan has been passed. It was promptly signed by President Truman. Soviet Russia will be the next country seeking a hand-out. The Red diplomats will thoroughly enjoy making a grab for the wealth of the hated American capitalists, which means the American taxpayer. We wonder if the Soviet negotiators will be able to withhold their venom toward America long enough to induce the do-gooders and "suckers" of Washington, to lavishly turn our money over to them. Of course, much of it would be used to wreck the American system of government, the American way of life, and to bring Americans the joy of totalitarian enslavement.

The signing of the loan marks the culmination of the Roosevelt-Hull scheme to reduce the United States to the status of a free trade country. The next move will be an international trade charter. That will mean the end of American tariff barriers and the opening of the floodgates of foreign goods to compete with the products of American industry. When the low wage and slave-labor goods floods American markets, tossing thousands of our people out of work, and sharply reducing the incomes of others, the American laboring man will fully appreciate the blessings of the New Deal ideology.

This trade conference scheduled to meet in London will whittle away the remnants of the historic American system for the protection of American industry and labor. In it Uncle Sam will lose his pants. He has already given away his coat and vest.

Nothing was presented in the loan debates to indicate that Britain intends to aid, in any way, American export markets. On the contrary, Britain has continued to negotiate bilateral trade agreements within the sterling bloc. Mr. Churchill boasted in the House of Commons that he had succeeded in preserving the imperial preference system. Mr. Bevin has stated that this is the understanding of the present Socialist government of Great Britain. How can American industry compete in such a set-up?

The American people and American labor will not ascertain fully, for a year, just what the British loan agreement really means to their wage scales and standard of living for years to come. When they do, watch the explosion against the politicians who swung the deal.

Trade With Great Britain

OF
HON. OWEN BREWSTER
OF MAINE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 24 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two articles from the New York Times of this morning, the first headed "Britain to relax policy on imports," the second under the headline "Would drop order to ship tractors." A paragraph from the first article reads:

Well informed American business sources here say that at least 150 new projects now are likely to be carried out. Most plans for new plants had been held in suspense pending the outcome of the loan deliberations.

I thought that was significant.

The second article deals with the plea of American tractor manufacturers to cancel the orders for the shipment of 14,500 American built tractors to Russian countries. This request of American tractor manufacturers is based on their desire to supply American farmers.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITAIN TO RELAX POLICY ON IMPORTS—MORRISON, IN A WARM TRIBUTE, BACKS UNITED STATES PROPOSAL FOR NEW INTERNATIONAL TRADE CHARTER

(By Michael L. Hoffman)

LONDON, July 23.—Paying an unusually warm tribute to the United States new leadership in international economic affairs, Herbert Morrison, Lord President of the Council, said today Great Britain's recent decision to permit token imports of United States branded goods was only the first step in the relaxation of the present strict import policy that was "quite foreign to the real desires of the British people."

Pointing out that Britain was the world's largest customer, buying more than 20 percent of all the world's exports, Mr. Morrison told a mixed American and British audience at the thirtieth anniversary meeting of the American Chamber of Commerce in London that Britain's long-run prosperity demanded that the country be an even bigger importer than before the war.

Mr. Morrison, in commenting on United States proposals for a new international trade charter, said that "one of the most hopeful signs of our times" was the energy with which the United States Government and major American business interests were attempting to enlarge the scope of world trade. He emphasized that discussion of the loan had tended to obscure the motives of both the British and American Governments, which were as much to benefit the whole world as to help Britain's recovery or to boost American exports.

FIRMLY BEHIND UNITED STATES PLAN

Mr. Morrison left no doubt in his hearers' minds that whatever the attitude of some sections of opinion, the British Government was firmly behind the United States trade proposals and was delaying the elimination of discriminatory practices and excessive import controls only to the extent necessitated by the immediate postwar foreign exchange shortage.

Wallace B. Phillips, president of the American Chamber in London, recalling the organization's unceasing support of the loan and the new trade proposals, said that the immediate consequence of the final ratification had been the decision of large numbers of American concerns to proceed with plans for the establishment of branch factories in Britain.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY NEW PROJECTS LOOM

Well-informed American business sources here say that at least 150 new projects now are likely to be carried out. Most plans for new plants had been held in suspense pending the outcome of the loan deliberations.

This wave of branch plant construction probably will double the total amount of American capital invested in United Kingdom manufacturing capacity. While to a certain extent it is motivated by a desire to get behind the British tariff wall, the main attraction to most American companies is the broad commercial advantage of operating in the British Commonwealth and Empire from British bases. Not only are facilities better from the point of view of shipment, financing, and marketing, but the prestige of British manufactured products still counts in Empire markets.

While much of the capital for the new plants already is in Britain, the inflow of funds from the United States has been marked since passage of the loan. It is thought here to be the result, in part at least, of the spurt in American business investments in Britain.

The matter was the subject of a question in the House of Commons today, at which time Chancellor of the Exchequer Hugh Dalton confirmed the increased inflow of funds, but turned down flat the questioner's suggestion that this might require a revaluation of the pound sterling.

WOULD DROP ORDER TO SHIP TRACTORS—MAKER SAYS EXPORT OF 14,500 TO COUNTRIES DOMINATED BY RUSSIA HURTS OTHERS

CHICAGO, July 23.—The International Harvester Co. has asked the Civilian Production Administration to reconsider its order requiring export of 14,500 American-built tractors largely to Russian-dominated countries, a company spokesman disclosed today.

The order requires shipment of the machines to eastern European countries through the United Nations Rehabilitation and Relief Administration by December 31. They will be divided largely among Poland, Yugoslavia, Albania, Czechoslovakia, and Rumania at a time when the Department of Agriculture has estimated American farmers need at least 240,000 tractors this year.

International Harvester's share of the total which must be supplied is 5,478 machines, of which 5,198 are of the wheel type and 280 are of the crawler type.

In a letter to the CPA, G. G. Hoyt, vice president of the company, based his request for reconsideration of the order on the fact that its fulfillment would involve diversion of tractors from domestic channels and also would disrupt shipments to countries other than those receiving UNRRA aid.

The letter said:

"Tractors of the type required for UNRRA from our company for this program are not available unless they are taken from future production which is now allocated to other areas. It will radically reduce the quantity of tractors which have been allocated to France and other western European countries as well as to Mexico, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and so forth.

"In such countries as France and Australia plans have already been made for production in those countries of agricultural machinery to work with the tractors they expect to receive from the United States."

Mr. Hoyt said countries for which the tractors were now destined could not make full use of them because of the lack of mechanization in agricultural equipment.

"We call your attention to the fact that the countries to which UNRRA proposes to distribute these tractors are very backward in the use of mechanical agricultural equipment," he said.

"Our company in the past has supplied little or no equipment of the type now proposed for them, and we have no company or distributor facilities in these countries to assist UNRRA personnel in assembling or distributing such equipment or to teach operators in connection with the operation, care, and maintenance of such equipment.

"Outside of the amount of service parts which the directives indicate should be sent with the tractors there are no stocks of service parts or the usual and necessary service facilities in these countries."

Pearl Harbor Report Plainly Fixes Blame

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND E. WILLIS

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 24 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by David Lawrence entitled "Pearl Harbor Report Plainly Fixes Blame," published in the Washington Star of July 23, 1946.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEARL HARBOR REPORT PLAINLY FIXES BLAME—SECTIONAL HEADINGS TELL WHERE NEGLECT WAS FLAGRANT

(By David Lawrence)

The American people are indebted to the special Senate and House committee which investigated the Pearl Harbor disaster. Despite the impressions which the concluding part of the report seeks to establish, the headings of the document fix responsibility as plainly as if names had been called.

The report is ingeniously developed. It states factually what occurred and subdivides each important section with a heading. Future historians, cannot fail to read those tell-tale headings, for each one states an impersonal conclusion out of which only one inference can be made—namely, that the persons who had the responsibility for each task and did not perform it efficiently are being blamed.

Thus there is language in the conclusion of the report itself, signed by the majority, which absolves certain individuals but there is no such evasiveness in the headings.

HEADINGS NOT EVASIVE

Here, for instance, are some of the committee's own headings which subdivide the conclusions and recommendations of the report:

1. Operational and intelligence work requires centralization of authority and clear-cut allocation of responsibility.

2. Supervisory officials cannot safely take anything for granted in the alerting of subordinates.

3. Any doubt as to whether outposts should be given information should always be resolved in favor of supplying the information.

4. The delegation of authority or the issuance of orders entails the duty of inspection to determine that the official mandate is properly exercised.

5. The implementation of official orders must be followed with closest supervision.

MUST INSURE ALERTNESS

6. The maintenance of alertness to responsibility must be insured through repetition.

7. Complacency and procrastination are out of place where sudden and decisive action are of the essence.

8. The coordination and proper evaluation of intelligence in times of stress must be insured by continuity of service and centralization of responsibility in competent officials.

9. The unapproachable or superior attitude of officials is fatal: There should never be any hesitancy in asking for clarification of instructions or in seeking advice on matters that are in doubt.

10. There is no substitute for imagination and resourcefulness on the part of supervisory and intelligence officials.

11. Communications must be characterized by clarity, forthrightness, and appropriateness.

OBSERVATIONS SIGNIFICANT

There are in all 25 of these headings. Particularly significant are Nos. 17, 23, 24 and 25. Here they are:

17. An official who neglects to familiarize himself in detail with his organization should forfeit his responsibility.

23. Superiors must at all times keep their subordinates adequately informed and, conversely, subordinates should keep their superiors informed.

24. The administrative organization of any establishment must be designed to locate failures and to assess responsibility.

25. In a well-balanced organization there is close correlation of responsibility and authority.

All that the historian of tomorrow needs to do is find out who, on December 7, 1941, was Chief of Staff of the Army, Chief of Naval Operations, and in command of subordinate positions in the War and Navy Departments and who was Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and then read the main headings of the report on Pearl Harbor. He will find that Republicans and Democrats were unanimous about the headings but politeness, courtesy, and deference caused the omission of the names of the personalities involved, in the case of the majority who signed the report, whereas the minority just named those responsible. It's really a unanimous report on what happened.

The Black Market, Hail and Farewell

OF

HON. LEON H. GAVIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington News of July 22, 1946:

THE BLACK MARKET, HAIL AND FAREWELL

Unhappiest of all about what's happened since July 1 is the black-market operator, and who can blame him The black market in meat alone was caught short for $10,000,000, according to one conservative estimate.

This loss occurred when the supply of suckers disappeared with the end of OPA. Hoarded stocks had to be disposed of. Once on a free market they couldn't stand competition with legitimate business for several reasons, mainly wasteful methods.

The great modern packing plant uses up everything but the squeal and is working on that. Hides go for shoes. Odd edible bits make puddings and sausages. Pharmaceutical houses get the glands. Even the last scraps are swept up and procesesd into animal foods.

The black-market slaughterhouse passed up a generation of meat-packing progress. It often consisted of a dirty knife and a tree from which to hang a carcass. It had no facilities for using up the whole steer or pig, and wouldn't have dared use them if it had.

Hides, for instance, can be traced, so most were burned. A leather shortage developed in consequence of large illicit slaughtering.

The black-market meat butcher just ripped out the steaks and roasts, destroying the rest. His customers had to pay him for the wasted parts. Sometimes they had to pay something extra for the fines he was risking if he got caught, but this was balanced, more or less, by the taxes he avoided.

The prohibition speakeasy lingered in form of many a fancy saloon. The black market can't be reconverted since it wasn't a room in a back alley but just an awkward and wasteful means of doing business.

You didn't get into a black market by knocking twice and asking for Charlie. You found it everywhere. Many of its promoters came from the class of shiny-pants chiselers who thrive in times of unaccustomed legal restraints and would rather make a shady dime than an honest dollar. But many others were normally respectable merchants, tempted by extra profits or driven by force of circumstance to this risky means of making a living.

And so, to paraphrase the newsreel announcer, we say good-by to the black market, a monument to waste and to the stubborn cussedness of the free American citizen who will eat a steak if it chokes him, as often as someone tries to tell him he can't.

Hail, black market, and farewell! And we can't say it was very nice knowing you.

We say good-by, and not just au revoir, because there is not, in our opinion, the remotest chance that any reborn OPA will be stout enough to fix prices in a way that will prevent legitimate processors and dealers from doing business competitively.

The new compromise OPA bill which Congress probably will send to the White House this week contains the threat to reimpose arbitrary ceilings at some future time, but the threat probably won't be taken seriously. The new bill, to state it mildly, is no better than the one the President vetoed, and has less chance of succeeding because it means trying to put Humpty-Dumpty together again.

As we see it, it won't make much difference whether the President signs or vetoes this bill, provided something is done to salvage rent controls. The only thing that can get us out of this mess is for us to go to work and produce enough goods to satisfy pent-up demand, and thereby keep prices within the limits of the American consumer—mama by name—will tolerate.

In any event, it's the best means open to us now.

The Army and Public Opinion

OF

HON. OLIN D. JOHNSTON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Wednesday, July 24 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject The Army and Public Opinion, by Maj. Gen. Floyd L. Parks, United States Army, Chief of the Public Relations Division, War Department, at the State American Legion convention at Greenville, S. C., July 22, 1946.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a pleasant experience, after the activities of the past few years, to relax and exchange greetings with old friends here in South Carolina, amid surroundings that bring back the pleasant memories of boyhood days. As many of you know, I cannot claim the distinction of having been born a South Carolinian, but I did my best to make up for it by moving to the Palmetto State as a youngster, attending school at Anderson, and graduating from Clemson A. and M. College in time to enter World War I. My mother makes her home here in Greenville, and of course I return to visit her as often as possible and also to renew acquaintances with many old friends. So when I received an invitation to address your convention, I was doubly happy to accept.

I am particularly glad to speak to members of the American Legion because, as a veteran of both World Wars, I feel that I have a sympathetic understanding of the outlook, of both the doughboy of 1917–18, and the GI of the 1940's. There is a common bond between you men, though of different generations, which, I am sure, will make the Legion as fine a constructive force in the life of our country in the years to come, as it was in the period between wars. The opportunities for service to our country may be more difficult to discern in peace than in war—though hardly less essential—and it is, therefore, most important to have organizations such as the Legion to focus the energy of our veterans on necessary collective tasks as they arise.

My own particular interest, as you can imagine, continues to be what it has been for years—the United States Army. Just now my attention is concentrated on the Army's public relations. The War Department's Public Relations Division, of which I became chief last January, is one of three War Department units, grouped under the Chief of Public Information, Lt. Gen. J. Lawton Collins. The other two information agencies are the Legislative and Liaison Division, and the Information and Education Division. It is a privilege to be associated in this work with General Collins, who achieved brilliant results as a field commander in both the Pacific and European theaters of war. Some of you no doubt served under him, and can appreciate his distinctive qualities of leadership. These qualities will serve him in good stead now, because it is no small task that he has undertaken.

In its information activities, the Army has "reconversion" problems of its own. It has emerged from a period of all-out war, in which security which restricted news was the paramount consideration and has entered an era in which the public can rightfully expect virtually full and complete information on the Army's activities. The transition is not easily made, I can assure you. And since the division which I head has the job of keeping the public informed about the Army, I would like to take a few minutes to discuss what we are trying to do, how you veterans in the American Legion can help us, and how I think we can help you.

We all agree, I'm sure, on the desirability of keeping the American people informed as fully as possible about their Army. Ours is a democratic people, and a democratic Army. It is not our Nation's policy to maintain a large standing army in time of peace, but rather to raise an adequate army from among the people whenever it becomes necessary to defend ourselves. From the very nature of this policy, it is imperative that the people be convinced of the necessity of expanding the Army, when the need arises, and that public opinion be welded into unshakable support of our soldiers when they go out to fight.

This confidence and support prevailed throughout the past war, and contributed immeasurably to victory; in fact, valorous as were our fighting men, they could not have won without the unified, unstinting support of the people back home. The force of informed American public opinion was far greater than the frantic effort of Hitler's synthetic propaganda machine.

Now that the shooting war is over—though we live in a sort of twilight period pending the peace settlements—there has been a backlash of criticism of the Army, evident in the press and other organs of public opinion. This flurry is partly explained by the removal of wartime controls on subject matter, and partly by the postmortem discussions that naturally follow all wars and other major events. Some of this criticism may be justified, some may not. But the important thing, as I see it, is for the American people to be given the facts, so that they can judge for themselves. I have full confidence in the ability of the American public, if given the facts, to reach the right conclusion.

And in this respect, I believe that you legionnaires are in a unique position to render a service to both the Army and the people. As former servicemen, now returned to civilian life, you are best qualified to understand and interpret the Army to the American people. Sometimes you may hear statements made about the Army which you know from your own experience are untrue, or are half-truths based on misunderstanding. In such cases, you can clear up misconceptions on the spot by stating the facts as you know them.

As for me, I know that the American public is proud of its Army and the part it played in winning the war. The people are deeply conscious of the unending debt of gratitude they owe to the men who left their homes when their country was in peril, learned the distasteful lessons of war quickly and efficiently, and drove on to victory. The people are fully aware of the magnificent accomplishment of the Army in assembling, training, equipping, and leading into battle the greatest force in America's history. And the few who did not measure up are recognized by the public as unfortunate exceptions—just as misfits and failures sometimes get into the law, the ministry, and other honored professions.

The public will remember its heroes. But there is a tendency to forget the Army itself in peace time. We in the War Department Public Relations Division hope to maintain public interest in the Army by making full information available to the people. However, the truth is that the Army as a whole makes its public relations; our Division merely serves as the chief liaison between the Army and the public. Every officer and every enlisted man in the Army influences public opinion by his contact with the civilian population in the community in which he is stationed.

In the end, public opinion about the Army reflects what the Army itself is. If the Army is good, the public will recognize that fact. If the Army is bad, the public is sure to find it out. All we in the Public Relations Division can do is to present the Army as it is. That suits me, because I know we have a fine Army, and I am proud to do what I can to put it on exhibition. I know that with very few regrettable exceptions, the officers and men of the Army have tried in the past and are now trying their level best to serve their Nation faithfully. We are having reorganization pains at the moment, but these will pass in a few months. We are definitely on the upgrade now.

The real job of keeping the United States the best-informed country in the world is being done, of course, by the press, radio, motion pictures, and other privately operated media. What the Public Relations Division wants to do is to make complete information available to these agencies for dissemination to the public. Digging out and supplying the details is one of the important functions of the Public Relations Division. We are the window through which the public watches the Army at its work. We want to have the public see everything that goes on, within the limits of genuine military security. By pursuing a goldfish-bowl policy in Army public relations, we believe that no dark corners will be allowed to exist where dirt might accumulate. An alert press is an excellent inspector general. My motto is, "The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth—and get it out while it is still news." If the Army has made a mistake, admit it and take your licking. If the Army is trying honestly to do a good job, the press and public will realize it, and applaud.

In order to carry out that policy, an effort is being made to strengthen the Army's public-relations organization all along the line. We are trying to plan further ahead and are trying to visualize the public-relations effect of given policies before they are announced or even formulated.

For example, often the bare announcement of a policy or an event may be unfavorably received, whereas a favorable reaction might have been obtained if a satisfactory explanation were made with the original announcement. Too often the War Department, as well as other Government agencies, has been placed in the somewhat awkward position of defending a policy after it has been attacked in the press. Such a defense might have been entirely unnecessary had the original announcement contained a sufficiently detailed explanation.

Because the bulk of your information reaches you through your local newspapers and radio stations, the Army is trying earnestly to improve the local public-relations functions of its various posts and installations throughout the country. Some of you probably are newspaper publishers and reporters who regard Army facilities in your locality as legitimate sources of news and try, with varying degrees of success, to get that news. It will interest you particularly to know that the Public Relations Division is trying not only to provide Army posts with efficient PRO's but also to impress commanding officers with the value of good public relations, and how they can promote good public relations through cooperation with the local press and radio. We want the Army to become a part of the community within which any element is located.

Finally, I want to assure you that our Division has a sincere and continuing interest in the American Legion. We maintain close contact with National Commander Stelle and the staff of your national headquarters in Washington, and are glad to supply material of special interest to Legionnaires for your monthly magazine and other use. I will be happy to have South Carolina Legionnaires write me at any time and I shall do my best to assist you.

It has been an inspiration to meet you and a distinct honor to be your guest today. Thank you.

HON. P. W. GRIFFITHS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the fact that the farmers of this country, busy with their problem of raising the crops which this country and the war-ravaged peoples of the world so urgently need, do not have the time to keep abreast of our complicated income-tax structure.

In an endeavor to be of some help, I have prepared, with the help of a tax expert, a list of items which I believe to be complete and hope it will prove helpful as a reference while making out the returns.

Platform of Affiliated Young Democrats

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following platform adopted at the seventh biennial State convention of the Affiliated Young Democrats, Inc., of New York State, June 21, 22, 23, 1946, at the Hotel Piccadilly, New York City:

PLATFORM ADOPTED BY THE CONVENTION ON JUNE 23, 1946

On the occasion of the first anniversary of the tragic death of our great leader, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, President Truman said that "the best tribute that we who remain can pay to his memory is to carry on those principles and those policies for which he lived and gave his life. This administration is determined to pay that kind of tribute to him." To the accomplishment of this goal, we stand united under the leadership of President Truman and pledge to him our wholehearted support.

In the more than 13 years which have elapsed since Franklin Roosevelt stirred the Nation with the battle cry that "we have nothing to fear but fear itself," our people have progressed under Democratic leadership to an unparalleled eminence in the history of the world.

Victory has given us the opportunity, if we will but use it, of accomplishing peace in our time, and bringing freedom to the oppressed peoples of the world.

Thirteen years of progressive social legislation have made the "four freedoms" an American reality, and have advanced the common citizen to a position of dignity, security, and equality never before enjoyed in this or any other country.

We applaud the leadership of President Harry S. Truman as a worthy successor of President Roosevelt. We ask for renewed and greater support for the policies which he has advocated, and for the unification of our Representatives in Congress behind his program. He commanded American armed forces through their final victorious campaigns. He arranged for the return of American soldiers with a kindliness and efficiency never experienced by any other army. He rose in a time of crisis to set himself against the peril of uncontrolled inflation, and, though opposed by combinations of selfish interests, received the support of the American people. He has systematically endeavored to restrain the forces of special privilege and greed which took advantage of our shortages at home and abroad during this trying period of reconversion, and he has defended the public against the systematic raids of selfish pressure groups. He has sought just and equitable settlements for labor, and has insisted that in the achievement of such settlements, the life lines of the public welfare and security must not be jeopardized. His continued leadership will provide the best protection of the people for an orderly return to a peacetime economy without economic chaos or an impairment of our social gains. He merits the wholehearted support of every thinking American, young and old. America's best hope is to unite behind the leadership of our President.

Now forces of reaction, mistakenly believing that the program which he so valiantly championed died with Franklin Roosevelt, seek to obstruct its inevitable progress, and to destroy the structure which was erected during the past 13 years of democratic government. In the international sphere, those who have not learned the lessons of the two terrible wars into which our country and the whole world were plunged in the last quarter of a century are sowing the seeds of distrust and isolationism which, if not rooted out, will thrust us into a third and final war of certain destruction. We therefore applaud the policy laid down by President Truman and carried out by Secretary Byrnes in endeavoring to maintain against its enemies of the right and of the left the principles of the Atlantic Charter.

The dream of a democratic and just world, free of war and of the fear of war, and of a prosperous and healthy nation in which all citizens will be assured of justice, security, and equality—political, social, and economic—can only be realized by bold, unhesitating, and forceful action in support of a well-defined program. To this end we pledge ourselves to the following objectives:

NATIONAL ISSUES

1. The United Nations: We affirm our full support of the United Nations, and advocate a policy of strengthening it so that it may make and enforce wise judgments, and keep the peace of the world. We call upon our representatives in our national, State, and local governments to give it full support. We believe that in such an organization, and not in alliances with other powers, lies the way to lasting peace and international democracy.

In turn, we urge the United Nations to establish the principle of equality of nations and to assure the liberated nations and minorities of Europe and the Orient political and economic independence under democratic governments. We also call upon the United Nations to assure the colonial peoples of the world, now dominated by imperialistic interests, that same ultimate freedom and independence which we have granted to the Philippines.

We recognize the full extent of the responsibility which this imposes upon the United States—to maintain adequate military strength, to take its full part in feeding starved masses in other countries, to share financially in the work of rebuilding stricken countries, and to make its techniques freely available everywhere. The best interests of the United States are protected and forwarded by promoting the welfare of other members of the world family of nations.

2. Assistance to the homeless and starving of Europe and Asia: We advocate and support the giving of a full measure of assistance to those unhappy persons in Europe and elsewhere whose homes and food supplies have been wiped out by the war. We urge the Congress to fulfill the commitments which our Government has undertaken in this regard, even through rationing if necessary. We urge that the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration be given the necessary resources and support with which to accomplish this. We support the opening of Palestine and other suitable areas to displaced persons now homeless in Europe. We call for the admission immediately of 100,000 Jews to Palestine as recommended by the Anglo-American Committee.

3. World trade: We urge the continuation of the reciprocal trade policy established by Secretary Hull, and a further reduction in tariffs of all countries so as to stimulate the freer movement of goods among nations. We oppose all obstacles to free trade, whether such obstructions reflect a positive Government policy or private action in the form of cartels. We support the extension of financial assistance to Great Britain and other countries where American interests are fostered and not discriminated against. We are opposed to the extension of such assistance to nations in this hemisphere and out of it whose present governments aided the Axis Powers and, directly or indirectly, sought to prevent the democratic victory, or who are now persisting in the maintenance of undemocratic governments.

4. The armed forces: We support and advocate the maintenance of a strong Army, Navy, and Air Force until such time as the readiness of all nations to participate in an effective world federation in good faith has been demonstrated. We are strongly opposed to a weakening of our armed forces to a point where they are unable to protect us and our island bases in both oceans, and to fulfill our responsibilities in occupied areas. We favor such an improvement in the pay, allowances, and mode of life of servicemen as will insure the voluntary recruiting of sufficient personnel to permit all necessary battle and defense stations to be manned at all times. We are opposed to a caste system in the armed forces, and we call for speedy action on the Doolittle report by the War Department. Until such time as sufficient personnel can be secured on a voluntary basis, we favor the continuance of selective service. We favor military training as part of a broad educational program for our youth.

5. Atomic energy: We support the creation of a civilian commission, with military representation, to assess the potency of atomic energy, to consider the changes which it necessitates in our national-defense structure, and to determine how it can best be utilized as a constructive force in our national life. We advocate the continued public ownership of the sources of atomic energy, and of the means of producing and utilizing it. We are opposed to disclosure of our knowledge of atomic energy to other nations until we have adequate assurance that similar knowledge in the possession of such other powers will be made known to us, and that such knowledge will not be employed against us or against other nonaggressor powers.

6. Territories: We support the admission of the Territory of Hawaii to statehood. We urge the enactment of legislation by the Congress providing for model representative government on Guam and other islands administered by us in the Pacific, so that we may set an example in democracy for the colonial peoples of the world.

7. Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway: We continue to advocate immediate authorization and construction of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway, with ownership and operation of the American side of the river by the Power Authority of the State of New York.

8. Securities and Exchange Commission: We are opposed to the attempts now being made to weaken and emasculate the statutes administered by the Securities and Exchange Commission which have been an assurance of fair dealing, and an absence of fraud and manipulation, to the public when they enter the securities markets.

9. Labor: We continue to advocate retention of the hard-won gains secured by labor under the last 13 years of Democratic administration. We stand for continuation of the National Labor Relations Act. We recommend that, through collective bargaining and the governmental agencies concerned, adjustments be made to insure that labor's take-home pay is not impaired by inflation or other incidents of reconversion. We advocate immediate improvement of working conditions by the establishment of necessary health and safety measures. In this critical period when the Nation is in the midst of reconversion to a peacetime economy and millions of returned veterans are readjusting to civilian life, we advocate carefully considered legislation to eliminate unauthorized, jurisdictional, and wildcat strikes, and to curtail work stoppages in the Nation's key industries. We believe enlightened labor leaders will cooperate in this in their own interest and in the interest of labor. We urge upon labor the necessity of keeping its own house in order so that the advances made under this administration will not be threatened or impaired by a showing of abuse on the part of a few irresponsible, selfish, or corrupt individuals, and we urge labor itself to draft measures to that end.

10. Social security: We continue to support extension of the social-security program to provide full protection against old age, illness, and economic misfortune for everyone with benefits adequate to provide at least a minimum of health and decency, regardless of previous earnings. The program should assure complete medical care for all and should allow no child under any circumstances to lack good food, adequate clothing, a decent home, and the opportunity for education. To this end we advocate immediate passage of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, and extension of the Social Security Act to segments of the population not now covered.

11. Minorities: A shameful blot on our wartime record has been the continuance of racial discrimination and inequalities at home at the same time that our young men and women have been fightng to eliminate such discriminations and inequalities abroad. We support the extenson of the Fair Employment Practices Act and other legislation designed to root out discrimination at home. Racial distinctions at home must have no greater meaning than they have on the battlefield.

12. Price controls: To protect the public against inflation and profiteering, we favor continuance of effective price controls until such time as production is in full flow, and supply and demand are nearer balance.

ISSUES BOTH NATIONAL AND STATE IN SCOPE

1. Veterans: We consider it the responsibility of the nation, the community, and the individual to assist in the readjustment of the veteran. We believe that everything possible should be done to place within tangible reach of the veteran the benefits accorded him under the GI bill of rights. We favor enlargement of our educational facilities in this State so that any veteran who desires to avail himself of his rights to an education may do so. We urge the elimination of all nonessential red tape in the processing of veterans' affairs by the Veterans' Administration. We condemn the nonaction and disinterest which have characterized the present State administration's policy concerning veterans, a policy which has resulted in the furnishing to veterans by the State of New York only of information, and not of assistance. We believe that an opportunity must be given by the Democratic Party to the veterans to participate in public affairs, and that the party should seek a fair proportion of its candidates for public office from the many qualified veterans who are members of the party. We believe that the policy of affording the veteran a preference in governmental employment should be modified so as to be based upon qualification gained in service or in veteran educational courses, and not upon mere veteran status alone.

2. Housing: We advocate prompt and thorough action by the Federal, State, and local governments so as to assure that there will be a home available for every veteran and for every other citizen in need of one. We support the channeling of building materials into low-cost housing projects. We rcommend the utilization of all idle housing for such purposes, and the maintenance of rent controls so as to prevent the unscrupulous from capitalizing upon need and shortage. We call upon the State administration to meet its obligations to the veteran and to the citizen, and to end its long record of inaction in housing. We condemn the record of the Republican Governor and his unqualified superintendent of housing who for 4 years when it was apparent that a housing crisis was imminent did nothing, and obstructed the efforts of Democratic legislators to provide a State housing program.

3. Voting: We favor an extension of the right to vote to all citizens 18 years of age or over. The same qualifications should govern the obligations to fight and the right to participate in the selection of governmnt.

STATE ISSUES

1. Education: We favor immediate action to increase State appropriations for higher education until they compare favorably with the per capita appropriations of other States. As an inegral part of our program for higher education, we favor the immediate establishment of a State university with adequate facilities for all veterans now unsuccessfully seeking to avail themselves of the educational privileges of the GI bill of rights, and with colleges of medicine and dentistry which will admit all qualified applicants from this State, regardless of racial or religious background. We are opposed to the admission of students on a quota system in any university or college supported in whole or in part by public funds, or enjoying immunity from taxation. We favor the continuance of the present State grants to universities and other institutions regardless of the establishment of a State University.

2. Civil service: We condemn the Republican Governor's raids upon the civil service system of the State, which have resulted in more positions being removed from the civil service lists and used for political patronage than under the administration of any other governor. We call for the immediate restoration of such positions to the civil service list, and for the immediate removal of the present political appointees.

3. Use of State surpluses: We favor the utilization of the State's surplus funds, built up largely by tax revenues from the people of the larger cities of the State, to meet the increasing financial burdens of those cities in this period of readjustment. At a time when the State Treasury has a surplus of more than $500,000,000, more than two-thirds of which was paid in by the people of the city of New York, it is unconscionable to impose additional taxes upon the citizens of that community to meet the expenses of government. The time is at hand when the State administration must make an equitable division of State revenues with municipal governments, and admit the people of the larger cities of the State to their legitimate share of the taxes paid by them.

4. Full employment: We condemn the State administration's failure to enact a full employment measure, and we pledge ourselves to the speedy passage of such legislation.

5. Legislative representation: We demand an end to the gerrymandering which the Republican Party has foisted upon the State, and to the intolerable situation under which the people of the city of New York, constituting more than a majority of the people of the State, and providing more than two-thirds of the State's income, are denied equal representation in either house of the legislature.

6. Home rule: We call for legislation which will give the cities of the State budgetary self-determination, and which will eliminate the need for approval by the State government for the incurring of indebtedness by them.

7. Recognition of women voters: Although they constitute more than half of the citizens of this State, there are few major State, city, or county offices which women hold. We advocate the nomination, election, and appointment of qualified women to a fair percentage of State, city, and county offices, and we call upon Democratic leaders in this State to give such representation to the women of the State on the ticket to be presented to the people this fall.

8. Democratic progressivism at Albany: Almost without exception such progressive social legislation as has been enacted at Albany during the Republican regime was initiated and sponsored by the Democratic representatives in the senate and assembly. The political trickery evidenced by subsequent and belated Republican support of such measures in the wake of public clamor for their enactment cannot obscure the fact that those who represent the people at Albany are the Democratic legislators, who stand for action, and not for evasion by the appointment of commissions to investigate obvious facts.

9. Unity: Our Nation, our State, our party, and our people are today at a time which more than any other time marks a crisis in our affairs. The decisions that will be made and the actions which will be taken during the year to come will influence and affect the lives of millions of people for many years ahead. If the American people, putting aside their differences over secondary matters, would concentrate on the accomplishment of the democratic ideal, and if our political leaders and public men and women would for the moment subordinate their personal ambitions, jealousies, and factions to the accomplishment of that same democratic ideal, our Nation might lead the way to that time of "peace on earth and good will to men" which we all hoped to find at the end of the road when we responded to Pearl Harbor.

Like other things, unity begins at home. We cannot expect to unify the Nation behind our President if we Democrats in New York are ourselves divided into irreconcilable groups, factions, and wings. The time has come when a cohesive, militant, and united democracy in the State of New York must again be on the march to unite our State and our Nation behind our President. We call upon the Democratic State Committee to take the initiative and, calling a halt to factional political wars, to unify all Democrats in the State of New York in a common progressive front. We pledge to the Democratic State Committee our complete and unqualified cooperation and loyalty in bringing this about, and we dedicate ourselves and our officers to the cause of unity in the coming State elections.

The Ku Klux Klan

OF

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 24 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very excellent and well thought-out article by Victor Riesel on the rise of the Ku Klux Klan in the United States, published in the July 22, 1946, issue of the New York Post.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LABOR NEWS AND COMMENT

THE KKK MASQUERADES IN MORE THAN WHITE SHEETS

(By Victor Riesel)

Have you ever wondered how a Ku Klux Klan "den" prepares for a cross-burning?

Perhaps the danger of being Ku Kluxed has been too remote: perhaps white hoods, night riding, and flogging in the dark have seemed so far off you've given it little thought after cussing out newspaper reports of recently renewed Klan activity in many States.

But Gene Talmadge is about to become Governor of Georgia and the Ku Kluxers who rallied around his red suspenders and Klan-like campaign speeches will have a friend in power. They will strut just as the Chicago bootleg mobs would have if Scarface Al had been elected mayor. The anti-Catholic, anti-Negro, anti-CIO, anti-Jewish Ku Kluxers will take Talmadge's victory as a mandate for new and frenzied recruiting.

After all, it was Gene Talmadge who said for quotation during a discussion of New York City's 1,000,000 jobless in 1936:

"What you need in New York is not LaGuardia but Mussolini. A little castor oil would go a long ways towards starting the wheels of industry going again."

So let's look at the new Ku Klux Klan. How does that collection of congenial bullies operate? How strong are they? Can they exploit Gene Talmadge's election?

Investigations made within the past few weeks by competent Federal and private detective agencies disclose that terroristic Ku Klux "dens" (cells) are active in every large southern community and in Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, California, and Kansas, where Jayhawk Kluxers boast a membership of over 5,000 in Wichita, Hutchinson, Newton, Topeka, Leavenworth, and Kansas City.

How does the Klan operate? In Georgia the Kluxers are political. In Chattanooga, the Klan is built around hoodlums specializing in vandalism. In Florida it offers "protection" to real-estate owners against purchase or use of land or houses by Negroes. To meet the CIO organization campaign the Ku Klux propagandists have specialized in anti-Catholicism, attacking CIO leaders Philip Murray and James Carey, devout Catholics. Nor has George Meany, the AFL's Irish secretary, escaped these assaults.

Where the old-time Klan leaders would nail to trees and posts notices of meetings which read: "Klansmen meet at the trysting spot where Orion kisses the Zenith. The wolf is on his walk. The serpent coils to strike. Action. Action. Action," the modern KKK camouflages itself. It hides under names like the All-American Club, the All-American Society, the Knights of the Kanine Klub, and the Sons of Dixie (which appeals specially to union members).

The local cells are known as dens to the old-time Kluxers. Each den has a grand cyclops (now usually referred to as the club president). When he wants a KKK session he sends out messengers, once known as knight hawks, who telephone instructions as much as possible to keep written orders down to a minimum. These meetings decide whom to flog, what stores to deface, or whether a cross should be burned. Once a cross burning is scheduled, a squad is appointed to obtain heavy logs, 12 to 15 feet high, and wrap them in oil-soaked rags.

Car owners, cab drivers, and truckmen who are Kluxers friendly to it are contacted to bring the hooded men to the "trysting spot." The members arrive, dressed in white regalia, adorned by Klan pins costing anywhere from $9 to $1,500 (for diamond-studded ones). They remain silent through the ritual except for taking certain oaths.

The past 18 months there have been 23 cross burnings from New Jersey to Florida. Hundreds more of these ghoulish rituals are planned. Yet there is a lethargy abroad in the Nation. The good folk are losing by default.

British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. BYRNES

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the debate in this House on the passage of the British loan should be must reading for every American citizen. He will be paying the bill for years to come, so he should at least know why.

He should also read an analysis which appeared in an editorial in the Green Bay Press-Gazette of July 17. That editorial follows:

UNDERSTAND THE REASON ANYWAY

To the six billions we gave Britain in the First World War to compensate her for saving us from the Kaiser and the thirty billions we politely handed her in the recent struggle for having so gloriously protected us from Hitler, and the two hundred-odd billions we spent on our own efforts as we fought valiantly to shield her for having shielded us so long from the hateful Teutonic Tribes, we have now added some more billions to her extensive coffers that she may continue to guard and preserve us, but this time from Russia.

Speaker RAYBURN, of the House, told the story in his own words, but they were a pattern for everything that has been said in support of this latest craven looting of the American people. The Democratic leader put it this way:

"The rejection of this grant would drive England and western Europe toward the Communist ideology that I despise. If we fail to ally ourselves with Britain, I fear someone else will, and God keep us if we have no ally."

What was that hot tart about "the only thing we have to fear is fear"?

The enemy is no longer the German. He is broken. But that does not eliminate enemies. The enemy now is the Russian. That is not only freely admitted everywhere but openly spoken by Democratic leaders to justify this further tapping of the American till.

And who was it that cut away all restraints upon Russia so that it now looms menacingly? Uncle Sam may shake his head over that question but he must plead guilty to the charge. He has laid one brawler low only to see the one he saved arise with fire in his eye.

Virtually every vote in the Congress for this gift was a vote heavily affected by fear. We are being bled even as the blackmailer holds up dire consequences before the ashen face of his victim to force him to shell out. The vote was the tocsin call for the next war and the abject and humiliating admission that the grand plot to shove America out into the very front for all future wars had won in a walk.

But the Democrats who have pushed this additional abuse down the throats of the American people were also trying to cover up the emptiness of their usurped and spurious policies. Their intrusion into this war was a twin to the liquor habit, fine enough at the outset but ending in misery and death without any chance of quitting.

Wisconsin may note that its seven Republicans and one Progressive in the House voted against the gift and that the two Democrats voted for it.

Terror in Palestine

OF
HON. ANDREW L. SOMERS
OF NEW YORK
Tuesday, July 23, 1946

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present to the House, under leave granted me by unanimous consent, an editorial that appeared in the New York Post following the explosion of the bomb placed in the King David Hotel, in Jerusalem. Judging from the editorial response, this incident was viewed as most shocking and yet it seems strange that there should be anything more shocking about the attempt of the Jews in Palestine to free themselves than there is about the efforts of the rebellious forces in Bolivia to change what they considered an undesirable form of government. And I believe that the editorial which follows clearly presents the viewpoint of those who are cognizant of what the people of Palestine are striving for.

TERROR IN PALESTINE

The Post has always deplored terrorism in Palestine. The throwing of a bomb, the burst of gunfire from a passing car, solves no problems. The extermination of a few men leaves the real source of the evil policy they execute untouched. It goes on, using new men and new instruments, and the fight becomes even more relentless, brutal, and difficult of sensible settlement.

When Lord Moyne, one of the principal executors of the infamous white paper of 1939 fell victim to Jewish terrorist bullets, we said, "The conduct of political affairs by murder is as reprehensible when practiced by two young idealistic Hebrews as when it is practiced by British officials who turn Jews back from Palestine's doors to Hitler's Gestapo."

We repeat that sentiment. Over 90 people were killed yesterday when Jerusalem's King David Hotel, which houses the headquarters of the British Army and the Secretariat of the Palestine Government was blown up.

That was a typical terrorist act. And like all large-scale terrorist acts it struck indiscriminately, at friend as well as foe. It cut down one of our correspondents, Richard Mowrer, who had been doing a splendid, objective job of reporting the Palestine story and its background.

A FRIEND LIES WOUNDED

Without sympathizing with the Jewish terrorists, Mowrer had written intelligently and understandingly of the causes of their outburst. Now he lies wounded. The terrorists did not intend this. It is another illustration, however, of the blindness of their methods.

Yet while we neither excuse nor condone terrorism, it is important that the atmosphere which prompts such hysterical acts be understood.

It is a fact that when you leave no other course open, you get precisely such acts as the bombing of the King David Hotel as the result. As Mowrer put it in a recent dispatch, as doubtless he would repeat even now, were he able, "terrorism in Palestine is a symbol of despair." It is the fruit of British policy in the mandate.

A Mowrer dispatch from Jerusalem on July 9 explained it brilliantly: "Fascist-minded Arab leaders are permitted to return from Germany and from exile, but Jewish survivors of Hitler's gas chambers are still in barbed-wire camps in Germany. * * * There is no habeas corpus on Palestine. Any policeman, any British soldier * * * can arrest you on mere suspicion * * * if you give shelter to your own mother knowing she is an illegal immigrant, you are liable to 8 years' imprisonment."

Is it any wonder that in their rage and despair, betrayed and embittered men strike out blindly?

IT HAPPENED IN IRELAND

A quarter century ago, another people in another part of the world, facing very much the same problem, resorted to the same sort of terrorism. Petitions and recitals of broken pledges having failed, the people of Ireland finally enlisted in the Sinn Fein and for the next few years the green isle was drenched in blood and shattered by explosions. The acts of terrorism were equally deplorable then—Ireland might well have secured her freedom without Sinn Fein outbreaks—but they were equally inevitable.

For Britain in 1920–21 gave the Irish no other course. As today she leaves the Jews of Palestine little alternative to similar blind acts of despair.

The vicious cycle must be broken at some point. For just as the hopes and aspirations of men will not be quenched by British repression, so Jewish terrorists will not prevail through bombs.

We return again to what the Post said editorially on the occasion of the Moyne assassination. "There never would have been a terrorist band in the first place if the British had not deliberately abandoned the democratic process in their dealings with Palestine."

For the real criminal that blew up the King David Hotel yesterday is a policy that has left the Jews of Palestine with no hope and no faith in the ordinary, normal ways of gaining justice. That policy must be changed.

Portland Tops West in Housing of Vets

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Yank News:

PORTLAND TOPS WEST IN HOUSING OF VETS

The returning veteran has a better chance of securing adequate housing in Portland, Oreg., than in any other city in the United States, a survey conducted by Yank News disclosed last week. There is a reason for it, and a carefully planned one. Four days after the Japanese deliberately loosed the American juggernaut of World War II, on Dec. 11, 1941, to be exact, Mayor Earl Riley's Housing Authority of Portland crackled into being and, with the war's duration, it is still functioning—if anything, more smoothly, efficiently.

Portland's housing record, in fact, is so outstanding that it has been studied and imitated by most of the local housing authorities on the west coast with the result that the housing shortage in Los Angeles, Seattle, and San Francisco is reported to be more fluid than at any time since 1943. The change comes as a welcome relief to many war-weary men and their families.

Credit for the situation in the Portland area is due in no little measure to Mayor Earl Riley. Foreseeing the inevitable jam occasioned by thousands of homeward-bound men, Riley has kept alive an unflagging interest in the activities of his five-man housing committee and its problems and, while many other cities were growing lax with the return to peacetime existence, he has, by way of comparison, demanded more "steam" yet.

Riley's judgment was never more reasonable than when he appointed quiet, 48-year-old Harry Freeman as executive director, secretary-treasurer of the HAP.

Formerly a successful landscape engineer, Freeman, since his appointment January 8, 1942, has established a record in housing administration that is the envy of his contemporaries. Starting from scratch and with no previous experience in that capacity, Freeman learned his trade so well that he has to date placed in Government-owned projects and rental homes a possible 30,000 persons. Although his present staff has been pared to about 900, due to shipyard closure, at one time he maintained, directed, and supervised more than 1,300 workers—all engaged in housing homeless people.

(In Portland housing projects at present there are about 4,000 veterans and their families—comprising about 15,000 persons.)

Freeman's mode d'operation is somewhat at variance with the federally prescribed procedure in securing homes for veterans.

Required, of course, to abide by certain rules and regulations laid down by the FHA, he operates, nonetheless, by many methods of his own manufacture.

One of the pet instructions his help gets is that each shall take a bona fide, personal interest in the man making application for a home. If a veteran, for instance, works in a certain area, every effort is required to place the applicant near his work. A study is made of his billfold and the size of his family considered before he is placed. Freeman's aides are, in fact, "house hunters" in all the phrase implies, and, although his office is not asked to proceed further than the placing of veterans in Government-owned projects, his records are dotted with instances wherein he has settled families in rental homes.

"We are not, however, in competition with real-estate houses or brokers," he explains. "My aides are always instructed to deal, in the case of private dwellings, with agencies."

Of the many housing projects under his direction, Freeman's pet is Vanport City, the largest project of its kind in the Nation. Now a big city in itself, the community has become so stabilized and well incorporated that the Oregon State System of Higher Education last week opened an extension college there. Summer school for veterans is now in session, and the Vanport University is expected to remain in existence until summer of 1947.

Since assuming his post, Freeman has clipped red tape in application procedure to an insignificant minimum. In fact, conditions are such at present that about all a veteran has to do to get a home is appear at Freeman's office, fill out a card, and within a few days he's settled.

Basic Guides for Moral Training—Excerpts From a Statement Issued by His Excellency, the Most Reverend John T. McNicholas, O. P., S. T. M., June 22, 1946

OF
HON. CHARLES A. BUCKLEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Education I have objected to the discrimination in several Federal aid-to-education bills which came before our committee. I believe that Federal aid should be granted through the States for all schools and all school children in need thereof. The Federal Government should not restrict its assistance to public schools alone. In this connection I am pleased to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD some pertinent excerpts from a recent statement by the Most Reverend John T. McNicholas, O. P., S. T. M., archbishop of Cincinnati, which reflect my attitude on this very important question.

Parents are equally responsible for the mental development and intellectual training of their children. This education of children must take place under the freedom of religion that parents enjoy, and under American freedom of education that our Government guarantees. Parents, having the right to educate their children in the schools of their conscientious choice, should get help, if they need it, from the State for the education of their children. All parents, whatever be their faith, should get this help when the need can be proven to the State. This is true American freedom of education. To deny parents the help which they need for the education of their children is to attempt to secularize wholly, or to sovietize, our system of education. It is not American freedom of education.

To deprive parents of true American freedom to educate their children in the schools of their conscientious choice because they have not the means to do so, is indirectly a violation of our freedom of religion. Millions of Catholic parents are bound in conscience and by their religion to have their children trained in moral living during their school years. To tell poor parents that their children must receive instruction from public teachers and must be deprived of freedom of education, unless from the family treasury they can pay for the education of their children, means that legislators and State constitutions and laws nullify our freedom of education. The consciences of poor religious parents should not be strained in this way. Up to now our Federal Government has not been unfair and discriminatory in the field of education, as many States have been. Parents of all faiths, especially poor parents, should entreat their representatives in Congress not to put our Federal Government in a wrong light, not to force it to be discriminatory and unjust to parents who need help to educate their children. These parents should make it clear to legislators in Congress that they are asking help in order to give our country better citizens, who recognize the obligation of moral living. Poor parents and parents who toil, of all religious faiths in America, should become articulate in demanding the help they need—which need they can be called upon to prove—for the education of their children in the schools of their conscientious choice.

More Federal Jobs

OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Bristol (Pa.) Courier of July 23, 1946:

MORE FEDERAL JOBS

American taxpayers, who have been uncomfortably aware of the outrageous padding of Federal pay rolls with political workers intended to keep the Democrats in power this fall, may have been given a false sense of relief by a recent Washington dispatch.

This was widely used, usually under a heading such as this: "Federal pay roll drops $13,000,000,000."

It was released by Secretary of Commerce Wallace, and, as has often happened with this publicity-minded gentleman, gives an entirely erroneous impression. Wallace, it will be remembered, is the New Dealer who brought about so much of the current inflation and labor trouble by permitting his Department to say that wages could rise 30 percent after the war without affecting prices.

What he did in the present instance was to compare all Federal pay rolls, as of VJ-day—including the armed services—with those of the present. Naturally, with much of the military demobilized, there has been a heavy drop thus far shown.

What Wallace does not say is that the pay rolls are again moving upward. Fortunately for those who want to know the real facts, a complete survey of current Federal pay rolls was laid before the United States Senate on July 10, by Senator BYRD, Democrat, Virginia.

This tells a quite different story from the propaganda of Secretary Wallace.

Instead of the drop which Wallace's report tries to prove, the figures show that between last April and May, the number of nonmilitary employees actually jumped 24,813.

The total Federal employment for May, which is the latest month for which figures are available, shows the total to be 2,848,527. This is almost exactly three times the number of public employees which Senator Byrd, who is an acknowledged expert on this subject, has estimated are really needed to do Uncle Sam's work.

The various spots in which especially startling increases took place are interestng.

Some of them are: Agrculture, increase 4,641; Interior, increase 1,601; Post Office (run by the Democratic national chairman) increase 2,581; State Department, increase 589; Office of Price Administration, increase 1,070; War Assets Administration, increase 2,036; Federal Works Agency, increase 485; Maritime Commission, increase 369; National Housing Agency, increase 864; Panama Canal, increase 115; Veterans' Administration, increase 11,688.

The simple figures of the number of employees in some of these projects clearly show how the Democratic high command is exploiting pay rolls trying to buy the coming elections with the public's money.

The number of Federal employees required to operate the Panama Canal, for example, is 16,357—which is probably as many employables as there are in all Bucks County.

The Veterans' Administration pay roll now is up to 166,116, though dissatisfaction over the red tape and exasperations of this agency is almost universal.

Housing is being bled to the tune of 16,357 employees in the one agency of FHA, not counting the staffs of many other units which are involved—and despite the fact that all which the Federal Government seems to have accomplished thus far is stopping a number of private citizens from going ahead with construction.

To print the publications of the Federal Government, most of it propaganda for the Democratic Party, requires the services of 7,259 printers.

The Federal Security Agency lists 31,733; the General Accounting Office, 14,244; the Maritime Commission, 9,914; the War Assets Administration, 32,427; the Federal Works Agency (with virtually no projects), 22,825; the RFC, 11,876; the Post Office nearly half a million, or 484,827; the Department of the Interior, 49,623; the Agricultural Department, 92,273; the Treasury Department, 108,555.

Most of these figures are outrageous. The wildest boondoggling of the old-time WPA could not surpass such flagrant waste as these statistics imply, and the basic immorality of this blatant effort to buy future elections with the public's money show the tragic depths to which public decorum has sunk.

Instead of congratulating themselves, as Secretary Wallace would have them do, because part of the Federal pay roll automatically dried up with the demobilization of the armed forces, the American people need to direct their attention to the frightful waste still going on.

According to observers, at least 2,000,000 Federal pay-rollers could be dropped—with an increase, not a decrease, in Government efficiency.

If these average $4,000 a year, which is the figure in Secretary Wallace's calculations, the saving would be $8,000,000,000 a year.

This is more than twice the British loan. It would be enough in one stroke to put the National Budget in balance. It is twice as much as the Republican Party used to require to run the entire Federal Government—and run it well. It is about one-fourth of the total of Federal taxes to be collected this year—more than a fourth if the optimistic current estimates of the New Dealers do not materialize.

If a burglar broke into your home and stole $285.75 belonging to your family, you would think that was pretty hard lines, and if you knew he was planning a similar visit every year you'd be quite upset about it.

Yet the national administration is pilfering that amount from the pockets of every typical American family of five—$57.15 for each man, woman, and child—taking it from their pockets every year and spending it for no other discoverable purpose than to keep themselves in power.

How long will such a condition be tolerated?

Ascertainment of Cause and Cure of Cancer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 24 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement given before the Senate subcommittee which has been taking testimony on the proposed legislation relative to cancer. The statement was made by the Honorable MATTHEW M. NEELY, a Representative in Congress from the State of West Virginia, and a former distinguished Member of the Senate. His statement is in support of the bill dealing with cancer, of which he is the author in the House, and I am the author in the Senate. The bill authorizes $100,000,000 to be spent by the President, with certain limitations, in the effort to find the cause and cure of cancer. The statement Representative NEELY has made is a very moving one, and I am sure every Senator who reads it will profit from doing so.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROCEEDINGS

Senator PEPPER (chairman of subcommittee). The hearing will be resumed.

Representative and former distinguished Senator from West Virginia, and co-author of this bill, Hon. MATTHEW M. NEELY, has honored us by coming this morning, and we are going to give him an opportunity to make any statement that he will on this matter before proceeding with the other witnesses.

STATEMENT OF HON. MATTHEW M. NEELY, A REPRESENTATIVE IN THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES FROM THE STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA

Senator PEPPER, Senator NEELY, we are very glad to have you here; and again I want to say that this bill is a companion bill to the bill introduced in the House by Senator NEELY, and I am glad to be associated with him in this commendable endeavor.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the memorable language of one of your famous body's most famous orators and statesmen, Daniel Webster, let me at once emphatically declare that "sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, I give my hand and my heart" to Senate bill No. 1875, the object of which is to exterminate cancer—mankind's most aggressive, merciless, and agonizing foe.

According to a classical Grecian myth, a monster known as the Sphinx, which was capable of propounding difficult riddles and of destroying all who failed in their attempts to solve them, voraciously preyed upon the people of Thebes until the rapidly dwindling population of that ancient city was threatened with annihilation. But a courageous, resourceful young hero named Oedipus averted the impending calamity. He, with drawn sword, advanced upon the Sphinx which imperiously warned him that he would forfeit his life if he did not correctly answer this enigma: "What animal is that which has four feet at morning bright, has two at noon, and three at night?"

Oedipus promptly and wisely responded: "Man. In the morning of his life he travels on all fours, at noon he walks with two feet, which at night he supplements with a cane."

The solving of the riddle robbed the Sphinx of her extraordinary power and rendered her vulnerable. Thereupon Oedipus destroyed her and thus saved from extinction the remnant of the people of Thebes.

As all the dwellers of the Grecian city were threatened by the Sphinx so all the people in the whole wide world are threatened by cancer, a loathsome scourge a thousand times more terrifying and deadly than a wilderness of monsters such as that which the son of Laius and Jocasta slew before the gates of Thebes. Startling facts corroborate this sweeping assertion, and clearly show that mankind is confronted with the dilemma of destroying cancer or being destroyed by it.

A recent authority declares that in England and Wales the death rate from this scourge has increased more than 990 percent in less than a hundred years. Hoffman, a great American authority on the mortality from cancer, says, in his comprehensive work which was published in 1915, that its death rate in the United States doubled during the preceding 40 years. For a half a century a similar rate of increase has prevailed throughout the world.

In May 1928 I passed through the Senate the first bill for the exclusive purpose of obtaining governmental assistance in solving the cancer problem that was ever approved by either House of Congress. In that year cancer killed 100,558 of the people of the United States who were 40 years of age or older.

In 1943, the last year for which relevant accurate data is available, cancer killed of the people of this country who had reached the age of 40 years or more 156,503. This was equivalent to an increase in the death date of more than 55 percent in 15 years. In 1944 the total death toll from cancer in the United States was 171,171. In the year 1928 cancer caused a death in this country, on the average, every 5 minutes and 30 seconds. In 1944 every time the clock ticked away 3 minutes and 4 seconds cancer sent someone's father, mother, brother, sister, husband, wife, or child in unspeakable agony from the joyous land of the living into the voiceless land of the dead.

Medical science has conquered yellow fever, diphtheria, typhoid, smallpox, and many other dire afflictions. Medical science has even robbed leprosy and tuberculosis of their terrors. But in spite of all that physicians, surgeons, chemists, biologists, and all other scientists have amazingly accomplished, cancer is still the unconquered, unconquerable, and defiant foe of the human race. Radium, X-ray, and the surgeon's knife are the only generally approved means of combating this frightful destroyer. Every passing year adds to the demonstrations that cancer cannot be eradicated by these or any other means now known, and that it is impossible, with available funds, existing facilities, and present methods, either to check the persistent acceleration of cancer's terrifying encroachment or stay the progressive increase of its horrifying destruction in this or any other land.

For generations the world has been waging war against cancer with bows and arrows and other primitive weapons of the Stone Age. In this life-and-death struggle no country has yet supplied its scientists with sufficient funds to enable them to advance even to the age of the flintlock musket. And while we persist in feebly combating cancer in the manner approved in our grandmothers' days, the insatiate monster, cancer, continues to "laugh at our calamity and mock at our fear when it cometh as desolation." Statistics as unerring as Holy Writ demonstrate that every Nation is traveling a cancer road that leads straight to the sepulcher of the human race.

"The time is ripe, and rotten-ripe for change;
Then let it come: I have no dread of what Is called for by the instinct of mankind."

The enactment of the bill before you will enable a host of eager scientists, who have long been handicapped by a lack of funds, to exchange their useless bows and arrows for weapons as modern as this afternoon, and with them proceed to win victories in keeping with the general, hopeful, prayerful expectations of the atomic age that has burst upon the world.

It is a most distressing fact that the deadliest types of cancer in their later stages inflict upon their wretched victims torture more excruciating than any other known to man. And it is impossible, without fatal consequences, to administer anesthetics to these pitiful sufferers in sufficient quantities to render them oblivious to their agony.

Had the famous but brutal artist Parrhasius beheld the heart-rending suffering of an expiring victim of cancer, he would have had no reason to tear open the wounds of a dying captive soldier in order to obtain sufficient inspiration to impel him to portray an extraordinary expression of agony, or cry out in ecstasy:

"How fearfully he stifles that short moan, Gods! If I could but paint a dying groan."

According to reliable experts, cancer has already branded 17,000,000 of our living for its future victims. If the United States were in the regular shape of a parallelogram, its entire borderline would be approximately 7,000 miles long, and if the 17,000,000 branded for death are of the average height and should be eventually buried in a single grave, side by side, in a double line, that grave would be long enough to extend entirely around this 7,000-mile border of the country and for an additional distance as great as that from New York City to Baltimore.

During the Second World War the Nazis and the Japanese killed 273,000 of our service men and women. But during the three war years cancer killed of our people 501,019—nearly twice as many as our warring enemies, armed with the most deadly of modern weapons, were able to destroy in the same length of time.

The appropriation authorized by the bill is insignificant in comparison with the transcendent importance of discovering means of curing and preventing cancer. The atomic bomb cost us $2,000,000,000. The cost of our participation in the recent war was at the average rate of $221,043,000 a day. And please bear in mind that this expenditure was made to defeat a foe whose power of destruction was only a little more than half as great as that of cancer. The entire appropriation sought by the bill is $10,000,000 less than half a day's cost of our participation in the last World War.

The amount of the appropriation should be contrasted with the enormous loss which the American people will continue to suffer until a cure for cancer is found. Dr. Louis I. Dublin, noted statistician for the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., pointed out in 1928 that in the preceding year cancer lost the people of the United States $800,000,000. According to the doctor, the average necessary cost of medicine and care for each patient who dies of this frightful affliction is at least a thousand dollars. Upon this basis, in 1944 cancer cost the people of the United States, for care and medicine alone, $171,171,000; and when the estimated economic value of those destroyed is added to the foregoing, it appears that the people of this country in 1944 suffered a total loss from cancer of more than $1,229,000,000. The loss for 1945 has not yet been accurately ascertained, but it is known to be much greater than it was in 1944.

Mr. Chairman, it is my hope that the committee will make the following brief amendments to the bill: Insert after the word "place" on page 1 the words "or places;" and on page 2 at the proper place insert "this appropriation shall be available until expended." To all importunities for crippling or restrictive amendments such as that of providing that the appropriation shall be channeled through particular agencies or organizations, I entreat you to turn deaf ears.

The proponent of the bill, the distinguished Senator PEPPER, is obviously alive to the impossibility of solving the cancer problem by any means now known and also to the fact that the only hope of finding a cancer preventive or cure lies in new thought, new methods, and new experiments as revolutionary as those that produced the atomic bomb.

The bill, if enacted in its present form, will enable the President to seek the cooperation of the most preeminent scientists of the earth such, for example, as Dr. Einstein, those who solved the problem of utilizing atomic energy, members of the National Academy of Sciences, and outstanding experts from the great institutions of learning and investigation of the United States, England, Russia, France, Germany, and all other countries of the world in which any who are apparently capable of helping to speed humanity's victory over cancer may be found.

Let nothing be written into the bill that will prevent the President and this mobilized army of scientists from determining how and when and where the requested appropriation can be best expended in order to assure the highest probability of success in this the greatest venture ever launched by the Congress or any other legislative body in behalf of the alleviation of the suffering of mankind.

Let every cherished soldier in this mighty army of beneficent service to the cancer-stricken millions of the world be free to proceed in accordance with his own judgment to help achieve the high and holy purposes of the bill; and let every soldier who advances against the relentless, bloodthirsty cancer foe find impelling inspiration in the stirring supplication of Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes:

"Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll.
Leave thy low-vaulted past.
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea."

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I sincerely thank you again and again for having most generously permitted me to address you in behalf of the supremely important measure before you.

Senator PEPPER. Thank you, Senator. I wish that everyone could have heard what you have said.

Social Security Amendments a Disappointment—the People Need the Wagner-Murray-Dingell Bill Quickly Enacted

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH DE LACY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. DE LACY. Mr. Speaker, the Social Security Act amendments, H. R. 7037, before us today are a great disappointment.

To be sure, H. R. 7037 does a measure of justice to veterans. In the new section, 210, which it adds to the Social Security Act, the veteran is made eligible for 3 years following his discharge to survivors' insurance protection. If he dies within that 3-year period his survivors are entitled to a primary insurance benefit in an amount depending on how long he had been in the service and on how many years he earned $200 in wages.

The formula is complicated, but the idea is that the widow, if she has one or more of the deceased's children in her care, or when she reaches 65, will receive a monthly benefit, and so will all the vet's children under 18.

Merchant seamen are brought under unemployment compensation for the first time by this bill.

The present amendments also raised Federal contributions to old-age assistance and blind assistance programs from $20 to $25 a month, making $50 pensions possible in every State that can raise the other half, its share of the matching funds.

And they increase Federal contributions toward aid to dependent children from $9 and $6 to $13.50 and $9, making it possible for States to pay $27 a month to the first dependent child and $18 for each dependent child thereafter.

These are all important improvements, amendments the whole country will welcome.

It is not the good things that are in the bill, but the good things that are not in it which are a source of acute disappointment to supporters of a more inclusive security program.

Although the Ways and Means Committee has employed an expert staff, spending $50,000 for much valuable research, and has heard valuable testimony for days and weeks, the committee amendments do not increase the amount of insurance benefits, and even the pension increase is too small. They do not broaden the coverage of the old-age and survivors' insurance program. They do not provide insurance for permanent total disability. They do not provide prepaid medical care from a doctor of the patient's own choice. They do not provide for hospitalization, or for accident insurance, or for maternity care and expenses.

And perhaps equally important, the committee's amendments do nothing to help the poorest States.

On this last point the debate, led by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] was sharpest.

Under the 50–50 matching system—

Mr. GORE told the House—the Federal Government grants most assistance to the States which need it least and grants least to the States which need it most.

The first bill reported out by the committee had included a sliding scale for matching funds, so that senior citizens in the poorer State of Mississippi would be able to get a higher percentage of Federal funds than would a senior citizen in California or Washington.

The average pension per family paid in Mississippi is $26.30. Kentucky pays the lowest, with $21.45 as the family average. My own State of Washington pays the highest, averaging $100 per family, as of April 1946.

The committee's original idea was that in the 10 poorest States, at least, senior citizens and the blind could never get as much as in the richer States, because these low-income States could not afford to match Federal funds fully. Therefore, the committee's first bill provided a formula by which more Federal matching funds would go into the poorer States and less into the richer States.

This is essentially just, but for some reason the committee held another meeting and reversed itself.

I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that the Ways and Means Committee would have brought out a bill that increased benefits, enlarged the number entitled to them, and broadened the scope of the act to include health, hospitalization, and all forms of necessary insurance against accidents, as well as to protect survivors.

The inadequacies of the amendments before us prove the need for speedy action on the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill.

I shall support the amendments before us, inadequate as they are, but we ought to stay in session until some of this essential health and housing and security legislation is passed.

We ought to do something for the plain man and his family.

The Issues Are Sharply Drawn

OF

HON. ELLIS E. PATTERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, barely a year has passed since the end of World War II, yet we have neither one world nor even a united America. Our newspapers and the leading figures in our Government seem generally agreed that the fault lies on one hand with Soviet Russia and on the other hand with organized labor. The logic of their position is that if only we get tough enough with both these groups all our problems will be solved.

Therefore, the troops were called out against our organized railroad workers and $15,000,000,000 was earmarked for our War Department, which is double the 1940–41 figure. Somehow neither action solves our problems.

It is my belief that we are getting tough with the wrong people. The trouble in the world today stems from the fact that the unity of the United States, Great Britain, and the Soviet Union, upon which we based our hopes for peace, is being deliberately undermined—and undermined by the same forces which are hamstringing the American labor movement with repressive legislation while they remove control after control from our monopolies and cartels.

NOTE THE RELATION BETWEEN THE FOLLOWING FACTS

The United States and Great Britain have failed to remove military potentials from Japan or from our zones in Germany. We are supporting the same industrialists who were the backbone of the Axis. We are building up the notoriously reactionary Kuomintang group in China while refusing to see Franco as a threat to peace. We keep the Iranian question on the agenda of the United Nations long after both the U. S. S. R. and Iran announce its settlement, yet we condone the continued presence of British troops in Greece and Indonesia, and of American troops in China, long after their missions have been completed. We feverishly build a stock pile of atom bombs; create spy scares in headlines but devote only a few newspaper lines to announcing the acquittal of the so-called spies.

HOME FRONT FIASCO

On the home front, we have failed the veteran in his housing, job, educational, and health problems. We have failed to avoid the dangers of inflation. We have failed to pass the FEPC or the anti-poll-tax bill. The burden of taxation is being shifted more and more onto the little man. Restrictive legislation, like the Hobbs bill and the emergency labor bill is destroying labor's hard-won freedoms.

Beyond all this, the spirit of intolerance grows throughout the land. The Ku Klux Klan rides again. The hate groups that specialize in anti-Semitism, race hatred, and Red baiting are resurgent and finding ready outlets for their poison.

WHERE DOES THE BLAME LIE?

Put these pieces together and you have a pattern of reaction—reaction from the foreign and domestic policies of Franklin D. Roosevelt and toward fascism and war.

Who are the termites responsible for undermining our peace and security? It would be wrong to try to place the blame solely on either the Republican or the Democratic Party. Within the administration and in Congress today, there is a coalition of both parties intent on driving us down the path of disaster.

The reactionary Republicans and the reactionary Democrats speak with a single voice. It is not the voice of the people. The people want peace, a decent standard of living, equality of opportunity for all. The "Big Voice" that is outshouting the people's desires today belongs to the giant corporations whose propaganda chokes our newspapers and our air waves—and finds a docile echo in the dominant coalition in Congress who do their bidding. Big business wants super profits through inflation at home and control of markets abroad. Those who stand in their way, therefore, must be crushed. Since the labor movement has been the most consistent defender of democracy at home, and the progressive forces the most consistent champions of peace abroad, these are under the sharpest attack.

HERE IS YOUR CHOICE

The American people in the past have proved themselves more than a match for the giants of industry who would deprive them of their birthright. But this November, the people will need more wisdom and better organization than ever before. If they wish to preserve their hard-won peace and extend their democracy, they will have to choose their representatives, not from traditional party alinement, but on the basis of how each individual candidate meets the test of the issues. And the issues are sharply drawn.

Either Big Three unity, international control of the atom bomb, complete destruction of fascism, and respect for the independence of all nations—or the threat of a new war.

Either control of inflation, better distribution of national income, and freedom from want and from fear—or economic collapse.

Each vote will be a step in one or the other direction—either toward peace and democracy or World War III and ruin.

John Taber: Watchdog of the Treasury

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY
OF VERMONT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, the air is full of awards properly made to those who have rendered military service to their country in its time of need. The medals presented to members of the armed forces who have served beyond the call of duty are well deserved. And yet who ever thought to award a Distinguished-Service Medal to a Member of Congress who worked night and day over many months and through the years to make possible the accomplishments which those who won the medals were able to achieve?

My candidate for such an award is the Honorable JOHN TABER, of New York, ranking minority member of the House Committee on Appropriations.

It does not matter, Mr. Speaker, as you so very well know, what legislative authorization may be enacted unless the Appropriations Committee of the House is ready to pay the bill. I have served on this Committee on Appropriations for a good many years. It has not been an enviable position. Almost everybody was out to get something, and had it not been for the untiring efforts of the Appropriations Committee the wasteful expenditure of the taxpayers' money would have run into billions.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations had a responsibility always to the administration; and to the man who has served as chairman of the committee during the war years I pay my respects at this time for faithful service conscientiously rendered.

Nevertheless, when that is said, the story is not all written until we have paid a well-earned tribute to our colleague JOHN TABER.

To have been over the years the watchdog of the Treasury as the ranking minority member of the House Appropriations Committee—that is to say, the representative of the Republicans, the party of opposition—was a man-killing job. To that job JOHN TABER has devoted himself unsparingly.

Such services so rendered and performed under such circumstances are easily forgotten by some and all too often overlooked. That should not be so.

The country is to be congratulated that as the ranking minority member on the Appropriations Committee during the war we have had a man of such caliber as JOHN TABER. I do not have to tell you that JOHN is well known as a pugnacious bulldog against needless expenditures. As the Honorable Edward Taylor, a former chairman of the committee, said some years ago, the country was "indeed fortunate to have Mr. TABER in the important position of the ranking minority member during the better part of one of the most critical decades of our history." This is doubly true so far as the war years and this reconversion era are concerned.

So, Mr. Speaker, as we are about to end this second session of the Seventy-ninth Congress, I make it my business to call the attention of this House to the fact that JOHN TABER has been one of the most active, vigorous, and effective Members of Congress during his entire service here in Washington. He is a credit to the Thirty-eighth District of New York, to his State as a whole, and to his country which he so well has served.

JOHN TABER has saved billions of dollars for the taxpayers of the United States. This fact is not to be minimized.

He has voted against the New Deal regimentation program which could lead to nothing but a dictatorship and communism. He has been fair with all groups of the population. He has done countless things to help the veteran, the farmer, the workingman here in America.

I remember when I first came here—and it has been my privilege to serve with him on the Appropriations Committee for many years—that JOHN TABER wrote most of the veterans' legislation which is now on the books. He has stood for every reasonable bit of legislation which would really help the veteran. The veterans do not forget that fact.

JOHN TABER never demagogs. He is a fearless fighter for what he believes to be right.

During the war it was my privilege to serve upon the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Navy. There I was able to see the effective work that JOHN TABER did in connection with the prosecution of the war. He supported every measure as we approached the war which would enable us to fight it, and during the war he was a tower of strength for the United States. That is not to be forgotten.

At a dinner held in his honor by the New York delegation in Congress on May 22, 1946, the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Republican leader of the House, made this statement:

I cannot imagine what a Congress would be like without JOHN TABER. He has fought hard against the enormous appropriations that have been brought here by the New Deal and has saved the country billions of dollars.

The people of his district would make a great mistake if they failed to reelect JOHN TABER to Congress. We are going to take over control of the Congress, and he will be the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee and in a position to cut out the regimenting and the vicious activities of the Democratic administration. He is the one who knows how to do it and knows where it can be done and every Republican in the House is counting upon him to do it.

That dinner and that endorsement testify to the regard in which he is held here in Congress. JOHN TABER is needed. Today, and for years, he has been one of the most active Members on the floor, and he is always listened to with respect because he knows what he is talking about.

In a recent poll taken by Pageant magazine for August, JOHN TABER was voted one of the two hardest-working Members in the House of Representatives and one of the two best-informed on domestic affairs. I believe that he spends as many hours as anyone in the House at his work, and I know that his efforts have been very effective in saving for the Treasury billions of dollars which needed to be saved.

Mr. Speaker, as a measure of the high regard in which I hold JOHN TABER, I can only reiterate here what I have said many times elsewhere over the years, and in this statement a great many of our colleagues heartily concur: I have long felt that in a Republican administration the logical choice for Secretary of the Treasury, and the man best qualified for the position, would be our friend JOHN TABER. His native ability, his talent for hard, unstinting labor, the influence he wields in this body and in the country, entitle him to the 100 percent endorsement of his district.

Excerpts From Addresses Made on the Floor of Congress by Hon. J. Harry McGregor, of Ohio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, since I have been a Member of the House of Representatives, I have earnestly endeavored to voice on the floor of Congress the opinions of the people of the Seventeenth District of Ohio, whom I have the honor to represent. I have endeavored to receive these opinions by holding meetings in the various county courthouses each summer, by sending out questionnaires annually, and by keeping in constant contact with my constituents relative to their suggestions and views.

I, therefore, under consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, include excerpts of various speeches I have made on the floor of Congress relative to our national issues. Anyone who so desires may find these speeches in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the dates indicated:

NATIONAL DEFENSE

I believe American citizens who must do the fighting, the dying, and the paying for any war we get into, still have a right to differ as to our methods of defense, as to how far we ought to get into this war, and as to what our course for the future ought to be. As for myself, I want to say to you that I believe the Nation ought to turn, with the same energy it would if Washington were being bombed, to produce a national defense. We ought to be able to produce that national defense and at the same time vastly aid Britain with munitions of war. We have the productive capacity to do that. Therefore, in conclusion I want to say that for my own part I think we must strain every fiber of our being to produce a national defense, and that we will have to see this thing through as a united people wholeheartedly devoted to the cause of winning the war, and protecting ourselves against any and all dictators.

(February 4, 1941, 9 months before Pearl Harbor)

We, of Congress, are those individuals who should have the information that will give us the understanding of the international affairs that we might give to the people back home true representative government. I call upon the leaders of this administration, and of this Congress, to submit to this body that information and quit forever the secret-chamber meetings of a select few. I learned from my people that they want 3 things: First, peace; second, a strong defense program; and, third, a decentralization of power. We can and we must extend full aid to those who are fighting aggression if only for our own defense, but we cannot, we must not, abandon our own free Government in the process.

VOTE FOR ARMED FORCES

(December 8, 1943)

Give to the men and women of our fighting units the right to vote, as well as legislation that will give a cash payment at the time of their discharge. The legislation relative to voting should allow them the franchise with a minimum of red tape and trouble. Since they are fighting to save our country, they want to vote to save our country. Thousands of men are being discharged practically penniless. Let's give them immediate financial assistance to help them get readjusted to civilian life. These are obligations that we cannot conscientiously postpone any longer.

I am glad to take the floor and fight for the right of those who are wearing the uniform of our country. I will say unequivocally that I want our armed forces to vote, but I don't want them to be penalized or discriminated against because they are wearing the uniform. They certainly are entitled to the same ballot you and I have. They are American citizens giving their lives that you and I might live and vote for all those we want in public office. Let's give them that same privilege.

MCGREGOR INTRODUCES BILL TO ASSIST VETERANS IN POSTWAR PROGRAM

Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill which I firmly believe merits the consideration and prompt action of this body. The bill, H. R. 2991, reads as follows:

"A bill to furnish enlisted personnel with transportation to their homes and with 30 days' leave immediately prior to their honorable discharge from the armed forces

"Be it enacted, etc., That each enlisted member of the land or naval forces of the United States shall, when it is determined that he is eligible to be honorably discharged from such service, be furnished the cost of transportation to his place of residence by common carrier and by the best available route, and shall be granted a leave of absence or furlough with full service pay for such time as he may require to return to his place of residence and for 30 additional days. Upon the termination of such leave of absence or furlough if he so desires he shall be immediately discharged from such service at his place of residence. For the purposes of this act, any such person may designate as his place of residence either his actual place of residence, the place of residence of his wife, or the place of residence of one or both of his parents.

"SEC. 2. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively, shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act."

This is a bill to assist the economic stabilization of the postwar period. This legislation gives to those in military units an opportunity to return home, analyze fully what it means to return to civilian life, and then allows the veterans to determine whether or not they want to be discharged at that time, or remain a part of the military services.

MCGREGOR URGES REPEAL OF UNFAIR USE TAX ON VEHICLES

Mr. Speaker, on March 21, 1945, I introduced H. R. 2707, a bill to terminate the use tax on motor vehicles and boats. This bill was referred to the Ways and Means Committee, and I am asking that the Membership of the House aid me in carefully analyzing this legislation and assisting me in having this discriminatory tax removed from our statute books.

Following is a letter I have sent to the Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, under date of April 20:

On March 21, I introduced H. R. 2707, which reads as follows:

"'A bill to terminate the use tax on motor vehicles and boats

"'Be it enacted, etc., That section 3540 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the tax on the use of motor vehicles and boats) is amended by inserting at the end thereof a new subsection reading as follows:

"'(k) Termination of tax: The tax imposed by this section shall not apply with respect to any period after June 30, 1945.'

"I would respectfully ask that you advise me the earliest possible date on which this bill can be given consideration by your committee.

"Under the present law a $5 Federal use tax is imposed on all motor vehicles. I am of the opinion, Mr. Chairman, that this is unfair and discriminatory. The use tax is not based upon a value of the motor vehicle or the number of miles traveled by that vehicle. For example, Mr. A may own an automobile worth $3,000 which has traveled 30,000 miles per year, and Mr. B may own an automobile worth $100 which travels 1,000 miles per year—yet both are forced to pay the same tax, namely $5.

"The records prove, Mr. Chairman, this law has never been enforced and I think you will find upon careful study that only approximately 65 to 75 percent pay this tax. I am of the opinion if we are going to have the tax, let us see that it is enforced and all pay it, or do away with the tax entirely."

AUTO USE TAX

I desire to thank the membership of the Ways and Means Committee for incorporating into the tax bill now before us for consideration, H. R. 4309, legislation I had introduced to terminate the use tax on motor vehicles and boats. On March 21, 1945, I introduced H. R. 2707. I introduced a similar bill on July 5, 1945 (H. R. 3692) which terminated the tax June 30, 1946.

I have received many commendatory letters because of my actions insisting on the repeal of this tax and I certainly feel my efforts have been worth while.

MCGREGOR PROTECTS AMERICAN AGRICULTURE, LABOR, AND INDUSTRY

I certainly cannot see my way clear to support legislation that will give to any one individual, regardless of who, the power to raise or lower tariff rates 50 percent as incorporated in H. R. 2652. I feel that such power given to the individual would, if he saw fit, enable him to ruin any industry in our United States.

I am of the firm conviction the passage of this bill in its present form would completely tie the hands of industry and would make idle hundreds of thousands of employees.

We all realize that for a number of years, we have been sending farm machinery, high-grade industrial machinery and tools to foreign countries to help produce food and war equipment. This machinery—made in the United States—could easily be changed, after the war, to produce food and industrial equipment to be shipped to America and directed to compete with our own industrial and farm production.

This bill would allow products to be brought into this country that had been manufactured in foreign countries, under a prevailing wage rate of 20 to 25 cents a day, and this, most assuredly, would be detrimental to American industry, labor, and agriculture. How are we going to provide jobs for the American people—jobs for the returning veterans—when we transfer our pay rolls to foreign countries?

I feel H. R. 2652 would force our American industry and labor to compete with other nations that have not recognized individual rights and that do not have a living wage rate established, social security for employees, and have living conditions not on a par with this country. I assure you I will oppose any legislation that will attempt to put the American people on a lower standard of living, such as seems to prevail in some other countries. I believe in protecting America—so I intend to vote against H. R. 2652, which I think is truly a bill to create widespread unemployment.

MCGREGOR ASKS INVESTIGATION OF OPA

I view the present sugar and meat shortage with alarm. If there had been forethought and intelligent management by the Office of Price Administration in the control of both these items, there would be a fair distribution now in effect. The OPA, which controls meat and sugar, and other products, has broken faith with the people, and has issued inconsistent rules and regulations that hinder production and distribution. The OPA has made promises and broken them, all because, in my opinion, this Agency is deluged with individuals and theorists who have no practical knowledge of the subjects they are attempting to administer.

The people of the Seventeenth District of Ohio, whom I have the honor to represent, are sacrificing and doing everything within their power to bring the war to an early conclusion, but they certainly are becoming disgusted—and rightfully so—with the bungling of the OPA.

I contact the OPA almost daily in an effort to aid my constituents, but about all the assistance I obtain is a promise that "something will be done." It is beyond the stretch of my imagination how the officials of the OPA can sit day after day and let these difficulties crowd around them, and only give theoretical replies stating "we will have relief."

Mr. Speaker, I urge a complete investigation of the OPA and the removal of those individuals who are responsible for the deplorable activities of this agency.

MCGREGOR URGES IMMEDIATE ACTION ON DEMOBILIZATION

(October 9, 1945)

Mr. Speaker, I am not at all satisfied with the progress being made by those having charge of releasing men and women from our military units, and I am wondering about the reasons behind the statement made by General Hershey, National Director of Selective Service, when he stated at Denver, Colo., on August 21, 1944, and I quote:

"We can keep people in the Army about as cheaply as we could create an agency for them when they are out."

Do those in control really desire that our boys be released or do they wish to keep them in service for personal reasons? Is that why our boys are not being demobilized more rapidly?

The dissatisfaction which has resulted from the handling of the present demobilization program certainly justifies Congress in taking immediate action to bring order out of chaos. Mr. Speaker, it is obvious from the letters that I have received in my office from both officers and enlisted men that some of our commanding officers do not want men released from their commands because they are fearful their ranks will be reduced. I vigorously object to the right or authority of any one commanding officer to declare a man essential and irreplaceable, and thereby prevent that man from being discharged within 90 days, regardless of his qualifications for release including points and other requirements as set forth by the current discharge regulations. It has been proved no man is indispensable.

We must bring these boys and girls home so they can be with their families, finish their education, and again get started in civilian life. It is time for Congress to once again become a truly legislative body governed only by the people as a whole, and not by one group or a few individuals.

CONGRESS SHOULD ACT TO SPEED UP DEMOBILIZATION

(November 21, 1945)

Mr. Speaker, the records prove the military authorities are inconsistent in handling the demobilization program and are not fully utilizing the equipment we have available. They tell us we have no ships to bring the boys home. Where are the $22,000,000,000 worth of ships built for war? We had plenty of ships to take them over—why can't we have the same number to bring them back?

On October 9, 1945, I made a speech on the floor of this House, and I quote the last paragraph of that speech—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Tuesday, October 9, 1945, page 9656:

"Mr. Speaker, we must bring these boys and girls home so they can be with their families, finish their education, and again get started in civilian life. It is time for Congress to once again become a truly legislative body governed only by the people as a whole and not by one group or a few individuals."

Mr. Speaker, that Congress might have that opportunity, I introduced H. R. 4498 on October 25, 1945, which reads as follows:

"A bill to provide for the discharge or release from active duty of certain members of the armed forces, and restrict jurisdiction of commanding officers in declaring essentiality, and for terminal leave for enlisted personnel

"Be it enacted, etc., That without delay any person upon request shall be discharged from, or released from active duty in, the military or naval forces of the United States and who—

"(1) has served on active duty 12 months or more since September 16, 1940; or

"(2) has, at the time of making such request, a wife or a child or children with whom he maintains (or would but for his service maintain) a bona fide family relationship in his home; or

"(3) has, at the time of making such request, a mother or father dependent upon him for chief support; or

"(4) desires to resume his education or training by enrolling in an educational or training institution, if his education or training was impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with by reason of his entrance into the service. Any such person who was not over 25 years of age at the time he entered the service shall be deemed to have had his education or training impeded, delayed, interrupted, or interfered with; or

"(5) has, at the time of making such request, a status of being essential to the operation of a farm; or

"(6) has the desire and requests to be returned to his business or profession, which he was forced to discontinue or place in other hands at the time of his induction or enlistment into the military service.

"SEC. 2. It shall not be within the jurisdiction of any commanding officer to declare anyone in the military or naval forces essential who meets the requirements in section 1 of this act.

"SEC. 3. All enlisted personnel and noncommissioned officers shall be granted the same terminal leave which is now allowed to commissioned officers."

Mr. Speaker, there has been some talk of a recess of Congress within a few days. I will oppose such recess, as I strongly feel and urge that we should act on the demobilization program. I request the passage of H. R. 4498, which I have introduced. I am satisfied if the leadership of the House will permit a vote on this bill it will be approved by a large majority.

MCGREGOR ASKS IMMEDIATE CONSIDERATION OF THE SUGAR SITUATION

For some time I have been wondering what is being done, or will be done, relative to the sugar situation by the Department of Agriculture or any other department having jurisdiction over this commodity. Last year thousands upon thousands of bushels of fruit and vegetables were wasted because there was not sufficient sugar available for canning. Certainly the department that is responsible for the supply of this commodity has had full knowledge of this condition for some time and it is regrettable at this date little has been done to correct it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at this time no definite program has been arranged. I am fearful that we will soon be placed in the same category as in the past, that is, "too little and too late."

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that an investigation be made by the proper committee of Congress of this entire subject, and at an early date report back to Congress the findings so the people will have a definite knowledge of what they can expect so far as quantity of sugar is concerned. This subject is a most urgent one and I request that immediate action be taken.

MCGREGOR FAVORS PROTECTION OF CRITICAL BUILDING MATERIALS

(June 18, 1946)

In connection with the over-all flood-control legislation, and particularly with reference to the Dillon Dam in Licking County, Ohio, I introduced the following amendment on the floor of the House of Representatives:

"On page 28, line 3, after the period, insert: 'No funds under this act shall be allocated unless actual construction shall have been started prior to this date.' "

I do not believe the Dillon Dam project should be constructed at this time. It seems ridiculous to me that we in Congress give authorization for construction which will destroy houses—approximately 768—that are located in the dam-site area, and on the other hand, we give another Federal department, headed by Mr. Wyatt, Housing Expediter, $400,000,000 for the construction of houses.

I firmly believe in flood control, but not at the expense of using critical building materials that are so essential for home construction.

EXCERPTS FROM MEMORIAL ADDRESS

Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the honor that was given me on May 28 when I was chosen as the Republican Representative to join with my Democratic colleague, the Honorable F. EDWARD HÉBERT, of Louisiana, in addressing the House on the occasion of the annual memorial services for deceased Members of Congress. I ask that I might include excerpts of that speech, as follows:

Selection as a Representative of the people of this Nation is not only a distinctive honor but also a weighty responsibility and demands the best faculties we can muster to cope with the vital problems of our times. Especially is this true today in these United States when forces both within and without are attempting to destroy our constitutional way and fasten upon us individually and collectively a philosophy and system foreign to us and in which our forefathers, who had faith in our future, would have no part.

At no time in the history of Congress has there been prevalent such a vicious and strongly organized campaign as that directed today toward belittling and smearing the American Congress in the eyes of the American people and the world at large. Groups and individuals without respect for, or allegiance to, the constitutional form of government which has made this country great and its standard of living the highest in the entire world, are striving constantly to cast the blame on the Congress indiscriminately for any situation which may or may not occur according to their wishes or designs. Is it any wonder, then, that the imposition of added burdens and worries, not to mention insults and slander, must be reckoned with, and most certainly constitutes not only a menace to our free Government in these United States but also to the well-being of our membership, beset as they are from all sides with an infinite number and variety of tasks, large and small.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that we as representatives of the people, are human, and all humans can, and do, make mistakes, and therefore we are prepared to receive honest criticism. Such criticism may often be deserved, and certainly should not be unwelcome. In many instances criticism comes from those who lack a full understanding of the requisites of membership in either the House or the Senate. While we are and must ever be receptive to suggestions, advice, and criticism of the people whom we represent in these trying days in these hallowed halls, we should not ignore the efforts of individuals or groups unsympathetic with our representative form of government to poison the minds of the American people against their chosen representatives. We would be derelict in our sworn duty to protect our constitutional liberties through longer permitting unjustified and indiscriminate attacks upon the Congress as a whole to continue unheeded and unchecked. It is high time, both to preserve the integrity of the Congress and protect the memories and ideals of those who have served here in the past, as well as those who will serve in the days to come, that we scrutinize and investigate thoroughly the persons and groups seeking to undermine and destroy our truly representative form of government.

Federal Aid for Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. ALEXANDER SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 25 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have recently received an inquiry from Dr. John Bosshart, Commissioner of Education in New Jersey, with regard to the status of our program for Federal aid to education.

It was my hope that Senate bill 181 might be acted on before adjournment. I feel strongly on the subject of equality of educational opportunity for all of our people throughout the country, including especially minority groups such as the children of foreign-born parents, and Negroes in the Deep South.

In replying to Dr. Bosshart's inquiry, I have endeavored to give him an overall picture, as I see it, of the spirit of Senate bill 181, the bill providing Federal aid for education.

I should like to add a word of compliment to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] for the fine job they did in revising that bill before it was reported from the Committee on Education and Labor.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD my letter to Dr. Bosshart on this subject.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JULY 25, 1946.

Dr. JOHN H. BOSSHART,
Commissioner of Education,
Trenton, N. J.

DEAR COMMISSIONER: In reply to your recent inquiry with regard to the status of Federal aid to education, I am glad to make this brief report.

You will recall that some months ago I corresponded with you with regard to the bill known as S. 181, the purpose of which was to assist the States to bring about equality of educational opportunities through the public elementary and secondary schools. You will recall that the first draft of this bill contemplated a State-by-State distribution of funds, covering all the States.

After some study of the matter, it has seemed wise to those of us who are working on this program to make our start by giving aid to those States which, from the Nation-wide survey that has been made, are in immediate need of financial help to bring their standards up to what might properly be called the national minimum. It also seemed to us that this was the first necessity and we were particularly desirous of assisting those States in the Deep South that are less well off financially than our Northern States, and which have the urgent problem of giving educational aid to their Negro population, as well as to the poorer elements among the white people.

The motive behind our thinking in all this study was to establish definitely and as rapidly as we could the principle of equality of opportunity, first in education and ultimately in economic affairs.

Our immediate problem being equality of opportunity in education, we limited S. 181 to that problem. We decided that the absolute minimum per child per year should be $40, and with this program in view the bill was drafted with a formula that recognized the school populations of the States, namely, children between 5 and 17 years of age, and the relative wealth of the various States.

You will recall that when I took this matter up with you, I said if such a formula were adopted, it would mean that New Jersey, which is classified as one of the wealthier States, would get no direct dollars and cents aid from it. As I view our educational processes, however, I feel that every State benefits from the raising of the educational standards throughout the country. This refers not only to the children benefited, but also to the teaching profession which should be strengthened in every possible way. This should include additional financial compensation for our teachers who play such a vital part in the formative years of our boys and girls—the next generation which will be called upon to direct the destiny of the Nation.

We must bear in mind also that in our industrial State of New Jersey we attract year by year individuals who have been educated in other States, and we have especially attracted those from the South. It is distinctly to our advantage to have these new arrivals equipped with the same educational capacities as those whom we train in our own public schools. It is to the distinct advantage of New Jersey to have the standards of education in the poorer States, like Mississippi, and other States in the Deep South, raised to the normal national level. I would like to add in this connection that of course those who have been working on this legislation are in no way satisfied with the $40 per year figure, but we realize that we must start with a figure which we can meet immediately. We then hope to raise the standard as the program progresses year by year.

One of the most important provisions in this bill is the preservation of the independence of the State school authorities. This provision is so important that I quote it in full:

"No department, agency, office, or employee of the United States shall exercise any direction, supervision, or control over, or prescribe any requirements with respect to any school, or any State educational institution or agency, with respect to which any funds have been or may be made available or expended pursuant to this act, nor shall any term or condition of any agreement or any other action taken under this act, whether by agreement or otherwise, relating to any contribution made under this act to or on behalf of any school, or any State educational institution or agency, or any limitation or provision in any appropriation made pursuant to this act, seek to control in any manner, or prescribe requirements with respect to, or authorize any department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States to direct, supervise, or control in any manner, or prescribe any requirements with respect to, the administration, the personnel, the curriculum, the instruction, the methods of instruction, or the materials of instruction, nor shall any provision of this act be interpreted or construed to imply or require any change in any State constitution prerequisite to any State sharing the benefits of this act."

I am enclosing herewith a copy of the revised S. 181 as it was reported to the Senate by the Committee on Education and Labor of which I am a member. This is a matter of too much importance to be passed without adequate debate, and therefore it is not possible that the bill can be brought up for action before we adjourn this summer. It will be, however, one of the matters of first importance for the next session of Congress, and as we have had our hearings and the committee has agreed on the terms of the bill, it should be put on the calendar in January shortly after the convening of the Eightieth Congress.

Before closing this letter, I would like to add that no subject has given me more real interest and concern since I have been in the Senate than this matter of equality of educational opportunity for all our children. Because of my background in the educational field, having been associated for some years with Princeton University, equality of educational opportunities for our young men and women has always seemed to me to be of primary importance to the Nation. This is the very heart of America's greatness and no section of the country should be deprived of the opportunity to produce the geniuses in many fields of endeavor that America has given to the world. I am looking forward with real enthusiasm to the carrying through of this program in the next Congress.

I am sending you this brief report of the situation in order that you and our many school authorities and school teachers throughout the State may be advised as to the progress being made with this important legislation.

Always cordially yours,

H. ALEXANDER SMITH.

Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH CLARK BALDWIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. BALDWIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Horace Fisher Fuller, Jr., of Congdon Hill, Saunderstown, R. I.

The writer of this article has taken special interest in the American school system. He has fought for reforms in the public schools of his home town. His interest in the youth of America is proved by his association with the Boy Scouts of America for 8 years. Mr. Fuller is at present assistant scoutmaster of Troop No. 1, of Wickford, R. I.

Education is a force to which we all owe much. Without it life would be a maze of crudeness. It is the mold that shapes our lives. It is tragic that this vital aspect of our social order is so badly in need of reform.

A vast body of our teachers are grossly underpaid. Many of our school boards are dishonestly run. In many cities the schools are overcrowded to a point that it is tragic. In some schools the subjects are badly taught. There is a crying need for more vocational schools. More free lunches are sorely needed for our school youth.

When are we going to wake up to education's crying needs? The time is now!

Our soldiers overseas gave us a splendid example of man's thirst for knowledge. It will give us incentive to improve our educational system.

At Batangas, Batangas, Luzon, Philippines, where less than a month before the Japs were fighting in the streets of the town the soldiers were attending class in secondary and college-level subjects. It was my privilege to teach class in the GI school there. I can say that the men were dead serious in their quest for knowledge. We must take to heart the motto of the United States Naval Academy, at Annapolis, Md., "Ex scientia tridens," and improve our educational system. The need is now.

Public Power, Rural Electrification—Overcharges

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, we are now entering upon a new fiscal year. I want to talk to the House for a moment about the power question, and especially about our rural electrification program.

It is my earnest desire that instead of pouring American taxpayers' money into the sinkholes of Europe where Communists are murdering and robbing patriotic citizens, raping helpless Christian women, and enslaving the helpless peoples of occupied countries, we at least use a part of it to extend power lines to every farm home in America.

As I have said before, the power business is a public and not a private business. Electricity is now a necessity of our modern life. It must be handled by a monopoly. For four or five concerns to supply electricity to one community would impose overhead charges that would be too expensive for the consumers to bear. Besides, the water power of the Nation already belongs to the American people. Therefore, it is a public and not a private business.

As I have said before electricity is the lifeblood of our advancing civilization. The cheaper the rates, the more freely it flows, and the more freely it flows, the greater are its benefits to mankind.

Every city and every town of any size should own its electric distribution system, just as it does its waterworks, and every small town and every rural section should be included in and served by a cooperative power association, in order to get electricity to every home and every business establishment at the lowest rates possible.

It was with this idea in mind that I joined Senator Norris as coauthor of the bill to create the Tennessee Valley Authority, which, as I have said before, has become the greatest single development of ancient or modern times.

If it were not for the TVA yardstick, showing the American people what electricity is really worth, I dare say that practically every user of electricity in this country would be paying two or three times as much for his electricity as he is paying today—and most of them are paying twice as much as it is worth now, as the tables which I am inserting will show.

When we started in this fight, not 1 farmer out of 10 had electricity in his home, and the ones that did have it were charged such exorbitant rates that they could not use it except for lighting purposes.

Today more than 45 percent of the farm homes in this country have electricity, and I hope we can soon reach them all. We should see to it that a power line is built to every farm home that was reached by the draft in times of war or that can be found by the tax collector in times of peace; and the rates should be held down to where the farmer can afford to use it—not just for lighting purposes but to operate the water pump, the washing machine, the refrigerator, the electric iron, the vacuum cleaner, the electric stove, the milking machine, the cream separator, the feed grinder, and all the other appliances necessary for the operation of the farm, as well as for the comforts and conveniences of the farm home, and the lifting of the burdens of drudgery from the shoulders of the farmer's wife and children.

I started this program of rural electrification in the various counties of the district I represent 2 years before the passage of the law creating the Rural Electrification Administration. We were getting our financial assistance through the Tennessee Valley Authority at that time. When the REA was created, there was a ceiling of $40,000,000 placed on the amount that could be provided for rural electrification each year. At that rate we could not have electrified the farms of this country in 100 years.

In 1938 I offered an amendment to the relief, or the spending bill, as it was called—against which points of order had been waived—asking for an extra $100,000,000 for rural electrification for the fiscal year 1939. That amendment was carried by only six majority on a teller vote. Added to the $40,000,000 already provided, that gave us $140,000,000 for the fiscal year 1939. This really brought rural electrification to life throughout the country, and started us on a program that has done more for the farmers of the country than anything else, or everything else, that Congress has done since I can remember. The next year we got an extra $60,000,000, which, added to the $40,000,000, gave us $100,000,000 for the fiscal year 1940, and we did the same thing for 1941. Then the war came on and slowed down our rural-electrification program.

In the meantime, I secured the adoption of an amendment removing the limit on the amount that could be provided for rural electrification each year, extending the amortization period, or the life of the loan, to 35 years, and reducing the interest rate to the cooperative power associations to 2 percent.

We provided $300,000,000 for loans for rural electrification during the last fiscal year and we have appropriated $250,000,000 for that purpose during the present fiscal year.

As soon as materials become available, including not only wires and poles but transformers and other necessary articles, we expect to extend these lines to reach every farm home in the United States.

At this point I am inserting a table showing the number of farms in this country in 1935, according to the census report, and the number and percentage of farms in each State receiving central station electric service in 1934, 1940, 1944, and 1945.

So far as the American farmers are concerned this is the greatest story ever written in farm statistics. I hope every one who reads this RECORD will study this table carefully and see just what this program means to the farmers of his own State.

I can certainly take consolation from these tables when I realize that the greatest percentage of increase has been made in my own State of Mississippi—1,845 percent—especially when I realize that more than one-fourth of the electrified farms in Mississippi are in the district I represent, and that everyone in that district gets TVA power at TVA rates.

In order that you may understand what that means, and in order that you may comprehend more thoroughly the other tables of statistics which I am inserting, I am going to insert a table of electricity sales statistics on the retail distribution of electricity by the TVA giving the retail domestic and commercial rates during the month of April 1946.

I wish all users of electricity in the United States could examine these statistics and compare them with the rates they are now paying in their own homes or in their own business establishments.

I know the enemies of the TVA will say that we are getting this power below the cost of production. But remember that before the TVA was created the private power interests were buying the power produced at Muscle Shoals at a little less than 2 mills a kilowatt-hour wholesale and selling it in sight of the dam at 10 cents a kilowatt-hour maximum, or an average of about 9 cents a kilowatt-hour. Today, you will note that the municipalities and the cooperative power associations are paying an average of 4.32 mills a kilowatt-hour for this electricity wholesale, and selling it to the domestic consumers at an average of 1.76 cents a kilowatt-hour.

They are using an average of 162 kilowatt hours a month—whereas under the old rates they were using only about 35 kilowatt hours a month.

You will also note that the commercial consumers are using an average of 435 kilowatt hours a month—whereas they formerly used only about 135 kilowatt hours per month—and are paying 1.97 cents per kilowatt hour on an average, whereas they formerly paid an average of between 9 and 10 cents a kilowatt hour. You will note the industrial rate throughout the TVA area is 7.8 mills a kilowatt hour. Compare that with the rates being charged throughout the rest of the country, then go back and compare it with the rates that were being paid throughout this area before the TVA was created, and you will understand what the TVA and its yardstick for rates means to the power consumers of America.

In order that you may see what the benefits of our public power program are, I am inserting some tables on that subject showing the rates paid throughout the country as a whole, and the overcharges compared with the TVA rates, the Bonneville rates, and the Ontario rates. The following table gives you the picture in a nutshell. I hope each one of you will study the figures carefully.

The matter referred to follows:

Use of electric energy and possible savings in costs based on TVA rates, Bonneville rates, and Ontario rates

Total	1,843,881,010	.95	1,513,073,355	45.0

You will note that the average cost per kilowatt-hour to residential consumers throughout the country is 3.42 cents per kilowatt-hour compared with 1.76 cents under the TVA rates, 2.07 cents per kilowatt-hour under the Bonneville rates, and 1.52 cents per kilowatt-hour under the Ontario rates.

You will note that commercial rates throughout the country average 2.76 cents a kilowatt-hour, whereas the average TVA rate is 1.15 cents per kilowatt-hour, the Bonneville rate 1.47 cents, and the Ontario rate 1.32 cents a kilowatt-hour.

You will note that the average industrial rate throughout the country is 1.03 cents a kilowatt-hour, whereas under the TVA rate it is 0.61 cent, under the Bonneville rate 0.67 cent and under the Ontario rate 0.7 cent a kilowatt-hour.

These figures are extremely conservative. If any of you doubt that, get the rate book and see what the charges are in your home town; and you will find that, as a rule, the overcharges are far greater than these figures indicate.

Now let us see about the overcharges by States. First, let us take the residential rates. I am inserting a table showing the number of kilowatt-hours of electricity used in each State during the year 1945, the amount paid for it and the overcharges according to the TVA rates, the Bonneville rates, and the Ontario rates.

Now let us see about the commercial rates. The rates paid by the merchants, the hotel, restaurant, picture-show, and filling-station operators, and others who have to pay commercial rates. Here is a table showing the amount of electricity used by commercial consumers in each State during the year 1945, the amount paid for it, and the overcharges according to the TVA rates, the Bonneville rates, and the Ontario rates.

You will note from this table that the average commercial user of electricity throughout the country is overcharged more than 100 percent for his electric energy. These overcharges not only place an unnecessary burden upon the consumer, but they prevent the use of those electric appliances necessary for the successful operation of his establishment.

The table referred to follows:

This brings us to the industrial rates. As a rule, industry fares much better than do the residential and commercial consumers throughout the country; but there is still room for improvement, as you will see from the following table of electricity used by industrial consumers during the year 1945:

Now let us take the totals and see how much electricity is used by all the consumers in each State, the amount paid for it, and the overcharges according to the TVA rates, the Bonneville rates, and the Ontario rates.

I am inserting below table No. 4 which gives this information and which I wish every user of electricity throughout the entire country could read and study carefully.

The matter referred to follows:

If you want to know how the people of your State are faring in the matter of electric rates, just compare your State with the State of Tennessee, which gets nearly all of its power from the TVA, or the State of Washington, which gets most of its power from the Bonneville Administration and from the public power systems in Tacoma and Seattle—or compare them with the Ontario rates—and note the difference.

When I came to Congress in 1921, the people of this country were using only 40,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity a year, and were paying enormous rates for it. During the year 1945 the sales of electricity amounted to 195,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours, or almost 5 times that of 1921. This does not include the electricity produced by the large consumers who make their own power.

The increase in the use of electricity has been brought about largely as a result of the development of our water power and the reduction of rates, which has moved this country forward into what we call the electric age.

There are 230,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity a year going to waste in our navigable streams and their tributaries. Ten billion kilowatt-hours are going to waste in the Missouri River alone. When all this water power is harnessed and put to work for the American people at rates based upon the cost of generation, transmission, and distribution, this country will enjoy an era of unprecedented prosperity, and the people will realize a standard of living they have never known before—especially in the rural districts.

We will then enjoy the blessings of an electrified America.

"A Common Gift of Sorrow"

OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1946

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the July 1946 issue of the National Hibernian, official organ of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, carries a poem reflective of sentiments which no American can contemplate without emotion. It is entitled "To a Jewish Friend Wearing Green," the authoress of which is Marie McAuliff, and it was first published in the Washington Post on April 8, 1946. Under leave to extend my remarks, I incorporate these stirring lines in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as follows:

TO A JEWISH FRIEND WEARING GREEN

(By Marie McAuliff)

For me, and not for Patrick, you have pinned on your lapel
The twisted ribbon shamrock that the five-and-ten stores sell.

I wear one for my mother, for her saints, and for her sires,
Who fled by night to Scottish coasts, and

And fields to follow God. And still, because in Palestine
Your mother heard the chronicle of Moses' myriad line,

The burning bush, the brooding in the strange Egyptian lands,
Today there is this clasping of our northern,
southern hands.

O, the roads from Boyne and Jordan were bitter roads and long,
But a common gift of sorrow and a common weight of song
Made wonderful their journey, and our souls have learned to fare
From those sure souls who traveled it from Canaan and from Clare.

This day, then, be of Tara, and, small matter where you've been,
A hundred thousand welcomes for your wearing of the green.

A hundred thousand welcomes, dark-eyed child of Israel,
In your country's cordial idiom, I bid you—
Wear it well!

The OPA Bill Will Hurt and Not Help the People of the Nation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. ROBSION
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the OPA was established as a war emergency measure. Its proponents asserted that it was necessary to prevent a rise in prices, black markets, inflation, and insure an equitable distribution of available commodities. After approximately 4 years of trial it has been clearly demonstrated that it did not accomplish either one of these objectives. Prices have risen all the way from 25 percent to 200 percent on various commodities. Black markets have flourished and increased by leaps and bounds in all of our cities, villages, and towns, and in the remotest corners of the Nation. They forced out of business legitimate enterprises of this country. Hundreds of thousands of small and large business enterprises have been forced out of business. Commodities have decreased, and scarcity has become more acute. No one can hardly believe the conditions that confronted the country at the time the OPA expired on June 30, 1946. If OPA is restored, it will mean more black markets. It will mean a greater scarcity of the commodities that the people need so much. With the black markets, favoritism, and corruption we did not have an equitable distribution of the average commodities for the people. More than $4,000,000,000 have been poured out in subsidies, and the Government has spent tens of other billions of dollars that have increased inflation.

The resolution before us, as amended by the Senate and reported by the conferees of the House and Senate, in my opinion, will restore again black markets, increase the threat of inflation, disrupt the economic life of this Nation, and intensify scarcity, with a rise in prices not paid in legitimate markets. When the OPA dies we all know that full production is the only complete answer to high prices, black markets, and inflation. We also know from experience that the OPA has hindered production, and it has intensified scarcity, and has fostered black markets and aided inflation.

Since believing that the reestablishment of OPA will be harmful to the people of my district and our country, I cast my vote against it.

The bill presented is so involved that it cannot be administered in a way that it will benefit the people. It creates a Board and this Board creates numerous other offices, and the number on the Federal pay roll will be greatly increased. It restores subsidies. In other words, this administration insists on borrowing the money—taking it out of the Treasury and paying part of the store accounts and grocery bills of the millionaires and the well-to-do. This new bill gives to the President and officials of the OPA, more power than they had under the OPA law that expired June 30. They were unwilling to have a reasonable workable law. They have a plan now whereby every activity of the American people, in their economic life, will be under the control of the bureaucrats here in Washington. Of course, nothing but confusion and discord can result therefrom. We have lived under and in emergencies generally created by the New Deal administrations since 1933, and we shall continue to live under these emergencies, be regimented, with accompanying tyranny, favoritism, and corruption until the present New Deal is voted out of power. This New Deal crowd refuses to surrender any power they secured during the war emergency. Unless the American people are willing to surrender their freedom and liberties finally, and live under a totalitarian government, we must begin to take away these extraordinary powers from the bureaucrats here in Washington, and restore the governing power to the people so that we may have a "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," and not as we have had and now have, a government of the bureaucrats, by the bureaucrats, and for this great army of bureaucrats now on the backs of the American people, and costing them approximately $8,000,000,000 in salaries and expenses, and on top of that we furnish them billions in subsidies with which to play politics and continue their control and power.

WE MUST HAVE PLENTY

After the OPA expired on June 30, the American people began to take heart again. Meats, poultry, dairy products, and other commodities began to flow again in great quantities. The first week after OPA expired there were seven times as many hogs and five times as many cattle offered to the markets as there were the last week under the OPA and this increase has grown from day to day, and now in Washington we have plenty of meat, poultry, eggs, butter, fruits, and vegetables. The Agriculture Department reports that we may have 3,500,000,000 bushels of corn and 1,350,000,000 bushels of wheat, and a big crop of fruits, vegetables, and everything that the American people consume, and if they would let them alone for a little while there would be such an abundance of everything that it would solve the question of high prices, black markets, and inflation. Yes, there has been some increase in prices. The subsidies were taken off. For instance, the OPA price of butter was 67 cents a pound, but the Government paid a subsidy of 13½ cents a pound of the taxpayers' money, and therefore, the actual price of a pound of butter was 80½ cents and most places butter can now be bought for less than 80½ cents per pound. There were also subsidies on meats and various other commodities. With these subsidies removed, of course, the prices had to go up, and furthermore, there have been other big costs added to production, in the way of wages, materials, and so forth. If the ingenuity, intelligence, and industry of the American people are given an opportunity to operate, the law of supply and demand will greatly aid in the solution of these problems.

The American people also remember that the administration within the last year has bought above OPA prices more than 400,000,000 bushels of wheat and sent this wheat to foreign countries for relief, and they have also sent more than 10,000,000,000 pounds of meats and every other type of food and feed and given it for relief to foreign countries. But the New Deal has always been in favor of scarcity. When they could not have it any other way, they burned the mother sows and little pigs, killed cattle and sheep, and plowed under the corn, wheat, cotton, and other commodities, and now they have conceived the idea of bringing about a scarcity of essential commodities by placing the blighting hand of the bureaucrats at Washington on the producers of this Nation. We can depend upon the buyers, the consumers, to put their foot on the people who are asking exorbitant prices.

I voted for the other bill that was recommended by Mr. Truman and his leaders in the House and Senate and the Republican leaders on the Banking and Currency Committee of the House and Senate that had this bill in charge. They urged the President to sign that bill. He vetoed that bill and killed the OPA. A majority of us voted in the House to pass it over his veto, but we did not have a two-thirds majority. Now we have been from under the OPA for nearly a month and, so far as food is concerned, it does not go into operation until August 20. This will bring about discord and confusion as no one will know just how to arrange their affairs, and there is bound to be a lot of confusion over restoring OPA. After the President vetoed the bill, Mr. WOLCOTT, the ranking Republican of the Banking and Currency Committee, asked unanimous consent to take up a resolution that would restore and continue rent control. The Democrats opposed it. It likely would be helpful to have rent control to continue until we have built more houses. Houses cannot be produced as quickly as we produce food and other supplies. I want to see the day come when the mothers, wives, and daughters in this Nation will not have to stand in lines for hours day by day to get a bite of food for themselves and their families.

Tax Reductions for 1947

OF

HON. FRANK CARLSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a statement on tax reductions for 1947, which was discussed and approved by the House Republican Postwar Tax Study Committee. The committee is composed of 27 Representatives from 26 States and have held several meetings during the Seventy-ninth Congress. Hon. DANIEL A. REED, of New York, who is an outstanding authority on taxation, has served as chairman. The following statement is most timely in view of the administration's urge for increased taxes instead of reduced Federal expenditures:

Canada is preparing to reduce taxes 23 percent in 1947. The United States is preparing to reduce taxes not a penny in 1947.

Why shouldn't the Government of the United States do as much for its taxpayers next year as the Canadian Government does for its taxpayers?

The committee found no reason except one why taxes should not be reduced in the United States handsomely in 1947. That one reason is the continued New Deal program of spending and wasting public funds.

Our reduction for 1947 in individual income tax would have to be at least 20 percent in order that our citizens may have some reductions corresponding to those the Canadian budget will grant her citizens for 1947.

Our tax committee has found as a result of our studies an imperative need for a complete overhauling of our Federal tax system. Adam Smith, more than 150 years ago, laid down four essentials of a sound tax system. His tests were:

1. Taxes should be based on ability to pay.
2. Taxes should be definite and certain and not arbitrary.
3. Taxes should be levied at the time and in the manner which cause least inconvenience to the people.
4. Taxes should take out of the people as little as possible over what is needed by the Public Treasury.

Our present tax system violates all of these essentials. Our taxes are unduly oppressive and disregard the ability of our people to bear such burdens. The language of the statute is so complicated that it is extremely difficult for the simplest tax problem to be solved without the advice of a tax expert.

The administration now insists that not only must our present unbearable burdens be continued, but that it may be necessary to increase taxes next year. The American people, administration spokesmen say, must be forced, regardless of wasteful bureaucratic expenditures, to provide a balanced budget next year and prevent inflation. Apparently the administration is insensible to the effect of these oppressive taxes taking an excessive percentage of our people's income or the effect on curtailing expansion of private business and employment. The administration apparently means to continue its wasteful and reckless spending of the people's money, regardless of the cost to the country.

We believe the sooner our Government again restricts itself to its proper functions, and restores those extra-Federal activities to the States and to the people, where they belong, the sooner we will have sanity, economy, and efficiency in our National Government.

The reduction in Federal expenditures and the reduction in individual and consumer Federal tax burdens have been very small. Our citizens are still paying heavy and oppressive wartime taxes in peacetime. Let us compare our figures with our neighbor, Canada, and see what has been accomplished there in the way of reduced taxes and reduced expenditures.

Our Federal expenditures for the fiscal year 1946 are approximately $65,000,000,000. For 1947, our second year of peace, under the continuance of the present New Deal spending, it is anticipated that Federal expenditures may reach $43,000,000,000. This would be a reduction of approximately only 34 percent from expenditures for 1946, notwithstanding the fact that 1946 included at least 2 months of the war.

Canada, on the other hand, is presenting a budget cutting expenditures for 1947 in excess of 40 percent. Our present administration is now talking in terms of no tax reduction for 1947; the Canadian tax budget calls for a tax reduction of approximately 23 percent, in addition to the 16-percent tax reduction which the Canadian Government has granted for the year 1946.

If expenditures for 1947 are reduced by 50 percent under 1946 expenditures, our 1947 expenditures should be around $33,000,000,000. This would leave a surplus of around $7,000,000,000, as receipts for 1947 are estimated at around $40,000,000,000. Of course, if expenditures for 1947 could only be reduced for part of the year, because the legislation would not be effective until 1947, this should still provide us with ample funds for reducing individual income taxes for 1947, for giving substantial relief to our consumers from heavy concealed wartime excises, and for providing a sizable reserve to be applied in reduction of the national debt.

We, therefore, conclude that if unnecessary and wasteful Federal expenditures are eliminated there can and should be substantial individual tax relief for 1947.

Reduction of Income Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH E. CHURCH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, it has remained for the gentleman from Minesota [Mr. KNUTSON], ranking Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee, to offer to the harassed taxpayer the first ray of hope that he has had since the New Deal took over.

In a forthright statement made public Monday, Mr. KNUTSON pledged a 20-percent reduction in income taxes in the event the Republicans win the House this fall.

Mr. KNUTSON is in an authoritative position to speak as he will become chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in that event and it is to that committee that we must look for tax relief.

Those who know Mr. KNUTSON are well aware that he was not speaking loosely when he made his pledge.

No doubt Representative TABER, of New York, who will become chairman of the great Appropriations Committee in the event of Republican success this fall, will also issue a reassuring statement to the country.

The statement issued by Mr. KNUTSON was quite generally carried in the metropolitan press of the country. In a leading editorial, the Chicago Daily Tribune of yesterday commented on Mr. KNUTSON'S statement as follows:

A REPUBLICAN PROGRAM

Representative KNUTSON, of Minnesota, has pledged a 20-percent reduction in income taxes if the Republicans win the House in November. Mr. KNUTSON was speaking responsibly, as ranking Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House. If the election gives his party the majority, Mr. KNUTSON will be chairman of the committee and it is this committee that drafts the Nation's tax legislation.

The 20-percent reduction is altogether reasonable. Mr. KNUTSON reckons that Federal expenditures can be kept to $21,000,000,000 and that is surely not an unrealizable goal. As he says, the highest peacetime budget before the war called for nine billions of expenditures, and if to that generous figure is added five billions for the veterans, three billions for defense expenditures and four billions for service of the national debt, a total of twenty-one billions will be reached. This is less than half of the current spending. If the program is adopted, there will be money left over with which to retire some of the outstanding debt.

Mr. KNUTSON has written one of the two principal planks of the platform on which the Republican Party can stand this autumn with high hopes of victory. The other plank, certainly no less important, must call for an American foreign policy. This country's interests have received no attention in the Roosevelt-Truman regime. Our policy today is not the product of an intelligent appraisal of the requirements of our own welfare. What is called the American foreign policy is, in reality, the result of the pull and haul of the pro-British and pro-Russian factions in the State Department.

Just as Representative KNUTSON has, in effect, written the fiscal plank in the Republican platform for 1946, so Representative MUNDT, of South Dakota, and his colleague Representative JONKMAN, of Michigan, are framing the foreign-policy plank. Mr. MUNDT has called attention to the shocking fact that there are several hundred employees of the State Department who are still on the pay roll despite reports from the State Department's own investigating staff, casting grave doubts upon the loyalty of these people to the United States.

Mr. JONKMAN adds the specification he was permitted to examine the files of the Department's security committee under a pledge to reveal none of the details. What he saw, however, permitted him to make the flat assertion that there are men now in positions of great responsibility in the Department, who have actually committed "overt acts on behalf of a Soviet espionage organization." He might have added, for it is true, that there are others who are no less devoted to Britain, though they may have been a bit more guarded in their behavior.

The whole Department is rotten with foreign intrigue. The explanation is not at all obscure. Mr. Roosevelt in his pursuit of votes deliberately played for the support not only of the pro-British, big moneyed, Long Island set, but also of the Communists who held and still hold the balance of power in New York elections. He loaded the Government departments, and particularly the State Department, with the partisans of these two factions.

Mr. Truman, aware of the success of this maneuver, has pursued the same tactics. The persistent refusal to fire the disloyalists is merely the most striking of the evidences of the subordination of New Deal foreign policy to New Deal domestic politics. In this process the interests and welfare of this country have been abandoned and, of course, lost.

The New Dealers can have no effective answer to the Republican policies outlined by Representatives KNUTSON, MUNDT, and JONKMAN. Mr. Truman cannot say that he, too, favors a reduction in expenditures and a 20-percent cut in income taxes because if he and his party favored it, the program would have been adopted already. He cannot say that he, too, favors an American foreign policy because his acts prove that he doesn't.

The great danger that the Republican Party faces this year and in 1948 is that once again the New Deal conspirators within the party will gain control of it and prevent it from taking a forthright stand for national solvency and national independence. If the party will take its lead in these matters from such men as these three Republican Congressmen, the future of the country and of the Republican Party will be secure.

Fruits of the Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the London Times of July 16, 1946:

FRUITS OF THE LOAN

Although Mr. Dalton's suggestion that the House of Commons "would share the Government's satisfaction in the knowledge that the United States Congress had approved the loan agreement" drew some vigorous tokens of dissent, the ratification has been widely welcomed both as a token of continued Anglo-American cooperation and because of the impetus which the loan can give to the reinvigoration of world trade at this time. The rate at which world trade can be restored will be governed largely by the wise use of the opportunity offered by the loan; and this in turn depends at least as much on the lender as on the borrower. That the policy now adopted by the United States will succeed only if it is accompanied by a change in the general character of American import policy and by a readiness not merely to reduce barriers to trade but actively to buy from debtor nations, has been recognized by all parties to the negotiations, as much by the American experts as by the British. The risks and difficulties are patent. But the responsibility for the success of the policy to which this country is jointly committed rests primarily on the United States.

The immediate preoccupation of this country must be to put the loan to good use and to prepare effectively the conditions which will alone enable it to carry out the obligation in the agreement to dispense with the exchange restrictions now necessary to protect sterling. The negotiations to be undertaken immediately to arrange for the liquidation of the sterling balances—to arrange, that is, for the repayment of the heavy debts incurred by this country within the sterling area, and notably to India, Egypt, and Argentina, in procuring munitions and foodstuffs for the prosecution of the war—will add effectively to the annual obligations which this country must meet, even if the over-all obligations are reduced, and it is clear that political considerations may tend to keep within extremely narrow limits the scope for reductions. The obligation to establish full exchange convertibility within a year and to abandon the planning of balanced exchanges with other countries will certainly impose a severe handicap and an extremely heavy strain.

Success will depend on the achievement of the target of the export drive, the increase of exports by 75 percent above the 1938 level. The drive has so far been impressive, but in the later stages it may meet with growing obstacles; there are indeed signs that this is already happening in some trades. The consolidation of gains now being made, which will be essential for exchange stability, will become progressively more difficult as international competition is restored. It would be fatal, therefore, to underestimate the difficulties with which this country will be faced in meeting its early obligations under the agreement; these may well be increased by the process of revaluation which has already occurred in Canada and Sweden and may well occur elsewhere. Such changes, undertaken before the final establishment of the Bretton Woods parities, are likely to prove unfavorable to this country as buyers; the advantages of the long-term wheat agreement with Canada, for example, will be lessened.

The Chancelor did well therefore to recall Mr. Churchill's phrase that the loan must be for us not a sofa but a springboard. It is upon this principle that the policy to be adopted in spending the loan must be determined. In his statement Mr. Dalton was not reassuring. He placed first among the purchases to be made with the loan foodstuffs to give a more varied diet; he placed raw materials second on his list, and ahead of "a limited increase in manufactured goods, and, we hope, in newsprint." He promised an announcement on petrol by the Minister of Fuel and Power within a few days. In answer to a question he explained that the limited increase in manufactured goods included capital equipment. There may well be a certain disquiet over the distribution of emphasis by the Chancelor in announcing this spending policy. It is true that a relaxation of austerity by the introduction of more American consumer goods here will, as the Chancelor suggested, have some effect in promoting efficiency in regaining our trade balances as soon as possible. Within certain strict limits the proceeds of the loan may no doubt be legitimately devoted to increasing the incentive in industry by giving the wage earner more of his money's worth. But it is of fundamental importance that the reequipment of British industry should be regarded as a first priority, upon which the maintenance of exports will within a very short period depend. In many industries imports of American machinery will be of crucial importance in the process of reequipment. This is notably true in several branches of the steel industry. When Lord Keynes defended the loan in the House of Lords, he regretted that it was not larger. "The amount of the loan is too fine," he said, "it does not allow a margin." By the process of inflation in the United States it is now still finer than it was then. It is all the more necessary to spend it wisely, and to use it primarily not for consumer goods but for capital investment.

The CIO-PAC Makes the Vets Pay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, over the American Forum of the Air last Tuesday evening representatives of the CIO-PAC denied that it made employees contribute in order to obtain or hold a job and then used money for political purposes.

A serviceman, hearing that denial of my charge, wrote me the following letter:

When I was discharged from the Army I got a job through the Government employment agency, but I had to join the CIO. Is the Government employment agency working for CIO?

One month after going to work I was assessed for $5 to support OPA; the next month $5 for organization work in the South; then $2 for flowers for Hillman's funeral. If I don't pay, I am told I will be barred from work anywhere and my wife and child beg or starve. Is this a free country?

A Woman Signs the Magna Carta of Health

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, in May of this year the United Nations Economic and Social Council gave its approval to the plans for a World Health Conference to be held in New York beginning June 19. This conference has come to an end after writing the charter of the World Health Organization.

The meetings of the United Nations Health Assembly presided over by Dr. Thomas Parran, Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, have been notable for their harmony and the sincerity with which the membership has worked toward the goal, described by Dr. Parran as "a magna carta for health."

The new agency's forebears have been: First, the International Office of Public Hygiene, established in Paris in 1907 and the health organ of the League of Nations, which served as an information clearing house, securing cooperation among governments to prevent the spread of disease, carrying on research in specified diseases, and studying dietary problems.

The only woman delegate to take part in the signing was Dr. Martha Eliot, vice chairman of the United States delegation. She is Associate Director of the Children's Bureau, which, under the President's reorganization bill has been transferred from the Department of Labor to the Federal Security Agency.

Price of Exports to Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the London Times of July 16, 1946:

PRICE OF EXPORTS TO RUSSIA—NEGOTIATIONS RESUMED

Sir Stafford Cripps, President of the Board of Trade, stated yesterday in answer to questions in the House of Commons that he was in touch with Mr. Klentsov, the new head of the Soviet trade delegation in London.

This means that Sir Stafford Cripps is taking up with the Russians where it was left some months ago the question of payments due for goods delivered, or awaiting delivery, from this country. He has in fact to find some way of keeping to a minimum, if not averting, a loss to the taxpayer on some £40,000,000 worth of goods ordered during wartime through the United Kingdom Commercial Corporation, from which body the British manufacturers concerned have already received payment. The Treasury being the only shareholder in the corporation, Government intervention in the price dispute between it and the Soviet trade delegation was inevitable, and it was with Sir Stafford Cripps in the chair that negotiations broke down last autumn.

The break-down was due to Russian rejection of the prices asked for equipment shipped to them last summer. The prices—the same as those paid by the Ministry of Supply on Government contracts—had risen owing to increased labor and other costs; but the Soviet delegation could not accept the assurance that they represented nothing more than the usual cost plus 5-percent profit. Although the method of fixing prices had been agreed beforehand, the President of the Board of Trade offered a reduction to try to break the deadlock.

After much delay the offer was rejected from Moscow as a basis of negotiation and a far larger reduction proposed instead. This was found unacceptable in London as a basis of negotiation, and there the matter has rested for 4 months. The appointment of Mr. Klentsov and the return of Sir Stafford Cripps from India presented a good opportunity for trying again.

DEVELOPING TRADE

Meanwhile the peacetime trade is developing gradually through direct contacts between British manufacturers and the Soviet trade delegation, who are interested chiefly in heavy electrical equipment and machine tools—not at all in consumer goods. Relations are good, and it cannot be said that the break-down of talks about the wartime orders has yet affected the flow of peacetime orders. The Russians have no difficulty in paying in sterling, and they are dealing with firms which understand their needs.

When it comes to British imports from Russia the British Government are more directly interested; they want timber and food urgently, and assistance from the Russians in shipping both; but so far timber offers have been sporadic owing to transport difficulties inside Russia. There is therefore little serious connection at the moment between the payments dispute and the larger development of Anglo-Russian trade, but the sums involved in the dispute are large; the Russians want the rest of the machinery they have ordered, and the British Government stick to their policy of trying systematically to remove all causes of friction with their ally.

Justice for the Baltic States—An Urgent Appeal to the Government of the United States of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

JUSTICE FOR THE BALTIC STATES—AN URGENT APPEAL TO THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Within a few days, on the 29th of July 1946, representatives of 21 governments will meet in Paris to discuss the peace treaties for certain Axis satellite nations. In view of this, the Lithuanian American Council wishes to call to the attention of the Government of the United States of America the following:

The neutral nations of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia live, and have been living for quite a long time, under conditions of much greater hardship than those which the war has imposed upon the Axis nations of Rumania, Hungary, and Bulgaria. The three Baltic states are occupied by the army and police forces of Soviet Russia, and have to suffer the most cruel methods of oppression and terror employed by the occupying power, which endeavors to impose upon them an economic and social order that is abhorrent to the desires and traditions of their populations.

In addition to that, these three Baltic nations are being subjected by the Soviet overlords and their hand-picked quislings to the ruthless practice of social engineering, consisting of mass deportations of whole sections of their populations considered to be inimical to the Soviet regime, and of colonization of their lands by Russian and Mongolian elements brought in from diverse areas of the Soviet Union. In effect, these inhuman measures of the invaders amount to an attempt to destroy completely the three ancient nations residing on the shores of the Baltic Sea.

And yet, while the victorious powers are planning a peace conference for the former enemy countries in order to reopen for them the road to a peaceful existence and development, the fate of the above-mentioned Baltic nations is being entirely ignored.

The reports from Lithuania reaching this country indicate that this Baltic nation is in imminent danger of being wiped out by the Soviets. Here, for instance, is a story recently cabled to the American press from Stockholm, Sweden:

"Renewal of the systematic deportation of Lithuanians from their homeland to make room for the nation's resettlement by Russian families was described here today by a Lithuanian woman who escaped from the country and fled to southern Sweden. She said the Russians were also removing Jews. Following is her story:

" 'Rounding up of people for deportation to eastern Russia somewhat diminished during the winter began in earnest this spring. Among about 350 deportees from the Baltic States arriving weekly in Liepaja (Libau) concentration camp well over one-third are Lithuanians. Libau concentration camp is one of many the Russians have established in Latvia, which they have made into a sort of distributing center for deportees. The population of these camps is slowly moved eastward by the NKVD (Russian secret police). * * * Now the NKVD performs more quietly the liquidation begun by the soldiers. * * *

" 'In Klaipeda (Memel) there is already a fairly large population of newly arrived Russians. These settlers open shops and trade in greater freedom than they would in Russia, as no Communist principles appear to be enforced on them by the Russian authorities.

" 'The increase in the Russian population also is perceptible in Kaunas and Vilna * * *.

" 'Life in Lithuanian cities is difficult. Nothing is obtainable in the open market against ration coupons. The black market is the official market and it is run by Russian officials * * *.

" 'Once fertile, Lithuania is now a desert. This year there will be no flax or fertilizers available. It seems a deliberate policy of the Soviets to starve and ruin the country for, like deportation, starvation is a method of eliminating the native population so it can be replaced by Russians.' " (The Chicago Tribune, July 1, 1946.)

Other witnesses who were able to escape from the Baltic countries, have similar stories to tell. The situation evidently is quite well known among the informed circles in Europe, as the former Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Winston Churchill, made the following statement in his speech in the House of Commons on June 5, 1946:

"The populations of the Baltic States are no longer recognizable as those which existed before the war. They have suffered a double liquidation, both at German hands and Russian hands." (Parliamentary Debates, vol. 423, No. 154.)

In view of these facts, can the Allied Powers, which fought the war for the principles announced in the Atlantic Charter, remain passive and indifferent while the three Baltic nations are being wantonly annihilated?

The victorious powers are under obligation to look after the welfare even of their former enemies. In recognition of this responsibility, the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain are striving to supply food to the people of Italy and Germany and to revive their economy. Can it be that the victors have a lesser obligation toward the nations which did not aid their enemies?

Irrespective of what the present rulers of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia might say in justification of their acts, the Baltic nations are still, in law, sovereign and independent states. On July 23, 1940, shortly after the so-called elections to the People's Diets and a few days before the Russian-imposed quislings of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia petitioned for admission into the Soviet Union, the State Department issued the following statement:

"During these past few days the devious processes whereunder the political independence and territorial integrity of the three small Baltic republics—Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania—were to be deliberately annihilated by one of their more powerful neighbors, have been rapidly drawing to their conclusion.

"From the day when the peoples of these republics first gained their independent and democratic form of government, the people of the United States have watched their admirable progress in self-government with deep and sympathetic interest.

"The policy of this Government is universally known.

"The people of the United States are opposed to predatory activities, no matter whether they are carried on by the use of force or by the threat of force.

"They are likewise opposed to any form of intervention on the part of one State, however powerful, in the domestic concerns of any other sovereign state, however weak.

"These principles constitute the very foundations upon which the existing relationship between the 21 sovereign republics of the New World rests.

"The United States will continue to stand by these principles, because of the conviction of the American people that unless the doctrine in which these principles are inherent once again governs the relations between nations, the rule of reason, of justice and of law—in other words, the basis of modern civilization itself—cannot be preserved." (The Department of State Bulletin, July 27, 1940, vol. III, No. 57, page 48.)

During the intervening years and on many occasions, the Government of the United States reaffirmed its stand on the matter. We are proud that it continues to adhere to this fundamental policy with regard to small nations.

The United States, and many other governments as well, in the Western Hemisphere and in Europe, continue to recognize the diplomatic representatives and consular agents of the Baltic States. Thus, there is not the slightest doubt in regard to the legal side of the problem. The rights and privileges enjoyed by every sovereign nation which is not guilty of violating its international obligations or disturbing peace, cannot rightfully be denied any longer to Lithuania or her northern neighbors, Latvia and Estonia. Their desperate plight under foreign occupation calls for immediate action on the part of the great powers which have taken upon themselves the responsibility for the future of Europe.

The Lithuanian American Council, therefore, urgently appeals to the Government of the United States to take proper steps to protect the populations of the Baltic countries from the cruelties and injustices they are suffering at the hands of the Soviet invaders. In particular, we request our Government to see to it that arbitrary arrests, deportations, and executions of the people of those lands be stopped; that civil liberties be restored to them; that the confiscated farms, business establishments, and other properties be returned to their owners. There is no excuse for murder, despoilation, and torture of innocent people.

By the pronouncements in the Atlantic Charter, the common declaration by the United Nations, and the Yalta agreement, the great powers promised to restore sovereign rights and self-government to those who have been forcibly deprived of them, and to let every nation choose its own form of government. There is no valid reason why the application of these principles should be still withheld from Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia more than a year after the cessation of hostilities in Europe and Asia.

The Lithuanian American Council requests the President of the United States of America and the Secretary of State to use the power and influence of their offices to effect the removal of obstacles which prevent the exercise of the functions of sovereignty of the Baltic States, to wit:

That the Soviet armies of occupation and its police force be withdrawn from their territories;

That the conditions be brought about in those countries that will allow hundreds of thousands of their deportees and refugees to return to their homes without danger to their lives and personal liberty;

That, finally, the people of Lithuania—as well as Latvia and Estonia—be given an opportunity to choose their governments by free and unfettered elections.

By addressing this urgent appeal to you, we seek only justice for the small and defenseless nations which by no fault of their own became tragic victims of the terrible war and the rivalry of greed between their more powerful neighbors. We fervently hope that the United States and its allies will spare no effort to redeem their pledge, solemnly given during the war, to create a lasting peace based on principles of freedom and equality for all nations, large and small.

Respectfully submitted.

LITHUANIAN AMERICAN COUNCIL,
LEONARD SIMUTIS, President,
Dr. P. GRIGAITIS, Secretary,
MIKAS VAIDYLA, Treasurer,
Executive Board.

A Ballade of the Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MATTHEW M. NEELY
OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem by Robert Permar, of West Virginia:

A BALLADE OF THE PEACE

(By Robert Permar)

The flash comes; Europe's guns are silent now.
A broken continent must start again
To build from ruins; and with faith endow
The civilized remainder, those still sane,
Slav, Briton, French, Dutch, Belge, Pole,
Greek, and Czech;
German, Italian, too, all stand aghast,
And say in common of their dear land's wreck:
"Thank God, this butchery is done at last."

The flower of their finest youth is gone,
And thousands of America's best boys
Have made the final sacrifice upon
A madman's altar—fragile, human toys,
The playthings of an imbecile's delight,
The dice in one long, bloody, frightful cast
Whose requiem when over is the fight;
"Thank God, this butchery is done at last."

Man can rebuild his works of iron and stone,
Destroyed in senseless fury. He can make
Again a decent conduct, and atone
Somewhat his lapses to the hog and snake.
But he cannot replace the souls and brains
Of those brave lads whose sands of life ran fast;
He can but say, in horror of their pains:
"Thank God, this butchery is done at last."

L'ENVOI

"Thank God, this butchery is done at last."
A hope transcends the agony of fears.
But had we kept His covenant in past,
We could have had the hope without the tears.

Editorial Comment on Senator Wiley's Efforts on Behalf of Wisconsin and America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 25 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have reprinted in the Appendix of the RECORD a series of editorial excerpts. These excerpts are from the editorial columns of several newspapers in my own and other States, and they relate to my efforts on behalf of my State and my country during the Seventy-ninth Congress, that is, during 1945 and 1946.

These editorials speak for themselves. I feel that my constituents are entitled to this information in order that they may be familiar with my activities. They are my master: I am proud to be their servant.

In all humility, I am grateful to them and to the press. But impartial press comment as to any Senator, be that comment favorable or unfavorable, is, above all, of importance to his constituency, as an index of how well their interests are being safeguarded.

There being no objection the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEWSPAPER COMMENTS ON SENATOR ALEXANDER WILEY'S EFFORTS ON BEHALF OF WISCONSIN AND AMERICA

[From the syndicated column by Drew Pearson, the Washington Merry-Go-Round, August 1, 1945, Washington (D. C.) Post]

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE OF OUR BELOVED AMERICA

A lot of Senators are now talking over the importance of scientific research for war preparedness, but it took Wisconsin's far-sighted Senator ALEXANDER WILEY to emphasize this back even before Pearl Harbor. Speaking in Milwaukee on June 9, 1941, WILEY said: "We need a great defense laboratory involving the Navy, the War Department, and the State Department. It isn't enough for this administration to write our defense plans in shifting sands of day-to-day expediency."

[From the Union City (Pa.) Times-Enterprise of September 17, 1945]

The Congress had decided to investigate the great tragedy of Pearl Harbor.

Senator WILEY, of Wisconsin, ripped off some lids in a speech appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD September 6, from which we quote:

"In February 1941, 10 months before Pearl Harbor, I introduced in the Senate a resolution asking the Secretary of State to report to the Senate in closed executive session on the danger in the Pacific; I asked at that time what condition our fleet air arm was in. Again in March 1941 speaking on the resolution which asked the Secretary to report to the Senate on the status of our forces in the Far East; I asked:

"What is the condition of our fleet, especially its coordinating air arm? Is it like the Russian Fleet was in the Japanese war? My questions went unanswered, and my resolution was quashed by the administration."

[From the Hartford (Conn.) Courant of September 18, 1945]

The junior Senator from Wisconsin, in urging the establishment of a permanent American intelligence service, has tackled a question demanding thorough study. With the Senator, we may readily agree that "it is shocking to note that as a nation, we do not now have and never have had a single coordinated intelligence service." If we had had such a service, it might have prevented the unpleasant surprise of Pearl Harbor.

[From the New York (N. Y.) Daily News of July 29, 1945]

As the Senate debate on the Bretton Woods world finance agreements puffed and blew down the home stretch recently, Senator ALEXANDER WILEY (Republican, Wisconsin) obliged the Senate with some figures which we imagine sent shivers crawling up and down several of the assembled senatorial backs. The Wiley figures had that effect on us when we read WILEY'S speech a few days later in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

It is mainly our great mineral resources, said WILEY, which have enabled us to develop our present immense industrial and military power. Without those mineral resources "the United States would be reduced to an agricultural type economy, capable of supporting far less than the 138,000,000 people now living within our borders at a standard which is the envy of the world." Then WILEY touched off this salvo of statistics:

"But it is a fact that as of 1944 we had already exhausted the following percentages of our commercial reserves of these minerals: Over 95 percent of our mercury, over 80 percent of our lead, over 70 percent of our chromium, 70 percent of our tungsten, 70 percent of our zinc, 60 percent of our copper, almost 60 percent of our petroleum, over 30 percent of our iron ore.

"At the annual rate of use of 1935–39, our tungsten will be exhausted in 4 years; vanadium in 7 years; our lead in 12 years; petroleum 18 years; zinc 19 years; copper 34 years."

[From the Sheboygan (Wis.) Press of March 19, 1945]

THE DAMAGING EFFECTS OF OPA ON OUR ECONOMY

Senator WILEY took the floor last week in an address calling attention to the so-called Plymouth-plus plan which has penalized Wisconsin producers of cheese more than $3,000,000, and still the order prevails. * * * We want to compliment and congratulate him for making such an important contribution in the interest of an industry that made Wisconsin tops as the cheese-producing State before the War and until MPR 289 was put into effect by the Government.

[From the Milwaukee (Wis.) Journal of May 3, 1946]

OPA price fixing policies have frequently resulted in permitting a new manufacturer to charge higher prices than an old established firm for practically identical articles. There has been much wholly justified criticism of this, but it remained for our own Senator WILEY to make for his colleagues a really graphic demonstration of the evil.

Mr. WILEY recently appeared in the Senate with three aluminum frying pans. Two were practically identical. One was made by an old reliable manufacturer; its ceiling price was $1.20. The other was made by a newcomer; its ceiling was $2.50. The third pan was made by the old-timer. It was much superior to either of the others, but its ceiling price was only $1.98.

The newcomer in the frying pan field is, of course, turning out pans in quantity. The public which needs these utensils, is taking all he can produce. The old-timer is also making some pans and selling them at the low price allowed him, but his margin is too small to encourage him to maximum output in the face of a hundred and one problems.

The result is that the public is paying more than it should for its frying pans, an old established business is languishing and a newcomer is gouging the consumer.

* * * * *

Senator WILEY'S frying pans made the essential facts more graphic than a hundred pages of figures and arguments. The country owes him thanks for a job well done.

[From the Bath (Maine) Daily Times of March 7, 1946]

OTHER GENERAL PROBLEMS FACING AMERICA

The junior Senator from Wisconsin writes one of the best letters to the newspapers of his State that goes from Washington, and in his recent letter he found time to rejoice that "the old order changes, giving place to the new." Being an optimist, he looks for better times in future days.

The Senator reports that "the American people now have accumulated $170,000,000,000 in savings, the greatest amount in history." He warns the people who have a nest egg to beware of swindlers and crooks out to steal it with every shady scheme conceivable. But he also tells his fellow Members in Congress to stop their habit to "spend, spend, spend."

* * * * *

Among the future issues that Congress will face Senator WILEY believes there must be a solution of how to curb the strike menace and protect the best interests of the public, of labor and management. Whether or not to merge the Army and Navy into one Cabinet department and to enact peacetime conscription. How to cope with the still terrible housing shortage. What to do about revising our tax system. How to handle price and rationing controls. What to do about the proposed health and social security legislation. How to reorganize the Government and strengthen Congress and the other branches to meet their heavy responsibilities? How to insure full justice for our returning servicemen? What to do about controlling and utilizing atomic energy. How to meet the farmer's problems, the laboring man's, the small businessman's, and so on.

[From the Clarion (Ind.) News of April 24, 1946]

THE WELFARE OF AMERICA'S FARMERS

American agriculture has lost 6,000,000 persons during the last decade to industry and commerce, according to Senator WILEY, of Wisconsin. He recently warned his fellow statesmen that "if this trend away from the farms continues, the very foundation of our Nation will be hurt," and he suggested that "what the Government ought to do and must do, is to make farming more profitable and desirable." He rang the bell again by adding to that statement that it is possible and practical for the Government to reverse the downward trend of agriculture, with immediate results that will start the folks moving back from the city to sound profit-making farms.

[From the Kansas Grange for April 1946]

It sometimes takes a show-down in the Senate for farmers to find out who their true friends are and who their fair-weather friends are. Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Wisconsin Republican, never has been considered a member of the so-called farm bloc in Congress, but when the ball was passed to him in an eleventh-hour effort to prevent farmers being squeezed under the 65-cents an hour wage minimum bill, he carried it for a winning touchdown.

For weeks the National Grange, the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives and the Cooperative Milk Producers Federation had sought to prevent a labor-inspired move from taking away exemptions under the present law.

The labor move would have added millions of dollars a year to the cost of preparing farm produce for market and would have either decreased farm income or added to consumers' food costs. Under OPA there wasn't much doubt as to which it would have been.

A few quotations from WILEY'S address to the Senate on behalf of farmers will illustrate the kind of a fight he put up. His address disclosed a deep and sympathetic understanding of the farmer's problem.

"I know that the farmer is the backbone of the Nation. When I look around this Chamber and see men who were produced by and on the farms, and when I examine the pages of history and consider the character of great statesmen of the past who came from farms, I do not want to see this source of supply of American manpower come to an end. However, Mr. President, that will take place if we do not make life on the farms more interesting.

"Why is it inflationary, as some contend, to allow the farmer to receive higher prices for his products and be enabled to meet the higher expenses which are constantly thrust upon him, and yet it is not inflationary to grant increases in the compensation paid to labor, the manufacturer, and Government employees?

"Mr. President, it is time that we remove the blinders from our eyes and give to the farmer what he is entitled to receive. I repeat that I am not speaking only for farmers, 23,000,000 of them. I am speaking for the millions of persons who reside in cities and depend on a maximum production of food. I speak for the economic and physical health of this Nation. I do not wish to see an exodus from the farms. I want to see an exodus from the cities back to the farms. After all, the farm is the laboratory of life. There we see vegetable life and animal life. There we see, going on and on, a part of the mystery of creation.

"Mr. President, I also stand for the proposition that the farmer is just as worthy of his hire as is the laborer."

THE NEED FOR ALL-OUT INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION

There aren't enough people working today in the United States to keep the wheels going around. Why work? "The critical strike situation throughout the land blows hot and cold, mostly hot; one strike ends and another begins, but always the public is kept on the hot seat," Senator WILEY reports to Wisconsin editors. The Senator sums up the situation in these few words: "The consumer is hungry for autos, radios, refrigerators, washing machines; the farmer is desperate for new machinery." But the Senator regretfully notes the outstanding fact that the news of the times concerns "idle men and ever more strikes in the offing," though the country is sick of strikes. He concludes that "We want peace and production in industry so that goods will be turned out and the forces of inflation will be turned back."

[From the Altoona (Wis.) Daily Tribune of October 11, 1945]

Senator WILEY may have stepped on the toes of all good union leaders when he said that the Wagner Labor Act should be revised but you have to hand it to him for having the courage to say what most nonunion people think.

CONGRESSIONAL AFFAIRS

Some Senators, including the junior Senator from Wisconsin, have come out openly against the proposed increase in Congressmen's pay. Commenting on the proposed raise, Senator WILEY said:

"When the voters of Wisconsin returned me to office I knew full well the high expense of being a public servant—travel expense, telephone costs, and so on. It does not seem fair to me to vote for the $2,500 allowance, since last November I agreed, in effect, with my employers, the people, to serve at my present salary as a United States Senator.

"Last year I introduced a bill that would have permitted salary raises up to $37.50 for America's white-collar workers when private employers and employees agreed upon such increases. The Senate passed the bill, but the House killed it. If Congress would not permit a wage raise for these long-underpaid white-collar folks, why should it raise its own compensation?"

We think most of the home people will agree with him. * * * His stand against this proposal meets with the approval of the people.

FEDERAL-STATE RELATIONS

There has been much talk about the disappearance of State rights explicitly reserved in the Constitution but very little if anything has been done about it. It remained for United States Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin, to take the first practical step to attempt to gain relief.

It will, indeed, require an Alexander, or someone of dauntless courage, remorseless persistency, and ceaseless energy, if we are to escape this pernicious thralldom. It is all but too late unless the people are stirred to action. Senator WILEY proposes an investigation to determine just how far this trend of encroachment and obliteration of the States has proceeded. It would make recommendations, he proposes, for the restoration and maintenance of the proper distribution of authority and functions among the national, State, and local governments, as provided under the United States Constitution. Mr. WILEY says the situation urgently demands such an inquiry, and we say that he is exactly right.

We hope that something comes of Senator WILEY's far-seeing and courageous resolution, but it is only a hope. The continuous shower of Federal printing press money from the bureaucrats is all too alluring, too comfortable, and too well designed to keep the bureaucrats in office to expect that it will cease when the people demand that their Government be restored to them and that the prodigal waste of the people's money be brought to a halt. But we all know that many a nation has followed this glamorous, rose-petaled path, with showers of government checks falling about them like a gentle rain to their own destruction.

[From the Oklahoma City (Okla.) Daily Livestock News of October 5, 1945]

A joint committee of Congress has been proposed to investigate the present interrelationships between the powers and the activities of Federal, State, and local governments.

A bill for that purpose has been introduced by the junior Senator from Wisconsin. The committee would make recommendations for the restoration and maintenance of the proper distribution of authority and functions among those governments, as provided under the United States Constitution. The joint committee would seek to encourage harmony, efficiency, economy, and cooperation in the interrelated work of Federal, State, and local governments.

Senator WILEY doesn't mince words, as is proved by his statement:

"The battle between the proponents of centralization and the advocates of local self-government will rage fiercely in the coming months and years. The battle between local democracy at the cross-roads and Federal bureaucracy in Washington, D. C., will be intense and unremitting. The Federal bureaucrats will not give up their ill-gotten gains of power without a fight. They will not voluntarily surrender the functions which they kidnaped from the States and localities under the cloak of the depression and the war emergencies."

AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY is not from the South. He is from Wisconsin. He is not a Democrat. He is a Republican. But Senator WILEY used peculiarly convincing and effective words in opposing the FEPC bill in the Senate.

The Wisconsin Senator declared that "fair employment practices" is a misnomer and that this measure would stimulate rather than prevent unfair employment practices.

He declared further that the FEPC would create a super-Gestapo in every corner of the land, destroy the constitutional rights of citizens, drain the Treasury of needed revenue, and put a dangerous instrument in the hands of spiteful individuals.

WISCONSIN'S IMMORTAL BILLY MITCHELL

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY has reintroduced in the Senate a resolution for posthumous recognition of Brig. Gen. William L. "Billy" Mitchell, and the Senate of the United States can do no less than honor a man who honored himself while living. * * * In the Seventy-seventh Congress action was taken in the Senate restoring his rank, but it failed to pass in the House. Again in the Seventy-eighth Congress Senator WILEY reintroduced the resolution. Again the Senate confirmed it, but it failed in the lower House. And now, for the third time, the Senator from Wisconsin has introduced a resolution which would not only vindicate but restore him to the rank of major general. * * * We hope that Senator WILEY will follow this through to the end.

[From the Waukesha (Wis.) Daily Freeman of February 21, 1945]

United States Senator "ALEX" WILEY paid deserving tribute this week on the floor of the Senate to William L. "Billy" Mitchell on the day, February 19, which marked the ninth anniversary of his death. WILEY has worked untiringly to posthumously restore the rank of brigadier general to Mitchell, and we compliment him for it. * * * Congress now has a new opportunity to write the final chapter in the epic of this great man by adopting the Wiley resolution to restore Mitchell's rank.

ADVANCEMENT OF PEACE

Billions are spent for war and war preparation but virtually nothing is spent to prevent war except when a crisis arises. * * * There is no department of Government which gives its undivided attention to the subject of peace. Senator WILEY, of Wisconsin, Republican, had a good idea about this and made a speech about it in the Senate a year ago. He suggested that a Department of Peace be established to concentrate and specialize on the maintenance of peace. Nothing came of it because at the time, America was engrossed in war. Now the United Nations have set up an organization and the time has come for America to take the lead in establishing a special department of Government to carry on the all-important work of our participation in such a league.

[From the Arizona Tax Review of July 27, 1945]

LOCATION OF UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION

The junior Senator from Wisconsin has introduced a resolution formally inviting the United Nations "to locate the seat of the United Nations Organization within the United States of America." * * * Among reasons set forth for locating the headquarters in this country are "Our blessed country possesses unequaled modern facilities of housing, transportation, communication, etc., for UNO." Following which, the Senator pertinently asks the question, "Where else but in the United States should the United Nations headquarters be set up?"

[From the Chippewa Falls (Wis.) Herald-Telegram of October 28, 1945]

THE ATOMIC BOMB

Senator WILEY and Senator BALL engaged in a lively debate in the nation-wide radio broadcast Thursday night as to whether the United States should turn atomic bomb secrets over to the new United Nations Organization. * * *

Senator WILEY took the forthright position that American good intentions toward the world are a matter of record, at least during the century since the close of the Mexican War. And he further insisted that most of the nations of the earth, large and small, would rather have the bomb in our possession than have its secrets shared at this time. * * *

The Wisconsin Senator stressed the point that to share atomic secrets with all the world in the present state of world lawlessness would not invite cooperation: On the contrary, he declared it would invite the most lethal armament race of all time. * * *

He was on solid ground, of course, when he insisted that American good intentions for the last century are a matter of record. Not only has this country harbored no designs against the land or the goods, but any of its power politics as practiced by Old World nations has been and is still utterly repugnant to traditional American instincts.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Times-Herald of July 8, 1946]

A highly important resolution has been introduced in the Senate this week by Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican, of Wisconsin. Senator WILEY's resolution has to do with the current argument about international control of atomic energy. * * *

WILEY wants the Senate, before this session of Congress recesses, to put a flat and formal ban on any United States atom-bomb agreements with other nations except by consent of a two-thirds Senate majority.

* * * It is extremely important, it seems to us, that the Senate take this or similar action before Congress goes home.

AMERICA'S FOREIGN COMMERCE

Billions of dollars have been appropriated by Congress to help restore Europe. One of the ways to get it back is in foreign trade. A great many people believe that is not only a dream, but a pipe dream.

One of the ablest Republican Senators is ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin. He reminded the Senate this week that in prewar years that the foreign trade had averaged only from 3 to 5 percent of our national income, and he admitted that he was not enthusiastic about the effect of another "shot in the arm" doing the job. He added: "Perhaps I should ask, 'Will it even help?' If it will, then it will be worth the shot. But before we can be sure that it will help, we must know that these nations are entering upon the highway to help themselves as we did, as we have always done. And we must make sure, too, that in our dealing with them we are not depriving them of the very thing that will help nourish them back into economic and political health.

"I refer to the matter of foreign trade. We have made a fetish of it. We have propagandized the subject so that one would think that instead of 5 percent of our income being dependent upon foreign trade, 95 percent of it is so dependent."

War Profiteering

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 25 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the appendix of the RECORD an interview with myself by Lief Eid, on the subject of war profiteering, which was broadcast over the National Broadcasting Co. on July 19, 1946.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Thank you, Mr. Eid. I am glad to have the opportunity to appear on your program and report to the citizens of this country concerning our investigation of war profiteering. I believe the people of the country are entitled to frequent and full reports on the activities of their elected and appointed representatives.

In one sense, an investigation of war profiteering by the Special Senate Committee Investigating the National Defense Program, of which I have the honor to be chairman, is not new. The resolution introduced by President Truman—then a Senator—and adopted by the Senate on March 1, 1941, specifically instructed the committee to examine a great many of the features of contracts for the supply of war materials. In pursuance of the mandate of the Senate, the committee has always examined instances of war profiteering and has reported on a number of them in its annual and interim reports. You may recall the cases of the Empire Ordnance Corp., the Clifford E. MacEvoy Co., and Corrigan-Osborne & Wells. There have been others.

However, a great deal of the committee's time during the actual progress of the fighting was concerned with governmental regulations, expenditures, and other problems not strictly of a war profiteering nature, concerning which corrective action could be taken. In fact, corrective action was taken, in many instances, as a result of the investigative activities of our committee.

It was perfectly obvious to everyone that with the huge amount of expenditures for supplies in this war, which amounted to over $315,000,000,000 by VJ-day, and with the necessity of haste and the consequent relaxation of peacetime safeguards assuring the proper expenditure of public funds, there were bound to be instances of misconduct and profiteering at public expense. Price ceilings and price renegotiation, both of which were established and enforced during World War II, together with the excess profits tax, were important and, I believe, on the whole, successful devices for keeping down the cost of the war. However, no one thought these measures would completely prevent people from the making of inordinate profits.

The purpose of the current committee investigation of war profiteering is to study procurement practices during the war and to ascertain the effectiveness of the above laws and also procurement regulations in assuring a fair return for the taxpayers' dollar. The Erie Basin Metal Products, Inc., hearings have already disclosed a number of weaknesses in wartime procurement, and subsequent cases should add to our knowledge. On the basis of the facts developed by the committee, the committee is hopeful that improvements in procurement methods may be achieved for the benefit of our national defense in the future.

The committee will continue to examine other instances of war profiteering and poor procurement. The members intend to devote their time to this subject even during the recess of the Congress. It has always been the committee's practice not to announce investigations of any particular company or individual until it has conducted preliminary investigations and satisfied itself that no injustices will be done by a public announcement of the committee's investigation. There is a tendency, of course, to infer from the mere announcement that the committee is investigating a company that something is wrong. It would be unfair to a company or individual to make any such announcement until the committee had satisfied itself that practices existed which required its attention.

There is no need for me to review the facts concerning the war contracts obtained by the Garsson brothers—Henry and Murray—and their associates. Indeed, there would be insufficient time on this program to make even a brief statement of these facts. However, it might be of interest for me to state my personal reaction, as distinguished from that of the committee itself, on certain features which have been developed in our hearings. The committee's official conclusions, of course, will appear in a report of the committee which cannot be filed for some time to come.

These hearings have disclosed, in my opinion, a wholly inadequate investigation of persons or companies with whom the Government was to spend millions of dollars. Even a cursory investigation of Henry Garsson and Murray Garsson and even a cursory investigation of the alleged Erie Basin Metal Products, Inc., of New York, would have disclosed that the Garssons were not reputable and reliable manufacturers and would have disclosed that there was no such company as Erie Basin Metal Products, Inc., prior to January 30, 1942, and that there was no binding agreement whereby Garsson had access to manufacturing facilities. Yet a letter of intent was issued on that day for a contract which ultimately bound the Government to spend $3,000,000 of taxpayers' funds, on which the Government advanced nearly $1,000,000 to a company formed with no tangible assets.

Even if our procurement officials did not care whether the Garssons were financially and morally responsible, or whether they had adequate facilities to perform the contract, still, it seems to me, there should have been an inquiry as to whether they were or were not loyal to this Government and dependable in the sense of keeping secret the information they would receive about the munitions which they were to produce.

We all know how thoroughly investigations were made of the workers who had access to plants producing war materials. We know about the badge system, about the barbed-wire enclosures, about the guards, but here we were concerned with the heads of a company and the War Department did not seem to care who they were or what their background was.

That kind of procurement cannot be condoned on the ground that we were then fighting a war. In my judgment, the urgent need for the shells made it even more imperative that the procurement officials make certain that the material would be produced, and under conditions which were not inimical to the interests of our Government. The committee has frequently heard the excuse on the part of Army and Navy officers and Government officials that they were fighting a war and not keeping books or performing other functions normally performed in any well-regulated business. The committee has not been impressed with this excuse when the taxpayers or the war effort have suffered as a result of loose practices. The business-like way is usually the best way.

Nor is it an answer for the procurement officials to admit that their investigation was inadequate and that if they had made an investigation no contract would have been awarded and they say that the shells were produced. Certainly, if the shells were produced as rapidly and as well as they could have been produced by an existing company in an existing facility, it was not because of good procurement methods.

Another impression which I have from the testimony so far is that you cannot ignore the human element in war procurement. Regulations, no matter how excellent they may be, do not execute themselves. The human element which has appeared in these proceedings all the way through shows that problem after problem arose, loss after loss to the Government occurred simply because of the kind of people the Government was doing business with. These companies and the machinations of the Garssons and Freeman and Jacobson were a perpetual headache to responsible and honest procurement officials in the field.

These contractors were continually going over the heads of the people in the field and taking their problems to the highest places in Washington. They claimed they were seeking only fair treatment. The testimony satisfies me that they were being treated fairly and equally and what they were seeking was special treatment, more favorable than that given to other contractors. In mass production of war materials there must be regular procedures which apply equally to all. These procedures cannot work as they should if they are constantly being disrupted through outside interference. At least, the chairman of the committee is not impressed with the argument that these things were done to further the war effort. In my opinion, they were detrimental to the war effort.

I might say—and again this is personal, although I believe that in this statement I have the full support of all of the members of the committee—that a man in high position in public life should not permit his name to be referred to time and time again by apparently sincere and honest witnesses in a public hearing, and fail to rush to the defense of his name. A democratic government can function effectively only when its people have confidence in their representatives. In the public hearings on the Erie Basin case that confidence has been shaken. As a Member of the Congress, of which membership I am proud, I have an interest, as do all other Members, in the confidence and respect of the public. This is a matter which transcends partisan or political considerations. I would consider myself something less than a true public servant if I should participate in the suppression of facts concerning the public business on which the people of this country are entitled to know the truth.

I have been a member of the Special Senate Committee Investigating the National Defense Program from its very beginning. I know all of its members are proud of the fact that its decisions have been unanimous—that it has found a common ground of agreement on a level of service to the country, which is above partisan disagreements. There can be no issue that the public funds, especially in the war effort, should be handled in the interests of the public. Why should there be any disagreement between Republicans and Democrats if the facts are known? The committee will continue to investigate matters delegated to it for investigation by the Senate. It is my hope that there will be no more Erie Basin cases, but if there are, insofar as it is within my power, they will be explored fully and openly.

Equal Pay for Equal Work

OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, July 25 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "A Universal Principle," dealing with the subject of equal pay for equal work, published in the New York Herald Tribune of June 27, 1945.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A UNIVERSAL PRINCIPLE

The principle of equal pay for men and women who do equal work has been established in New York for a year. It is a universal principle which, it seems to us, should be in force throughout the Nation. Therefore, we welcome the introduction in both Houses of Congress of a bill to establish it nationally. Such a bill, introduced in the Senate by Senators PEPPER and MORSE, is sponsored in the House by Mrs. MARY T. NORTON. The Senate bill sets up an Administrative Division in the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor. Mrs. NORTON'S bill would provide a separate administrative bureau.

The aim of the two bills is the same: That women who do the same work should be given the same pay as men. "The Congress hereby finds that the existence in industry of differentials based on sex is an inequity in compensation standards which constitutes an unfair practice," reads the Senate bill. It notes that this unfair practice tends to depress wage standards in general, to affect adversely the living standards of a family dependent on a woman for support, and, in particular, to have "serious detrimental effects on the standard of living of families of deceased or disabled veterans."

The provisions for investigation and regulation by the Administrative Division follow closely those of similar bills governing employer-employee relations. To insure that equitable standards are established for the evaluation of such variables as job classifications, standards for training and wage-rate ratios between classifications, the bill sets up industry committees to make recommendations on these matters. We see no reason why so just a measure should be delayed. Who will want to argue that any wage discrimination whatsoever against a woman who supports a family—and, unfortunately, there will be many such women when this war is done—would be tolerable?

Centennial Celebration of Raising of the American Flag at Monterey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, July 25 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address recently delivered by me before a group of Californians in Washington, celebrating the centennial of the raising of the American flag at the old Custom House at Monterey.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On July 7 of this year California celebrated the centennial of the raising of the American flag at the old customhouse at Monterey. An elaborate program of events was participated in by representatives of the Federal Government, Gov. Earl Warren, of the State of California, grand officers and members of the Orders of Native Sons and Native Daughters of the Golden West, officials of the city of Monterey and thousands of Californians who joined in the important historical ceremony.

The old Custom House is now the property of the State of California and administered by the California State Park Commission. The celebration at Monterey is one of the preliminary centennial observances of historic events which will occur throughout California during the next few years. In 1948 will come the centennial of the gold discovery, in 1949 events dealing with the gold-rush days, to be followed finally, in 1950, by the hundredth anniversary of the admission of California to statehood.

The celebration at Monterey on July 7 had a Nation-wide significance. The acquisition of California brought this far-western Territory under the flag of the United States, and 4 years later into the Union as a State. There has always been much speculation as to what might have occurred if Sloat had not raised the American flag at that particular time. With some other nation in possession of California the history and future of the far-western Territory would have been vitally affected.

Two years after Sloat raised the flag came the gold discovery on January 24, 1848. Then began the great trek to the West, and it is generally conceded that had it not been for the discovery in California, and the millions added to the gold supply as a result, it is doubtful if the United States Government would have been in a position to have successfully financed the Civil War. The gold discovery also brought to the attention of the country the necessity for long distance railroading, and accentuated the movement for the construction of an isthmian canal. Over 43,000 emigrants came to California in ox teams and covered wagons during the gold rush days.

For several years there has been speculation as to just where the flag pole stood on which Commodore Sloat raised the American flag on July 7, 1846. The impression has prevailed for 75 years that the flag was raised at the northwest corner of the old Custom House, and that the staff was attached to the building. Sixty years ago, namely, on July 7, 1886, a fortieth anniversary celebration was held at Monterey, and the flag unfurled at the northwest corner. At the fiftieth anniversary in 1896 the national emblem was again raised on the same staff. At this celebration one of the most interesting incidents was when Midshipman William T. Toler, aide-de-camp and signal officer for Commodore Sloat who had performed the same service 50 year before, and who was now quite feeble, again grasped the halyards, evidently forgetting the exact location after the lapse of half a century.

A few weeks prior to the approaching centennial the California State Park Commission, in order to obtain the fullest possible evidence concerning the original location of the flagstaff upon which the flag was raised July 7, 1846, decided to call upon the University of California to make excavations at the building to ascertain, if possible, the exact location of the original staff. Those representing the university were Theodore C. McCown, assistant professor of anthropology, Ralph W. Chaney, Professor of Paleontology, and Herbert E. Bolton, Sather professor of history, emeritus. In direct charge of the investigation was Mr. Vernon Aubrey Neasham, regional historian, National Park System, who several years ago had made investigations concerning the dates of the building of the Customs House and had been supervisor of the California Historic Landmarks WPA project, sponsored by the State Park Commission.

The position of the original staff was found five and a half feet from the northeast corner of the Custom House and on this spot a new flagpole has been erected for the centennial ceremonies this year. Old prints, particularly the one drawn by W. R. Hutton in June 1846, documentary evidence from the accounts of Thomas O. Larkin showing he had erected a new flagpole at the Custom House in 1843, and the excavations made, leave little doubt that the right location has been found. The excavations were made by the department of anthropology of the University of California. The base of the rotted flagpole was found anchored in a rock cairn several feet below the present ground level. This new flagstaff was dedicated by the State Park Commission under the auspices of the Native Sons and Native Daughters of the Golden West on July 6, and on the following day the American flag was again raised on this original location. Gov. Earl Warren, of California, and other notables participated.

The Monterey Custom House is a California-owned historic monument. The campaign for its preservation was started by the Native Sons of the Golden West in 1900. The organization secured a lease through the aid of California Congressmen, and the control of the property was transferred to the order, and formal delivery made on September 9, 1900, when the fiftieth anniversary of the State's admission into the union was celebrated in San Francisco. In 1901 the State by legislative act took over the Native sons' lease, and provided for the appointment of trustees to administer the property. An initial appropriation of $4,200 was made for the preservation of the building. At that time part of the roof had fallen and other repairs were necessary. Other legislative appropriations were later made to complete the restoration. With the creation of the California State Park Commission in 1927 the lease from the Federal Government was transferred to that body and the property had since been administered by California.

Through an act of Congress passed in 1935 provision was made for the sale of all public buildings of historic importance not utilized by the Government, preference to be given to State or municipal bodies to purchase for public use at half the appraised value. The customhouse was appraised by the Government at $40,000 and an offer made by the State which was accepted and purchased for $20,000. Half of this sum was provided by the Park Commission for the State of California and the remaining $10,000 raised by the people of Monterey and vicinity as necessary under the Park Act. A number of local World War veterans who had refused bonuses voted by Congress but who felt that for a purpose as worthy and patriotic they would accept the amount originally promised and turn the total back to the Government as a contribution toward the acquisition of this historic Federal building. This was done.

In 1842 on October 20 Commodore Thomas Catesby Jones seized Monterey in the name of the United States. Jones feared that another nation was bent on taking over California. He later found that he had acted hastily, the flag was lowered, an apology offered to the Mexican authorities, and the Mexican flag again raised where it remained until Commodore Sloat 4 years later again took possession in the name of the United States Government.

The history of the construction of the customhouse is most interesting. New evidence found in the Bancroft Library had caused the conclusion to be accepted that the date of the first construction was in the late 1820's during the Mexican period. Years between and including 1841 and 1846 mark the beginning of enlargement and new construction, with Thomas O. Larkin as the contractor for the Mexican Government. It was during this period that the building took on its present appearance. It has a two-story north wing, a long one-story central portion, and a two-story southern wing.

It can be appreciated that this old landmark was worthy of preservation and to the Order of Native Sons, of which I am a member, and to the Order of Native Daughters, and other organizations and individuals participating, too much credit cannot be accorded. The raising of the flag over the historic building on July 7, 1946, following a century of tremendous growth in California and the far West, is an event of great significance to the State and Nation.

Lake Diversion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial which appeared in a recent issue of the Chicago Tribune:

LAKE DIVERSION

Diversion of water from Lake Michigan was doubled for a week during the recent coal strike in order to increase power production at the Lockport plant of the Chicago sanitary district. In spite of the additional diversion, the level of Lake Michigan rose more than 2 inches from May to June. The lake now stands 1.27 feet higher than its mean level during the years from 1900 to 1945.

These figures effectively dispose of complaints that diversion of water at Chicago for sanitation and navigation purposes in causing a lowering of the levels of the Great Lakes. Their levels fluctuate in cycles. It is unfortunate that the testimony on which the Supreme Court based its verdict in the lake level case should have been taken at a period of low water. The facts now available prove that the canal had nothing to do with it. The Supreme Court ought to reopen the case and modify its order in accordance with the known facts.

Fifteen Million Will Die

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MATTHEW M. NEELY

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from Babson's Reports for March 4, 1946:

FIFTEEN MILLION WILL DIE

The dread scourge cancer stalked and killed more Americans in 1944 than were slain in battle on every front in all the years of World War II. Cancer knows no age. In molding horror, it assails and destroys impartially the old and the young—children, babies. Cancer knows no pity for any of the human race. Rich and poor. Men and women. In women between the ages of 35 and 55, in the bloom of their life, cancer is the first cause of death. Fifteen million people, living, breathing human souls, the good and the bad, the loved and unloved, now alive in the United States alone are doomed, doomed to die of cancer unless the present methods of control are improved.

True, many of these if they will may live. Thousands die, in slow agony, who might survive if they would immediately report to doctors. Caught quickly while death holds the hour glass in balance, cancer is the victim, not mankind. Yet the poor, the innocent, the ignorant, do not realize the fleeting seconds that they may hold cancer at bay, in which they may gain its mastery. More Nation-wide information, more attacks on prudish fear and superstitious folklore, must be launched. And launched immediately.

There are many separate research centers, understaffed, poorly paid, which toil valiantly to combat the satanic foe in all its guises. There are some hospitals, but these are overcrowded, inadequate. Wealthy men have given to aid mankind. Industry, Government, Federal, State—individuals of all ranks have helped. But far more than the driblets which have trickled into the empty basin must come. In a Nation able and willing to spend $2,000,000,000 for the atomic bomb without even knowing it, so vast is its wealth, surely a sum equal to that could be raised to free not only its citizens, but the world as well of a more inexorable enemy than the Axis.

Give the scientists the means to study, to release us from suffering. Give them dollars. They will give us health where possible. Give them but one-third or one-half of the money spent to unleash destructibe atomic energy, and they will build a better race to inhabit the world. They will give to us thousands, millions of souls to live with, not to mourn over. They may do it eventually working slowly, carefully, motivated by the love of mankind. But have we so little concern for human life, so little gratitude for endless hours of heartbreak, of patient failure after failure that they have endured alone, that we will not help them to help us? Can it be that our brother's, our own life means so little that dollars count more? That united Nation-wide planning is but a phrase to mouth emptily? Or is it just our indifference, our well-intentioned lethargy that lets friend after friend die with a sobbing "terrible, terrible?" Nothing but weak action follows the dead who can speak no more to warn us that cancer knows all men, and no man as friend.

As each must suffer alone, die alone, so must each citizen tell his brother to unite for the building of a greater and greater research effort; so that many now doomed may live. To the cold-blooded economist, the prolonging of healthy life means more customers and greater prosperity. But this is not a request to promote greater industrial activity; it is a plea to all who believe that it is now time to direct a vast and united research effort toward improving man's welfare. Success would bring its own reward to all.

Russian Plans for Sovietizing Germany

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Herald Tribune of July 24, 1946:

WELLES TERMS MOLOTOV'S PLEA FOR UNIFIED GERMANY "CYNICAL"—SAYS RUSSIANS FEEL THAT UNDER SUCH SET-UP PEOPLE WOULD YIELD TO MOSCOW'S INFLUENCE, WHEREAS A FEDERATION WOULD BLOCK SOVIET EXPANSION

(By Sumner Welles, former Under Secretary of State)

Many of the smaller countries to be represented at the Paris Peace Conference will urge drastic modification of the more pernicious of the decisions reached by the Council of Foreign Ministers. Their governments are convinced that no durable peace in Europe can be founded on shabby compromises. Dr. Evatt, as always forthright and farsighted, has made it clear that such governments as that of Australia will not join at Paris in any chorus of "yes men."

Some of the lesser governments have not forgotten—even if our own Government has—Woodrow Wilson's great words: "Every territorial settlement must be in the interests of the populations concerned, and not a part of any mere adjustment or compromise of claims between rival States."

But whatever the results of the conference may be the deliberations of the delegates will throughout be overshadowed by Mr. Molotov's pronouncement to the German people, and by the knowledge of the delegates that there exists no semblance of understanding between the Big Four upon the kind of peace to be accorded Germany and Austria. For the key to the reconstruction of Europe must be found in the German and Austria peace settlements.

HODGEPODGE OF COMPROMISE

The inability of the Big Four, 14 months after the end of the war, to reach any agreement upon the foundation essential to any European peace emphasizes more sharply than ever before the gravity of the failure of the United States to secure before the victory was won a firm accord between the major allies covering the long-range policy to be pursued toward the defeated Germany. Every month which has passed since V-E Day has made it more unlikely that this Government can still obtain a peace with Germany which will spell safety for the American people, and which will not prove to be, as is the peace with Italy now drafted, a hodgepodge of fatal compromises and of a total disregard for the principles of the Atlantic Charter to which the Big Four are solemnly pledged.

Mr. Molotov has now told the world what the Soviet government wants in Germany. His statement, together with its interpretation by the official press of Moscow, has proved more revealing for a long time past.

None of the Western democracies will take issue with Mr. Molotov's renewed declaration that the German war machine and the Nazi system must be erased. With his insistence upon the "democratization" of the German people there would also be no quarrel if he meant by that term what democracies mean.

"CYNICAL" SOVIET POLICY

But in the balance of his statement the fantastic cynicism of Soviet policy may be seen at its most glaring extreme.

Mr. Molotov now piously condemns any "dismemberment" of Germany. Yet Russia has already taken half of East Prussia, and has secured for her present satellite, Poland, the other half, together with Germany's agricultural regions west of the Oder.

At Potsdam the Soviet Government joined the United States and Great Britain in decreeing the political and economic decentralization of Germany. Mr. Molotov now refuses to consider the establishment of any federated Germany or anything approaching a return to the healthy autonomy of the ancient German states.

Mr. Molotov has turned his back on France. He has rejected France's demand for that indispensable measure of security which she would obtain with the removal of the Ruhr, the Rhineland, and the Saar from the control of any central German government.

Mr. Molotov talked much of the need for the immediate creation of centralized agencies in Germany. Yet when France made a major concession by withdrawing her long-standing objection to this step, Mr. Molotov refused to agree.

The Soviet government has now demanded the reconstruction of a united Germany, to be governed by a central government, located presumably in Berlin, where Russia already dominates the scene.

What this implies is very plain.

The Soviet government has been eminently successful in achieving its objective within the Russian zone of Germany. It has already forced upon the German people in that zone a political, economic, and social transformation destined to make the region a tributary of the Soviet system.

LACK COHERENT PROGRAM

The British and American Governments have failed to carry out any integrated, coherent, or democratic program within their zones. Political confusion and economic prostration are intrinsically as great as when the occupation began.

The Soviet Government has therefore decided to move ahead. It has consistently catered to German nationalism. It is now convinced that in a unified Germany the political agencies which it has successfully set up in the Russian zone would rapidly dominate any central government that might be established, and that under such a government the masses of the people throughout Germany would soon prove submissive to the influence of Moscow. In their present misery and distress the peculiar psychology of the German people will make them as prone to adopt the tenets of Soviet communism as they were a few years ago to support Hitlerism. In the opinion of the Kremlin, the creation of a German federation of autonomous states would be more likely to block the westward expansion of the Soviet system and would probably place Germany's major industrial resources under western control.

A politically centralized Germany, governed from Berlin, will offer no hope of future security to the free peoples of the west.

If such a Germany is reconstituted, and if the present terms of the Italian and Hungarian treaty drafts are confirmed, the documents to be signed in Paris will be written on the sand.

A Veteran's Views on OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I have received a number of letters recently from the clear-thinking veterans who are not asking that a portion of their grocery bills be paid out of money which Uncle Sam must borrow to pay their subsidies and who are willing to pay their way as they go.

The following is an illustration of the thinking of one of our outstanding young men of my district who is sufficiently matured to grasp the apparent desire of the bureaucrats to control, not so much prices as our economy. This young man is from one of our best democratic families and I am happy to give my colleagues and the public the benefit of his thinking. The letter follows:

Since I last visited with you, I have been in and out of the Army and you have been elected to the House of Representatives. Congratulations to you upon the attainment of that distinction.

I have come back to Tulsa to practice law instead of returning to * * * Texas, where I practiced before the war, and would like for you to know my personal views with regard to the OPA question.

The OPA has been a most desirable institution in aid of curbing inflationary trends during this last war. Even with its many inequities, seemingly a characteristic of almost every governmental agency, still it served a worthwhile purpose.

I am unalterably opposed to the enactment of any price-control legislation at the present time for several reasons. The two most important reasons, I believe, are: First (as recognized by Congress for many years in Federal legislation prohibiting private conspiracy or action, the effect of which is to control prices), the arbitrary control of prices is a dangerous thing because it nullifies the operation of the normal laws of supply and demand, and, second, the tendency toward governmental control of business, large and small (admitted by those in the ascendency in our Federal Government for the past several years), will be given additional impetus by any such legislation at this time.

I think it well that this problem has been thoroughly debated in the Congress and even more thoroughly discussed in the newspapers and magazines of the Nation. I am not opposed to continued debate on this matter so long as the ultimate result is nonpassage of such a law or the veto of same. The threat of such a law may cause that portion of our business people who may be inclined to reap vast profits at the expense of the consumer to limit their price increases to a reasonable figure until the question is settled; meanwhile, perhaps, production will begin its upward trend and cause a competitive market to again place in operation the natural law of supply and demand.

But even though the question should be settled and the threat removed at an early date, I still believe that for the ultimate good of all we should be willing to sacrifice a few dollars to excessive costs of living during the few months which will be required for our economy to readjust itself and again become a free and competitive economy. In such a free economy it has been frequently demonstrated that the man who offers the best services and pays a reasonable wage will profit therefrom in proportion and the man who has little to offer in the way of services to the public or advantages to the employee will be required by a recalcitrant public to adjust his business practices and accept a reasonable profit as well as pay a reasonable wage.

To think of arbitrarily controlling prices, and therefore profits, in peacetime America, it seems to me, is to think in terms of placing those who are least capable, less honest and fair and who have the least initiative upon the same footing as the man who is willing to work industriously, to deal honestly and to display the attributes of initiative and ambition which have always been the distinguishing mark of the American business man, small or large.

The worker will ultimately benefit from the burial of OPA in increased production which means more jobs, more commodities to purchase, lower prices and all of this with a reasonable pay rate and improved working conditions.

We are not now experiencing a depression, but rather we are living in a period of what I would call prosperous inflation, when most people have a generous income and many have large savings accounts. This is the time during which the fundamentally free American economy should operate most advantageously to the greatest number of people.

I am not giving thought to those who are needy, because that is a different problem which should be handled by other means than price control. I am not thinking of a period of depression, because that is a problem wholly different from the present problem and should be considered separately.

This is a time when our Congress and our Senate should have the fortitude to demonstrate to the White House and to all the varied political advisors surrounding the White House, that legislation which is enacted as a temporary expedient will be stricken from the lawbooks when the emergency which required its passage no longer exists.

If the people were made to feel that they could depend upon their Representatives in Congress for courageous, intelligent leadership, the executive department might again assume its normal functions and not parade as the sole friend of the common man in Washington.

Please accept my views as altogether personal to me, and for whatever they might be worth.

Connecticut and the McMahon Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial appeared in the Bridgeport Post of July 23, reprinted from the Manchester Herald, of Manchester, Conn.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I insert this editorial in order to show the Members how sentiment in my State runs on this vital legislative question:

M'MAHON BILL IN THE HOUSE

(Manchester Herald)

In the first 2 days of House debate on the McMahon bill for domestic control of atomic energy, the only Republican Member of the House to support the measure in substantially its Senate form has been Congresswoman CLARE LUCE, of Fairfield County. Mrs. LUCE supported the bill reluctantly, for she dislikes the prospect of Government control of any potential basis of industrial energy. But she supports the bill because she has been one legislator who, from the start, has had a full realization of the terrible and tragic importance of atomic energy to the world's and to this country's future. She supports the bill, with its essential civilian control of domestic development of atomic energy, even though she also happens to be one of those Members of Congress most informed and perhaps most alarmed about the possibilities of world conflict between the United States and Russia.

In this, she is in contrast to a good many Members of the House who know a lot about Russia. Their formula is to leave atomic energy in the secret possession of our military and the sooner our military use their power to start dropping atomic bombs on Russia the better they will be pleased. Or, at least, that is what their efforts to kill off the McMahon bill entirely would indicate.

We said once before that the one brief interlude of sanity in the present session of Congress came one Saturday afternoon when the Senate suddenly took up and passed the McMahon bill with Senator VANDENBERG joining forces with Senator MCMAHON in the effort.

The McMahon bill, as it came before the Senate, represented the sincere and sound harmony of views attained between MCMAHON and VANDENBERG after months of sincere attention to testimony and opinions from those who split the atom and therefore know it best.

Mrs. LUCE, in her own quest of a sound position on the issue of atomic energy, herself consulted these same experts tirelessly and thoroughly until, as her speeches showed, she had a thorough grasp of the issues for mankind the atom presents.

Wyatt Seeks To Shift Blame for Failure of Housing Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, Wilson Wyatt, the pseudo home builder, is today shouting from the housetops that Congress must pass the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill or his own emergency housing program will fail. In other words, Mr. Wyatt, seeing his empire collapsing about him, now is using the familiar technique of the Washington planners and is seeking to shift the responsibility for his failure on Congress. I rise today merely to keep the record straight and to see that the blame is placed where it belongs.

The Wyatt program was destined to fail from the beginning. When the fraudulently named and purely political veterans' housing bill was before Congress we were told time and time again that it would never build more than a few glorified chicken coops but that it would prevent the building of thousands of decent homes by private contractors.

I understand that an effort is now being made in the Banking and Currency Committee to bring the WET bill—as it has been appropriately called on Capitol Hill—to the floor before adjournment.

We do not need this legislation, Mr. Speaker. It will only further bog down the building industry which, if left alone, will construct far more homes than all the bureaucrats in Washington could shake a stick at. Mr. Wyatt says his plan will fail unless the WET bill is passed. I say his program has already failed. It has been a 100 percent flop. Mr. Wyatt knew before his subsidized building program was passed by Congress that it would fail. So let us go home and let Mr. Wyatt stew in his own juice.

The following letter is typical of many I have received from reputable home builders of Michigan. The experience of the writer of this letter has been that of all other builders who have written me. This letter shows that without Mr. Wyatt's program and governmental interference we would have in America today hundreds, yes thousands, of completed homes to house veterans and their families.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., July 22, 1946.

Hon. PAUL SHAFER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am a builder of fine houses and have been building since 1934, excepting during the war years. Last September 15th I started the first of 26 houses. Today I have 15 completed, 6 houses standing idle because of the lack of materials such as plumbing fittings, electric wiring, nails, rock lath, finish mill work, outside and inside doors, and plywood. Five of the 26 houses are in different stages of construction but will soon be at a standstill.

At the beginning of this year I had a capacity of building at least one house a week. Since materials became impossible to get it was necessary for me to lay off more than half of my employees, some of them ex-service men.

I believe, Mr. Shafer, that Mr. Wilson Wyatt has failed the builders of America. He has not done the things he promised to do and that was to break the bottlenecks in the building materials.

The United States does not need a housing program such as the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill. We builders need materials to build houses with and to train ex-service men the different trades in the building industry.

It was my intention the first of the year to build from 60 to 80 new houses this year, but now with the materials so critically short I will be doing well to complete the 26 now under construction.

Sincerely yours,
LEONARD W. VANDEN BERG.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, the people back home in my district should know that we friends of OPA had to fight all the way to retain the price regulations which would preserve their dollars.

This postwar period is no different from its predecessors. The same forces are at work which, if not thwarted, will steal away what money you have saved or any wages you may earn later. When prices soar, your money loses purchasing power. In effect, a portion of your money has been taken from you. Wars are not over when the last bullet is fired. When hostilities cease, we enter into a critical last stage which, thanks to OPA, need not be chaotic.

But wide distribution of cash, coupled with scarcity of much-needed commodities, can set the stage perfectly for inflation, sky-high prices, profiteering, and, finally, widespread unemployment, bank and business failures, and panic. A great many people live for a few years in a fool's paradise. But there is the awakening when we are on the very brink of national ruin. After the last war, we embarked on this course under Harding, stock gambled our way under Coolidge, and all but succumbed under Hoover.

If we are headed for that cycle again, we at least should know the road we are following. And we should know who is responsible for leading us to economic ruin.

Wars are not over when the last bullet is fired. We are now at Pearl Harbor so far as prices and the reconversion and readjustment to normal business are concerned. We may have to wait as many as 5 years until we are in the clear. It is convenient thinking to rid ourselves of every memory of the recent conflict. But we cannot wish ourselves out of postwar inflation. I submit that regulations have been relaxed or withdrawn as quickly as conditions permitted. Witness the free purchase of gasoline a day after VJ-day. Gasoline was in sufficient supply to meet the demand. The same could not be said of bread, dairy products and meats, shirts and men's clothing. Ceilings just had to be maintained on these products, or we would be placed in a position of bidding against each other for the very necessities of life.

Oh, what excellent examples of this truth in these July weeks when OPA operation has been suspended. Your protests put our Republican Congressmen, very reluctantly, in a mood to compromise. These few weeks have made clearer to the average voter how intelligent and how courageous was the Truman veto. We who fought every sabotaging amendment to OPA have seen the smile of Republican victory turn to a look of grave concern as letters and telegrams poured in upon OPA opponents in Congress. Republican Congressmen had misread the intent and desires of the American people. They have learned nothing from the mistakes of other postwar periods. These gentlemen have always been particularly sensitive to the lobbies of organizations like the National Association of Manufacturers. This outfit spent $400,000 on newspaper advertising alone to kill OPA. And its lobbyists were both smooth and skillful.

WHO ARE THE BEST FRIENDS OF FREE ENTERPRISE?

They and the Republican Congressmen on the floor chanted about the glories of free enterprise. Nobody wants free enterprise to thrive more than I do. I was born and have lived all my life in a congressional district which always believed that way. But free enterprise can remain free only as long as it serves. It must be flexible enough to bend with conditions. It must be elastic enough to be abated and accelerated with changing situations. If it can meet the needs of the people, it will never require a National Association of Manufacturers to save it. If it fails the people, no association or combination of associations can rescue it. There is no surer way of killing off so-called small business than in bringing about the inflation which abolition of OPA would cause. When any system becomes futile in operation, it gives way to something sounder.

The bread lines and apple selling under Hoover marked the most dangerous threat to free enterprise this Nation has ever known. The national frame of mind was ready for the "man on a white horse" and dictatorship. Only the heroic and swift action of Franklin D. Roosevelt saved free enterprise then. The greatest statesman of our time was the savior of the very system our Republican friends now chant about. Small business failures reached an all-time high in this period of Harding-Coolidge-Hoover.

Let me ask these mistaken but voluble friends of free enterprise if they have observed what is happening elsewhere in democracies. Free enterprise has not been doing so well in Britain where the Government has taken over the ancient Bank of England, and is about to do likewise with the coal mines. Meantime, it has been making studies of a dozen other industries there which may lead to Government operation.

The Argentine, in a free election, selected a candidate who promised he would have government exercise many of the functions previously performed by business.

All of this is to say that free enterprise is on the defensive, and we, its friends, want it to survive in this country, its last real citadel. You small businessmen who are annoyed at OPA regulation be wary lest you throw off a little restraint and bring complete domination upon yourselves. In your votes in November you carry the life and death power over the very economic system you believe in. If it is ever discarded, it will be because the consumers will it. And they will demand what course this Nation will follow if wholesale inflation is inflicted upon us. The very groups which ganged up on price regulation will suffer by the inflation which will follow the abolition of OPA. Sometimes I wish we could let them burn their fingers all over again. But there is always the thought of the mass suffering which another Hoover panic would bring. If they would work ruin only on themselves, we could stand by while they engineered their folly.

In an article written last Friday, July 19, for publication in community papers for my district in Philadelphia, I explained to my constituents the course OPA legislation followed in Congress. It reads:

The story of OPA in Congress is a sad and confusing one.

When the bill came to the House to extend OPA, it was brought in to extend in its existing form. It was a move on the part of 90 percent of the Republicans and 10 percent of the Democrats to emasculate it to such an extent that it would be useless. Although the administration would have been saddled with what the public believed to be a price control bill, inflation would have become rampant; and the administration and Democratic Congressmen would have been accused of the results. The real cause of failure would have been the poor bill.

Seven amendments passed on the original extension in the House that tended to destroy price control. I voted against all of those amendments on record roll calls. We were defeated. Every one of the amendments passed.

The bill as it passed the House was no good. I voted for this bill with a clothespin on my nose, in order that it could be sent to the Senate, with the possibility that the Senate would amend our bill and restore the price set-up. We were faced with the proposition of either voting for the bill in order to send it to the Senate or of being accused by constituents of opposing OPA.

When the bill went to the Senate, it was further emasculated. The Senate put decontrols on nearly everything and included the Taft amendment.

After the bill left the Senate, it went in conference between the House and Senate. The conferees were successful in keeping price controls on meat and food products, including dairy products. President Truman's big objection was that it destroyed price controls via the Wolcott, Taft, and Wherry amendments.

When the conference report came before the House, we had a situation similar to that which existed when the first bill passed the House. If we had voted against the bill, many of our constituents would have been confused and would have believed that we were opposed to OPA; whereas from the outset I have always supported a strong OPA bill. The only thing we could do was vote for the bill and hope that the President would veto it. With the President's vetoing the bill, and his explanation to the people of the country, we were in a position to uphold his veto. After voting for the bill, I signed the petition requesting the President to veto it.

The Republicans overwhelmingly are the ones who have been sabotaging OPA. This is the most clear-cut political issue between the two parties on which the people can go to the polls in November and cast their votes.

This covers the story of my OPA vote up to this point. You can be assured that I have been and am now completely in favor of price regulations so long as the postwar situation requires it.

When President Truman carried his veto message to the people there was an instant response in the form of a telegram barrage upon the Congress. He ably depicted how the mounting prices of items on an assembled job like an automobile could double its cost. His courageous veto, supported by 90 percent of the Democrats and 10 percent of the Republicans, saved what price regulations we were able to salvage. The vote told us what we could expect in party support for the measure in the next Congress.

GI JOE RETURNS

The recent global war was waged by America with fewer mistakes than any conflict in our history. We had men in high places, including Congress, who had participated in World War I. They were determined that the injustices, inadequacies, and incompetencies of their war would not be repeated in ours. In this spirit they wrote the GI bill of rights. We who served this time were better fed, clothed, trained, equipped, armed, and doctored, because our predecessors kept errors and shortages at a minimum.

Many of these 1918 veterans remembered coming back to a new world of prices where suits and overcoats were doubled, even tripled, in price. They were happy in the idea that, because of OPA ceilings, no such hardship was being worked on dischargees from our war. Scarcities have existed because of the millions of dischargees catapulted back into civvies. This could easily have resulted in fantastic prices were it not for ceilings.

But all that is threatened now. Many a GI married his girl on furlough and now there are three in the family. The wife and kid have been housed in one room with the in-laws. There is not enough space for GI Joe, and he is hunting new family quarters. If he is lucky enough to find them, every item for setting up housekeeping from food to furniture will come too high for his pocketbook. We were so careful of his welfare in the fighting forces and now tell him to get a long as best he can. Very often he does not wish to avail himself of any feature of the GI bill. He just wants an even chance to readjust himself to becoming a useful citizen. And he cannot afford to pay crazy prices in the process.

PRICE REGULATION HAS DONE WELL BY US

Before suspension of OPA on July 1, 1946, every business index pointed to the Nation's well-being. Employment was at a peacetime high; business failures low. Carloading and bank deposits were in great shape. Free enterprise was doing very well indeed, OPA notwithstanding.

One other index gave us a picture of what was to happen if OPA was abolished. The New York stock market went up and down according to how OPA fared in Washington. It rose with the adverse vote in Congress and dropped when President Truman vetoed the emasculated bill. The boys who gamble with stocks were licking their chops in anticipation of another Coolidge merry-go-round. Inflation would put action into their game, but how the rest of us would suffer.

In the extension of OPA we have the topmost issue of the November elections. Once again we are on the spot we occupied when a postwar America elected a Republican Congress, and later selected Harding for President. This is the same spot as the one in 1919 which began a pleasant life in a fool's paradise. This is the Harding spot of rapidly rising prices. Later we had stock and real estate gambling under Coolidge, and then breadlines and apple selling under Hoover.

This is the equivalent of the pre-Harding spot, and you can prevent sad history from repeating itself by saying "The same thing is not going to happen this time. I know who the inflationists are by how they voted on OPA's crippling amendments. Ninety percent of them were Republicans. I want price regulation until there is no further need for it. Those few weeks in July 1946 taught me what can happen to prices when regulation comes off. I want my dollars to buy 100 cents' worth of value. I want to keep small businessmen in business and I want no repetition of Coolidge and Hoover failures. I want an America that is intelligent enough to keep free enterprise free. It will return the friends of OPA to Congress."

The Road Back?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, our Secretary of State, the Honorable James F. Byrnes, said in his report on the recent meeting of the four Chancelors in Paris:

I admit that prior to our meeting in April I had little hope that we would ever reach an agreement. After our April meeting I had less hope. Now the prospects for peace treaties with five countries is bright. * * * We are on the road back to peace.

Mr. Byrnes' optimism is not shared by all the citizens of the country he has the honor to represent, some of whom feel, as is shown by the following letter which appeared in the New York Times of July 24, that we are, indeed, on the road back—to war.

The writer of this letter, Mr. Charles G. Bolté, is well known as the first chairman and principal organizer of the American Veterans' Committee, one of the most articulate and energetic groups of former servicemen. For this reason alone—that it reflects the doubts of a number of those who brought us victory—it commands attention from legislators and the public generally.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include Mr. Bolté's letter in the RECORD:

A PLAN FOR SURVIVAL—NONE IS OFFERED, IT IS HELD, IN THE CARNEGIE COMMITTEE PROPOSAL

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Andrew Carnegie must be still revolving in his grave from hearing the astral echoes of that proposal for the international control of atomic energy announced by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Mr. Carnegie's endowment was made for the purpose of abolishing war. The proposal produced by those to whom he entrusted his millions is designed to perpetuate the conditions which preclude peace.

Mr. Carnegie was quite unequivocal when, on December 14, 1910, he transferred to the trustees of the Carnegie Peace Fund $10,000,000 of 5-percent first-mortgage bonds, "the revenue of which is to be administered by you to hasten the abolition of international war, the foulest blot upon our civilization." He told the trustees: "The nation is criminal which refuses arbitration and drives its adversary to a tribunal which knows nothing of righteous judgment. * * * The judge who presides over a case in which he is interested dies in infamy if discovered. The citizen who constitutes himself a judge in his own cause as against his fellow citizen and presumes to attack him is a lawbreaker and as such is disgraced. So should a nation be held as disgraced which insists upon sitting in judgment in its own cause in case of an international dispute."

FOUNDER'S PURPOSE

Mr. Carnegie was optimistic. He wished to leave his trustees a free hand. He only instructed them that "when * * * war is discarded as disgraceful to civilized men as personal war (dueling) and man selling and buying (slavery) have been discarded within the wide boundaries of our English-speaking race, the trustees will please then consider what is the next most degrading remaining evil or evils whose banishment * * * would most advance the progress, elevation, and happiness of man."

Yet it appears that the Carnegie Endowment's committee on atomic energy has not even taken seriously the founder's earliest injunction. Faced with man's largest problem in practical politics, the committee can only propose that atomic energy be controlled by an international commission operating subject to the jerry-built regulations of the Security Council, regulations which provide that the only five nations capable of waging large-scale war shall sit in judgment on their own cases.

Commenting on the proposal, Dr. James T. Shotwell, chairman of the committee, makes much of the fact that the international commission could investigate any "situation" without being deterred from its investigation by the veto. However, Dr. Shotwell spells out the difficulty which remains:

"While the International Commission on Atomic Energy would thus have full power of supervision, it would have to call the Security Council for police action if that should be necessary as a last resort against the outbreak of atomic war."

DEFENDING THE STATUS QUO

It is surely an extraordinary and ironic state of affairs when a group of scholars, operating under a private grant earmarked for the abolition of war, is more backward and purblind in its recommendations than the official arms of government. Yet here we have Dr. Shotwell and his colleagues stoutly defending a status quo which offers not the slightest prospect of salvation, while Bernard Baruch, speaking for the President and the State Department, strikes out boldly toward a sensible solution.

The Shotwell committee presumes even to tell us that a system of inspection holds promise of security, in the face of the flat statement in the Acheson-Lilienthal report that "there is no propsect of security against atomic warfare in a system of international agreements to outlaw such weapons controlled only by a system which relies on inspection and similar police-like methods."

In these and in other respects, the Shotwell committee shows itself to be clearly on the side of reaction, not progress, in world affairs. The reactionary team these days presents an imposing array, including not only Dr. Shotwell but Mr. Gromyko, Walter Lippmann and the editors of the Daily Worker and the Hearst press, all of whom say that we should attempt to control the newest kind of weapons in the oldest kind of way.

Even the historians, some of them, learn nothing from history. Having studied the errors of the past, they urge that we repeat them. If we take their advice, I see little prospect other than destruction. The control of atomic energy is not a technical problem. It is a political problem. It is the problem of the control of war itself.

RULE OF LAW

If there is war, atomic bombs will be used. And there will be war unless the United Nations Charter is amended to provide for the rule of law in world affairs, binding equally upon individuals and upon nations, substituting for the present anarchy of unbridled sovereignty a system in which a measure of sovereignty is contributed by each nation to the newer sovereignty of the world community.

All of this is implicit in the Baruch report. The elimination of the veto in matters concerning atomic energy must of necessity be followed by its total elimination. This in turn must mean the early transformation of the General Assembly into a representative body with power to make laws, the transformation of the Security Council into an executive body with power to enforce the laws, the elimination of national armaments except for local police forces, and the possession by the resultant world governing body of preponderating military force.

If we wish to survive, let us face the true reality, as the delegates to the recent constitutional convention of the American Veterans Committee did when they urged the development of the United Nations into a limited world government and urged adoption of the Baruch report as the first step in this direction. Let us declare what we know to be the only true path through our present terrible danger. It is no less the only true path because following it will be enormously difficult. It may even be impossible. But when a course which seems to be impossible is also self-evidently necessary, we are betraying our status as men if we refuse to declare that we will attempt to follow it.

CHARLES G. BOLTÉ.

National Farm Safety Week

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, for the last 3 years this Nation has observed National Farm Safety Week as a part of the program of continuous education and publicity designed to bring public attention to the fact that there is a critical farm accident problem and that something can and must be done about it. Proclaimed by the President for the week July 21–28, this campaign has the support of all major farm organizations, farm press, agricultural colleges, radio stations, commercial organizations, and nearly all agencies dealing with agriculture. It is sponsored jointly by the United States Department of Agriculture and the Farm Division of the National Safety Council.

To officially open the week and inaugurate the campaign, Senator ELMER THOMAS, of Oklahoma, chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, and Ned H. Dearborn, president of the National Safety Council, participated in a coast-to-coast broadcast over the Mutual Network on Monday evening, July 22.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith the program presented on that occasion. I am sure that every Member of Congress will find it of great interest.

FIRST ANNOUNCER. "By the President of the United States of America, a proclamation."

SECOND ANNOUNCER. "Whereas an increased supply of food is vitally needed to promote peace and happiness in the postwar world; and

"Whereas farm accidents rob the Nation of thousands of lives and millions of dollars worth of food and other property each year; and

"Whereas experience in previous observances of National Farm Safety Week has clearly shown the necessity and benefits of a coordinated and constant education farm safety program: Now, therefore,

"I, Harry S. Truman, President of the United States of America, do hereby call upon the Nation to observe the week commencing July 21, 1946, as National Farm Safety Week. And I request all persons and organizations concerned with agriculture and farm life to do everything in their power to discover and publish the facts about farm accidents, and to develop practical safety programs which farm people everywhere can translate into direct action against hazards which daily threaten their lives and happiness. As a start, I specifically suggest that the farm people of the country observe National Farm Safety Week by resolving to eliminate at least one hazard a day until their farms are as safe as they can possibly make them.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

"Done at the city of Washington in the year of our Lord 1946, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and seventieth.

"HARRY S. TRUMAN."

FIRST ANNOUNCER. Clinton P. Anderson, Secretary of Agriculture, says:

SECOND ANNOUNCER. "The Department of Agriculture heartily approves the observance of a third National Farm Safety Week as planned by the National Safety Council in cooperation with the Department and various farm organizations throughout the Nation. Every hour lost as a result of farm accidents means less food for the starving, less food for us. Farm accidents must be reduced."

FIRST ANNOUNCER. Albert S. Goss, master of the National Grange, says:

SECOND ANNOUNCER. "Accident hazards on the farm have multiplied; farmers must multiply their safety precautions in proportion. Purposes emphasized in National Farm Safety Week should be emphasized every week on the farm."

FIRST ANNOUNCER. James G. Patton, president, National Farmers Union, says:

SECOND ANNOUNCER. "National Farmers Union endorses and pledges its cooperation to make the 1946 National Farm Safety Week as effective as is possible."

FIRST ANNOUNCER. Edward A. O'Neal, president, American Farm Bureau Federation, says:

SECOND ANNOUNCER. "I enthusiastically endorse the proposal to observe National Farm Safety Week. Anything we can do to arouse people generally to the true farm accident situation will be effort well spent."

FIRST ANNOUNCER. These are some of the comments on the importance of observing National Farm Safety Week. The Mutual Broadcasting System now brings you a special program in connection with the annual Nation-wide observance of National Farm Safety Week, as proclaimed by the President. We will hear first from Senator ELMER THOMAS, of Oklahoma, who will speak as chairman of the Senate Agricultural Committee, and then from Mr. Ned H. Dearborn, president of the National Safety Council. Now, Senator THOMAS, in our Washington studios. Senator THOMAS.

Senator THOMAS. Ladies and gentlemen, have you ever had the unhappy experience of seeing one of your dear friends killed or injured in an accident? Well, I have been personally saddened by the loss in accidents of several of my farm friends. In the years I have devoted to agriculture, I have known of farm mortgages being foreclosed in my own State as the result of accidents. I have seen children forced to leave school and go to work because their father was killed in an accident. I have seen women forced to do all the farm work for months while their husbands were laid up in the hospital by accidents.

My experience is no different than those of many of my farm friends. They tell me there is hardly a county in the farming belt of America that doesn't have farmers who are carrying on despite lost fingers, lost eyes, or lost limbs.

There has been a crying need for accident prevention in America for years, but the need was not dramatized in the public mind until President Roosevelt proclaimed the first observance of National Farm Safety Week in 1944. At that time, he called upon all individuals and all organizations interested in farm life to cooperate in a united effort to reduce farm accidents that were holding down the production of food needed to win the war.

Food was needed to win the war in 1945, too, and President Truman again proclaimed the national observance of Farm Safety Week and asked all farm folks to conduct a safety check-up on their farms during the last week in July. Now, food is necessary to win the peace and again this year President Truman has asked farmers to start a hazard-elimination campaign during Farm Safety Week, July 21 to 27.

We are now at the beginning of the third Nation-wide observance of this important week and I, as chairman of the Senate Agricultural Committee, want to join with President Truman, the United States Department of Agriculture, the National Safety Council, the National Grange, the National Farmers Union, the American Farm Bureau Federation, and other organizations cooperating in Farm Safety Week—in a plea to farm people everywhere to do everything they can to prevent farm accidents.

All of us know that farm accidents can seriously affect food production. Enough time is lost, as a matter of fact, from farm accidents each year to produce three-fourths of the wheat crop of the United States of America. Yes, all of us know that food is the vital need of the world at this time. Yet, millions are actually starving as I talk to you. And lower production of food will mean more hunger and more suffering throughout the world.

And lower production of food is a real possibility. The National Safety Council estimates that the accident toll among farm residents this year and in 1947 may approach that of 1941, the last normal peacetime year, unless every farm resident takes advantage of the safety knowledge that is available.

Now, don't sit back and say "Accidents happen to the other fellow." They can happen to you.

In fact, if accidents reach the toll predicted, 16 farm people have been injured in accidents since this broadcast began—and 3 more farm persons will be injured every minute we are on the air and for every minute during the balance of the year.

Over a period of years more deaths have occurred to agricultural workers than to workers in any of the Nation's other five major industrial groups.

Why is farming so dangerous? Once we have the answer to that question it ought to be simple to stop accidents. Well, let's look at the record. National Safety Council figures indicate that farming is especially hazardous for four reasons: First, safety measures such as are applied in a factory cannot be applied to a farmer working alone. Second, it is more difficult to reach farm families with safety messages and information. Third, farm families live with their work. Fourth, farmers do a wider variety of jobs and handle a far wider variety of equipment than the average industrial worker.

Now for the remedies: First, farmers can become their own safety engineers, initiating individual action that will eliminate or guard against the common hazards of farm life. Second, farm organizations and such youth groups as the 4–H Clubs and Future Farmers of America can continue and expand their safety activities and join once a year in focusing Nation-wide attention on the need for safety on the farm 52 weeks a year. Radio, magazines, and newspapers can help. Third, knowing that they must live with their work 24 hours a day, farm people can reduce their chances for accidents simply by practicing good common sense, by using safeguards and by keeping their homes and farms in apple-pie order.

So, you see, it's up to you to stop farm accidents. Each of you, individually, must stop farm accidents. Let safety become habitual with you—as essential as feeding and watering the stock. If you do, I'm sure there will be fewer crippled farmers, fewer widows, and fatherless children on American farms. And there'll be more food with which to win and keep the peace of the world. As Secretary of Agriculture Anderson says, "Every hour lost as a result of farm accidents means less food for the starving, less food for us."

ANNOUNCER. And now we take you to Chicago, where Mr. Ned H. Dearborn, president of the National Safety Council, is waiting to speak to you. Come in, Mr. Dearborn.

Mr. DEARBORN. Friends, do you take chances? Of course, you do. Nearly everyone does. But the National Safety Council hopes you don't take unnecessary chances. We emphasize that point in every field of safety, year in and year out. This week we are placing particular stress on farm safety in an effort to reduce the toll that may reach 20,000 dead and 2,000,000 injured before the year is cut.

So let's play a little game for a few minutes. Let's have a safety quiz. Nobody but you will know your grade in this test, but if you flunk it, you can be sure that your chances of not being here next year or next month—maybe even tomorrow—are less than they should be. All you have to do is to answer "yes" or "no" to the questions I'm about to read to you. Ready? Here we go:

First. Do you keep guards in place on power shafts, gears, and chains? Yes or no.

Second. Do you stop machinery before oiling, adjusting, or unclogging it? Answer yes or no.

Third. Do you avoid wearing loose-fitting clothes or torn, ragged gloves around moving machinery? Yes or no.

Fourth. Do you always use a ring and staff in leading a bull?

Fifth. Are you careful not to surprise animals when approaching them?

Sixth. Do you keep ladder and hay-chute openings properly protected with hand rails?

Seventh. Do you practice good housekeeping rules in the field, in the barn and in the home? By that I mean do you keep stairways clear of boxes, mops, brooms, or tools? Do you keep trash from accumulating in the barnyard and the attic? And so on. Be honest with yourself. Answer yes or no.

Eighth. Do you keep your car, truck, and tractor in safe working condition?

Ninth. Do you avoid using kerosene or gasoline to start fires?

If your answer is "no" to any one of these questions, you are taking chances. And taking chances leads to accidents—one nearly every 3 minutes on some American farm.

Unless you act now, an accident may occur on one out of every six farms in your community this year. Some of the victims will be killed. Many will be disabled—will lose time from their work—may even forfeit a whole year's crop.

Taking chances may bring death to you this year. For experience has proved that it's the little chances we take, the little repairs we neglect to make, that cause accidents.

Take the advice of President Truman and observe National Farm Safety Week by starting a hazard-elimination program of your own. Let Farm Safety Week be the starting point in a lifetime of safety—not a 7-day recess from taking chances.

Senator THOMAS has told you why farming is dangerous and has offered some suggestions for preventing accidents. He and hundreds of farm leaders are seriously concerned about the rising toll of farm accidents. But President Truman, Senator Thomas, Secretary Anderson, and all the rest of us in the farm safety movement know that when it comes to the show-down, the individual American farmer is the one who will prevent farm accidents. And if the farmer of today doesn't do it, maybe the farmer of tomorrow will.

So, I urge all you farm fathers and mothers to teach your children the following safety code:

First, I must learn what hazards menace my life at home, at work, and on the highway.

Next, I must eliminate as many of these hazards as possible.

Third, I must form habits of living which will enable me to avoid those hazards which cannot be eliminated.

If every one of the 26 or 27 million farm residents lived by this code, I'm sure there would be no need for a National Farm Safety Week. Until then, I urge you to regard accidents as one of the world's most poisonous crops. Let's mow' em down!

OPA

OF
HON. LEON H. GAVIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Gould Lincoln from the Washington Evening Star:

THE POLITICAL MILL

(By Gould Lincoln)

The country is about to experience a revival of the OPA—after being nearly a month without the controls imposed. Two things have happened. The people have been able to buy meat and butter and a number of other things they could not get—except in very limited quantities—under OPA. Prices have advanced, but not to the degree prophesied by the calamity howlers who demanded a continuance of OPA without change for another year. Sometimes it is difficult to decide whether the 100-percent supporters of the OPA would or would not prefer to see inflation with the controls lifted.

The new OPA bill which seems assured of becoming law is a monstrosity—neither one thing nor the other. It restores some controls and leaves others to be imposed, if considered necessary, by a new three-man board, which really takes over authority of the OPA. Some controls, as in the case of meats, go back automatically on August 20 unless the board decides they shall not be reimposed. You can get predictions either way regarding what is to happen in the case of livestock, dairy products, grains, cottonseed, and soybeans.

With bumper crops of grains coming in, it would seem unnecessary to do anything about them. A reimposition of controls over meats and livestock would in all probability have the effect of driving these products back into the black market. While the Taft amendment, against which President Truman inveighed bitterly in his veto of the first bill sent him, has been eliminated, a substitute has been written which seeks to give manufacturers of industrial goods prices that cover costs plus a reasonable profit.

The wrangle over the continuance of price controls—the OPA—has both an economic and a political aspect, which are closely intertwined. On the economic side, full and adequate production, with the old law of supply and demand eventually making the prices, is involved. If anyone doubts lack of production under the operation of the OPA, let him try to purchase a refrigerator, water bottle, a white shirt, or an automobile—or a hundred other things. On the economic side also is the question of prices without controls, which the supporters of OPA visualize as flying sky high.

On the practical side, the lack of supplies of all kinds is a constant irritation to the people. Measured against this is the predicted rise in prices. The Truman administration is basing its hopes for political preferment on the reestablishment of price controls. No one knows exactly which way the sentiment of the people will jump—and on that sentiment will depend in considerable part the outcome of the congressional elections in November.

The Republicans insist that had the President signed the original bill extending the OPA for a year, the present situation in which some prices have risen rapidly would have been avoided. Further, they maintain that the administration, with considerable Democratic majorities in both Houses, must in the end be held responsible for whatever happens.

When Congress has left Washington—as it intends to do at the earliest possible moment—the administration will be left holding the bag. All the conundrums propounded in the new bill will have to be solved by the President and his Board and the OPA. If things do not go right, the administration will have a tough time convincing the people that the blame rests with individual Members of Congress, Republicans or Democrats.

The new Board will have its hands full. Presumably it will be appointed without delay, since it must be confirmed by the Senate. To find the right men, with ability to pass on these economic and price-control questions, may be difficult. The President may, if he wishes, appoint a board composed of men and women devoted entirely to the price control idea—strong backers of the OPA. This may be the natural thing for him to do. That means a board with closed minds, however. From a political point of view, it might be an advantage to appoint three Republicans—if he could get Republicans to stick their necks out.

Republicans in Congress have for the most part taken a stand against continuance of the OPA as it operated in the past year—and some of them have been against its continuance at all. Generally speaking, however, the Republican attitude has been for a retention of some controls, with a gradual process of elimination of all controls. That, too, has been the attitude of some Democrats.

On the whole the Democratic attitude has been more favorable to the President's demand for an unchanged OPA. All of this is going into the coming campaign and it may be a major issue.

Investigation of War Contracts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 25 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an interview with myself by Mr. Albert Warner, which was broadcast on Station WOL on July 24, 1946.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. WARNER. Now here in the studio with me is the chairman of the Senate War Investigating Committee, Senator JAMES M. MEAD, of New York, who has been personally guiding the Garsson inquiry from day to day. Up to now, from the point of view of the listening public, this investigation has been very complex, and it may have been difficult to follow its many fascinating ramifications. The information has come to you in the form of testimony given to the committee by the various witnesses, and, as in all hearings of this kind, some of the most important points may have been lost to you. Because of that situation, Senator MEAD has consented to come here to this microphone tonight to give you a more concise and orderly picture of what has gone on thus far in this investigation of the Garsson munitions combine. But, first, Senator MEAD, you have just announced that Congressman MAY is going to testify before your committee on Friday morning at 9 o'clock. Have any special assurances been given him that he will be treated any differently from other witnesses?

Mr. MEAD. The answer is "No." We expect to give Congressman MAY a full and fair hearing on all matters relevant to the committee's pending investigation, which is the war contracts held by Erie Basin Metal Products, Inc., and allied companies.

Mr. WARNER. As I have heard the evidence before the committee, there have been innumerable pressure telephone calls to the War Department by the Congressman in behalf of the Garssons; he was several times a visitor in their Washington office; he attended their E award banquet and family wedding banquets; and ran a lumber company for them. Will the Congressman be questioned about all of these matters?

Mr. MEAD. It is my sincere hope that the Congressman will be able to make some explanation of the many references to his participation in the affairs of these companies. I know the committee will listen eagerly to Congressman MAY in answer to the various references to his activities.

Mr. WARNER. Now, Senator MEAD, what part of the blame for the situation which has developed in this case falls on the War Department?

Mr. MEAD. It's my personal opinion that the people in the War Department who handled these Garsson contracts fell down on their job miserably. They never investigated the character of the men to whom they handed out $78,000,000 in contracts. They gave the first contract for $3,000,000 to a newly-formed company with no tangible assets, and advanced $1,000,000 secured by a bond which was rejected. They never obtained a good bond and mysteriously forgot the whole matter. The Chemical Warfare Service of the War Department promoted a $1,500 clerk to a legal adviser at $10,000 a year—a man named Albert Jacobson, who had resigned from the District of Columbia bar under fire. Time and again, War Department officials in Washington overruled and interfered with agents on the scene in Chicago where the Garssons were doing the work on their contracts. Instead, some high officers at the War Department jumped around to please the Garssons and to lend tone, as one of them said, to their social affairs.

Mr. WARNER. Senator, the testimony before your committee has shown that five high Army officers went to New York to the Hotel Pierre to attend the wedding of Murray Garsson's daughter. Do you think that was proper, in view of the fact that these same officers were handling the Garsson contracts?

Mr. MEAD. That's what I call the "Mission Pierre." Here were three generals, two colonels, and legal adviser Jacobson, who got official orders from the War Department to go on temporary duty to New York for procurement, administration, or research purposes. Maybe some of them did some work on the side, but the fact is that this simultaneous exodus of the whole headquarters staff of the Chemical Warfare Service had the single common purpose of drinking the Garsson's champagne and cavorting with the good-looking ladies of the Garsson household. Incidentally, the Government paid the officials transportation and subsistence, but Murray Garsson also paid most of their hotel bills, which looks like double payment. There is some suggestion that the Garssons tried to charge the expense of the whole affair to the Government. This is being checked.

Mr. WARNER. That was in January 1944, right in the middle of the war and a lot of hard fighting.

Mr. MEAD. Yes; it's a far cry from "Mission Pierre" to the mission of our boys overseas, who were landing on the beaches, braving death in the face of enemy fire. Right here, in this connection, the procurement people in the War Department were allowing defective shells to go to these men on the battle front. It was only when I read into the record the heartfelt complaints of two young officers about the 4.2 shells that we got information from Chemical Warfare that some of the shells turned out by these manufacturers were exploding in the mortars and killing our own men. That, remember, was the same Garsson group with which these Army officers in Chemical Warfare were on such close social terms. The committee is also obtaining the details on this matter.

Mr. WARNER. Should an officer such as Gen. Alden Waite, who went on "Mission Pierre," still be in charge of an important branch of the Army?

Mr. MEAD. The job of our committee, Mr. Warner, is to bring out all the facts. We are not an administrative agency and have no administrative powers, but my personal belief is that the War Department should consider this whole situation very carefully and take immediate steps to correct the glaring deficiencies in procurement practices disclosed in these 3 weeks of hearings. Of course, the human element is important. Even good rules do not execute themselves. Certainly, one consideration in choosing an executive is his judgment. I do not think it was good judgment to keep Jacobson on the pay roll or to travel a considerable distance to attend a social function with a special set of contractors with whom you were doing business for the Government. Nor was it good judgment to allow your hotel bill to be paid by these contractors. It wasn't good judgment to do business with the Garssons in the first place. In answer to your question, I would say that the difficulty is much deeper than the competence of one general.

Mr. WARNER. Senator, doesn't it appear to you that there may be something wrong which is much bigger than just the Garsson case? It seems to me that instead of this case being the evil itself, it may be the symptom of an evil that is very much more serious.

Mr. MEAD. I think you are right, Mr. Warner. In fact, in announcing these hearings to the Senate, I stated that the committee's main objective was the correction of bad procurement practices. This is just one case. The committee has been working on others, which are in various stages of preparation. We are interested in the exposure of evils, but we are more interested in aiding in the development of sound defense procurement principles and practices.

Rehabilitation of Victims of Hansen's Disease

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a statement of Col. G. H. Rarey, United States Army, retired, upon the need for rehabilitation of those afflicted with Hansen's disease, as follows:

It is natural and inevitable that physical and mental inactivity, attending a long period of hospitalization, serves to center a patient's thoughts upon his illness and upon the predicament in which he finds himself. He cannot foresee the time of his release and return to normal life, nor can his doctors say when that time will come. The greater the length of time when the patient has little or nothing to do but think, the more depressing becomes his situation and the more hopeless his future. That the mental state of a patient has a definite bearing or influence upon his physical condition, is confirmed by Dr. G. H. Faget, medical officer in charge, United States Marine Hospital at Carville, who has stated that, "An occupied body and an occupied mind make for contentment, and contentment adds greatly to the patient's chances of overcoming the disease."

Entertainment and recreational activities are recognized as important factors in any program designed to build up and maintain bodily health and morale. However, a patient may participate in games throughout the period of his stay in the institution without acquiring any knowledge, skill or special ability that will fit him to hold a job upon his release from the hospital.

It is generally recognized that the services of a licensed occupational therapist are essential in well organized rehabilitation work. Accordingly, such a specialist, who is not burdened with the responsibility of providing entertainment and recreational programs and facilities, should be assigned to Carville.

As we study the possibilities of a rehabilitation program for the patients at Carville, the feeling grows that it will produce values, far in excess of its cost. The cost could not be great, since there are less than 400 patients in the hospital and it is probable that some of them would not be physically able to take such training. However, regardless of the cost, the men, women, and children who, in effect, have been drafted into the institution are entitled to the last full measure of assistance we can give them. This assistance can and should include the advantages of education and training under conditions similar in many respects, to those provided for veterans, with suitable remuneration while undergoing training, graduated in amount in accordance with the time spent and progress made in acquiring skill and efficiency on the job.

Educational and vocational training would give the patients a definite objective toward which they could work during hospitalization, reduce the monotony of the months and years of treatment, and raise their morale by giving them a more hopeful outlook for the future. One of the best features among the benefits accruing from well-organized rehabilitation programs established for other groups is the salvaging of the spirit of those patients who are discouraged, by helping them to learn, earn, and plan again; to plan their work and work out tentative plans for their future as well as definite plans for the economic security of their families.

In addition to equipping patients by specialized training to enter industry and commercial life after leaving the hospital, many patients in an institution of this kind which may require prolonged medical treatment, could and should be trained to carry on remunerative occupations while receiving treatment. A number of the patients are engaged in carrying on necessary work in connection with the hospital and the plant in general. These individuals should be paid at regular rates, based upon the type and amount of work they perform.

The only difference between citizens inside and those outside of the leprosarium is that the residents of Carville have, through no fault of their own, contracted leprosy and, due to an uninformed public opinion as well as to archaic laws, they are segregated and detained throughout the treatment period, regardless of the severity of their illness. Even though their material needs of the present are provided by the Federal Government, it is natural for them to dislike being set aside as a class of segregated persons. They want and need to have the feeling of belonging to society; to be considered important in accordance with their abilities, in the general scheme of things; they also want and need to have the right to work for the economic security of themselves and families, even as you and I.

Rehabilitation plans for tuberculosis patients have included the provision of an advisory committee to direct the activities of the program and obtain the results desired, viz: The ultimate placement of the discharged patient in a suitable job. In the case of the Carville program and advisory committee, the latter would of necessity function under the supervision of the medical officer in charge, and the results desired would include placement of discharged patients as well as obtaining suitable work for the trained patient while undergoing treatment, providing his physical condition and the treatment requirements permitted the patient to accept employment.

An advisory committee, made up of the following personnel, would be of material assistance to the hospital authorities, the instructors, and the students:

A physician, representing the leprosarium.

The State director, or supervisor of vocational rehabilitation.

A representative from each of the following: State employment service, State welfare department, and State medical society.

A personnel representative.

A representative of organized labor.

A coordinated approach to this problem by the Carville medical and rehabilitation staffs, and the maintenance of close working relationship with outside industry would contribute to the success of the program. Its value would be materially increased if it were coordinated with the United States Civil Service Commission, the Government arsenals and navy yards, and the United States Employment Service, in order that the machinery already established by these organizations for the purpose of obtaining qualified personnel, might be utilized for the benefit of discharged patients whose skills have been developed by the Carville rehabilitation program.

Opportunity for service: Bring the need of the patients at Carville for a real rehabilitation program to the attention of your public press and your representatives in Congress. Request prompt and definite action from both agencies in the interest of our segregated citizens who can do little to help themselves to a more abundant life and the right to plan and work for an economic survey of their own design.

Alternative assistance plan: Without minimizing the importance of a rehabilitation program, we find that there is a factor in our problem which makes it necessary that we consider an alternative plan for aiding our segregated citizens. Patients discharged as arrested cases have found it impossible to obtain and hold a job if they admitted having been a patient in the Carville hospital. Subterfuge, or an outright lie, becomes necessary in accounting for the time spent at the leprosarium. When employment is secured under such circumstances, the fear of discovery of their former affliction keeps the discharged patient constantly apprehensive, and worry, occasioned by this threat hanging over them, is a contributing factor, if not the immediate cause, of the disease becoming reactivated.

Our policy of segregating the leprosy victims for treatment under the supervision of the United States Public Health Service has existed for about 25 years, and during this period 1,179 persons are reported to have been admitted to the Carville hospital. Of this number 319 persons were discharged as arrested cases and left the hospital. According to the records, 70 of the discharged patients have been readmitted for additional treatment or for economic reasons. Those admitted for additional treatment came back because the disease was reactivated, due to hardship, improper nutrition, hard work, or due to special difficulties caused by the stigma of the disease and the well-known leprophobia among employers, employees, and the general public.

The existence of this disgraceful condition in the United States corroborates all that has been said concerning the need for reeducating the American public upon the subject of leprosy. It must be apparent to all that, in addition to the provision of food, lodging, and medical treatment, while in the leprosarium, some other form of material assistance must be provided to offset the prospect of incarceration over an indefinite number of years for the patient, the financial loss to the family where the patient is the breadwinner, and the treatment accorded discharged patients by an ignorant public. Additional assistance is absolutely necessary if we expect those victims who have concealed their plight to be willing to report to the leprosarium for treatment.

In view of the above, common justice and a decent regard for the feelings, the opinions, and the welfare of this long-suffering group of our citizens demand that we now take one of the following suggested steps to correct a situation which shames the American people and contributes to the misery of this group of our own people:

(a) By a prompt and aggressive Nationwide educational campaign eliminate the excessive fear of leprosy from the public mind, so that discharged patients, who will have been trained under the rehabilitation program to be established at Carville, may have an equal chance with all other citizens to secure and hold a job in any industry, any part of our commercial life, and any governmental activity; or

(b) Immediately recognize the necessity and the desirability of providing suitable remuneration for leprosy victims who report to Carville for treatment, graduated in accordance with the financial loss to the family by the hospitalization of the patient.

If either parent enters the Carville hospital, the amount paid should be sufficient to maintain, in a reasonable manner, the remaining members of the immediate family. Upon the discharge of the patient as an arrested case, the payments should be continued as a form of pension, which will make it unnecessary for the patient to seek employment under employers who will discharge him the moment they learn that he once took treatment for leprosy.

5. The need for moving the leprosarium activities to a cooler and dryer climate.

Studies and investigations of leprologists have established the fact that leprosy flourishes best in a warm, moist climate. While these studies show that many other factors have a definite influence upon the number of cases found in the endemic areas of the various countries, sufficient evidence has been produced to show that leprosy has the best chance for survival where physical resistance to disease is reduced by debilitating climatic conditions.

Dr. Clarence A. Mills, professor of experimental medicine, University of Cincinnati, Ohio, and attending physician at the Cincinnati Hospital, surveyed the evidence upon this subject. In his book Climate Makes the Man, Dr. Mills reported that continuous moist heat depresses body metabolism and lowers resistance to infections, while changeable cold weather raises the energy level and gives vitality along all lines. He also said: "The National Leprosarium should not be kept at Carville where the long summers of debilitating Louisiana heat reduce disease resisting vitality."

Inquiry into the reasons for establishing the leprosarium at Carville and for maintaining it in a climate so deleterious for leprosy patients reveals some of the difficult problems and obstacles attending an attempt to establish an institution of this nature, and indicates that the main reason for keeping it in its present location is based upon the grounds of expediency, a slimy term when applied to this problem; and to leprophobia, or fear of the disease among the inhabitants of localities possessing a climate more favorable to the health of our leprosy patients than that with which they have to contend in Louisiana.

From a study of authoritative statements and reports dealing with this subject, it is the author's belief that the United States Government has not performed its full duty to the victims of Hansen's disease whom it has deprived of their liberty, in that it has failed to accomplish the removal of these patients and the leprosarium facilities to a locality having a climate that will give the patients the best possible chance for recovery. The continuous expenditure of public funds to provide more buildings and facilities for the Carville Leprosarium can have no influence upon the temperature or humidity of the Carville area, and regardless of the amount spent, this money cannot accomplish in the unfavorable Louisiana climate, the same improvement in the health of the patients that could be accomplished by similar expenditures in a cooler, dryer climate.

Opportunity for service: Bring the facts to the attention of the public, and invite your State and National legislators to seek the most favorable locality in the United States for the establishment of the national leprosarium. Some State, among the 48, possessing the requisite climate, the "do unto others" spirit, the attributes of brotherhood, the common sense, and the will to render a vital service to our less fortunate citizens, by inviting the United States Public Health Service to establish the National Leprosarium within its borders.

Got a Shirt?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to insert in the RECORD the following editorial by Richard Lloyd Jones appearing in the Tulsa (Okla.) Tribune of Saturday, July 20, 1946, entitled "Got a Shirt?":

GOT A SHIRT?

(By Richard Lloyd Jones)

"Where can I get a shirt?" This was the the salutation of a friend the other day. He spoke with amusement, with concern, and with alarm. "What's happened to this country anyway?"

What has happened to it? Nothing. The shirt-producing country is still here. But something has happened to us. The people are the government. If we no longer have an American Government it is because we no longer vote American.

Look at the dominant party in Oklahoma. The men the people elect to represent them in the legislature refuse to respect their oaths of office and obey the constitution of the State. The Supreme Court of Oklahoma, made up of men of the same political party, likewise violate their oaths to support the Constitution of Oklahoma.

If we wanted the American plan of government we would have it. But we just think it is funny to watch a school man pick dimes off the school children of the State while a prominent preacher lauds this cheat as "a servant of God and a brother of man." Our moral let-down has got that low. And all this is part of the story of the shirt.

Part of the tale of the shirt is that if you find the shirt it is short of tail. Don't we grow cotton any more?

It is not only the shirt that is short, it is not only that we are short of shirts, but we are short of everything we ask for. We are short of shoes, socks, and hose. Clerks slip down under the counters or mail out private post cards to sneak out secretly the few items they get that they may accommodate their best accounts. Not a dignified performance for the proud producing country we used to know.

Time was when the American people had a President in the White House. And we used to have a Congress in the Capitol. Now we have no Congress in the Capitol. The fellows we elect to Congress themselves complain. We have sat idly by watching the legislative powers in government wiped out. Harry Truman isn't President of the United States. From time to time John L. Lewis is. Hillman took his turn at the job. The ballot-stealing Pendergast machine, of Kansas City, takes its turn at being President. So it goes.

There is no better partisan in the Senate than the Democratic gentleman from Nevada, Mr. PAT MCCARRAN. He complains Congress doesn't have a chance to legislate any more. It was planned a dozen years ago that it should not have. And the people voted to change it all that way. That means that the people have voted to repudiate the Constitution of the United States.

Senator MCCARRAN estimates that there are over 110,000 laws which the American people today are compelled to obey. Not one of which was ever suggested by a Congressman or that reached the floor of Congress for consideration. They are Executive orders. Even the fellow who lives in the White House doesn't know anything about most of them.

Had any fellow asked you where he could get a shirt in 1936 you would have thought him crazy. Even 5 years ago the question would have been absurd. But now the question is not crazy. It is we, the people, who have gone crazy.

It has come to pass that nearly one-third of the voters of this country are now on the Federal pay roll, being supported by the other two-thirds. Hitler played his game that way and when there were no more supporters to carry the idlers "pick-a-back" Hitler made wars to build a sustaining patriotism.

We are running dangerously near to this parallel here now. And we give nearly $4,000,000,000 of our money to sustain the British in their anti-American and un-American operations and aspirations. The American who earns an honest dollar will be taxed to make this gift to the British. Then prices must go up, shirt or no shirt, on anything you may want because scarcities will increase. Scarcities increase costs.

The so-called economic progressives are doing everything in their autocratic powers to stop progress. They are the engineers of discontent, the promoters of strikes and work stoppage. It is part of their political planning to slow down all operations, the making of everything from shirts to lawn mowers. The clerk at the store says "We haven't any more, we will take your order, but heaven only knows when we will get any stuff in."

Five years ago you would have called the fellow crazy who would have predicted that in this political year of 1946 labor was demanding pay for the time they spend in going to and from work; engineers wanting pay for the time spent in getting their watches inspected. And yet it is here. And that is why my friend was having trouble getting even a short-tailed shirt. And it is here because the majority of the American people have grown so indifferent to their own morals, their own worth, their own rights that we have actually exalted as "sons of God and brothers of men" men who steal dimes out of little school children's pockets. Is it, or is it not a hopeless mess?

It is a hopeless mess unless in this year of 1946 we put into performance the sentiments of the song we sing, and My Country 'Tis of Thee becomes our country and not the country of the labor racketeers, of the election thieves, of the judges in our own high courts who refuse to respect the constitution of the State. We have these repudiators of constitutional government all the way from the Supreme Court of Oklahoma to the Congress of the United States. We have them in our State colleges. They have taken this country over and we have let them. And they are the fellows who have stopped producing. They are the fellows who are responsible for the shortage of shirts. And the shirt is the symbol of every shortage we have.

Here in this land of which we sing there is an abundance with which to do but we have just voted not to do. That is liberal. That is progressive.

Alabama and Georgia can produce more cotton this year than ever in their history. Illinois has more corn than ever before. Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Michigan have greener pastures but the farmers have been stopped by the autocratic rulings against them.

Thousands of bushels of wheat lay on the ground in Kansas because there are no box cars available to carry the food away. Here is the travesty and the tragedy of the starving peoples over the world asking us for bread when we can't move the grain we grow. They are asking us for clothes when we can't find our own shirts.

We should stop fooling with Russia when Russia is just fooling us. We are giving the Russians 15,000 farm tractors while our own farmers go without.

We have developed the indifferent citizen who does not take an interest in politics, or his folks have "always been Democrats." But he is not working to make that party the sustainer of this Republic. He is content to let his party regularity wreck the America that once put shirts upon our shelves and gave us the abundant life.

OPA

OF
HON. ROBERT J. CORBETT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, I heartily congratulate the President for signing the OPA compromise bill which will go far to end the chaos which resulted from his veto of the original extension bill. The new bill is really a decontrol bill looking forward to the orderly elimination of price controls as our economy tends to become normal.

But after the bill becomes law a vital responsibility falls to the President. He must name a Decontrol Board that inspires the confidence of the public, labor, and management. It must be a truly independent board made up of members who have not previously been officially associated with price control. They must be individuals sincerely anxious to administer the new law according to its spirit and individuals sincerely anxious to promote the general welfare—not members subservient to any economic segment.

The Decontrol Board with its recontrol powers is the heart of the new program. How it functions will determine the fate of price control and the public's willingness to obey the price regulations. A good board means reasonable, realistic price regulation, and public approval. A prejudiced board means unreasonable, unrealistic price regulation, and public disapproval. I hope that the President will appoint a nonpartisan Board whose members are the best available.

SEC. 104. (a) Effective the date of enactment of this act, there is established in the Medical Department of the Regular Army, an Occupational Therapist Corps, which shall perform such services as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War. The authorized strength of the Occupational Therapist Corps, Regular Army, shall be in the ratio of twenty-five one hundredths of a member thereof to every 1,000 persons of the total authorized strength of the Regular Army, but not less than a minimum authorized strength as follows: 8 officers in permanent commissioned grade of major and 107 other officers in permanent commissioned grades of captain to second lieutenant, inclusive. Any increase over and above the aforesaid minimum authorized strength shall be in permanent commissioned grades of captain to second lieutenant, inclusive.

(b) From the officers permanently commissioned in Occupational Therapist Corps, the Secretary of War shall appoint the Director of the Occupational Therapist Corps, who shall serve as such Director during his pleasure, and who, without vacation of her permanent grade, shall have the temporary rank, pay, and allowances of a lieutenant colonel while so serving.

(c) Commissioned officers of the Occupational Therapist Corps, Regular Army, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from female citizens of the United States who have attained the age of 21 years. Original appointments other than appointments made under title II hereof, shall be made only in the grade of second lieutenant from female persons not over 26 years of age who possess such physical and other qualifications as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

INTEGRATION APPOINTMENTS—GRADE TO WHICH APPOINTED

SEC. 202. A person appointed under the provisions of this title who is credited, as provided in section 203 hereof, with less than the minimum length of service now or hereafter prescibed for promotion of promotion-list officers to the grade of first lieutenant, shall be appointed in the grade of second lieutenant; a person credited with service equal to or greater than the minimum length of service now or hereafter prescribed for promotion of promotion-list officers to the grade of first lieutenant, but less than the minimum length of service now or hereafter prescribed for promotion of promotion-list officers to the grade of captain, shall be appointed in the grade of first lieutenant; a person credited with service equal to or greater than the minimum length of service now or hereafter prescribed for promotion of promotion-list officers to the grade of captain, shall be appointed in the grade of captain; majors and lieutenant colonels shall be appointed by selection, to fill vacancies in those grades from among persons who are appointed or are qualified for appointment in the grade of captain: Provided, That no person shall be appointed in the Army Nurse Corps or the Dietitian Corps or the Physical Therapist Corps in a grade higher than the rank (either actual or relative) which such person held during any of the wars in which the United States is now engaged.

INTEGRATION APPOINTMENTS—SERVICE TO BE CREDITED FOR DETERMINATION OF GRADE, RANK, AND RIGHT TO PROMOTION

SEC. 203. (a) For the purposes specified in subsection (b) hereof, each person appointed pursuant to provisions of this title shall, at the time of her appointment, be credited with whichever is the greater of the following two periods of service: (1) A period of service equal to the number of years, months, and days which such person served on active Federal military service either as a member (including the status of reserve nurse) of the Army Nurse Corps created by chapter V of the act of July 9, 1918 (40 Stat. 879), as amended, or as a dietitian or physical therapist with the Medical Department of the Army under the provisions of the act of December 22, 1942 (56 Stat. 1072), or in the status of a commissioned officer in the Army of the United States under appointment pursuant to the act of June 22, 1944 (58 Stat. 324); or (2) a period of service determined constructively in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That in computing the total period of active Federal military service each such person honorably discharged or separated from active Federal military service subsequent to May 12, 1945, shall also be credited with the period from the date of her discharge or separation from active Federal military service to the date of her appointment.

(b) The period of service credited to a person as provided in subsection (a) hereof shall be counted and construed as continuous active commissioned service on the active list of the Regular Army for the following two purposes: (1) For the purpose of determining the grade and rank of a person appointed under the provisions of this title; and (2) for the purpose of determining a person's right to promotion subsequent to appointment under the provisions of this title. Except for the foregoing specified purposes, provisions of existing law regarding length of service and benefits accruing therefrom, shall not be affected.

TITLE III—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

RIGHT TO COMMAND AND RELATIVE RANK

SEC. 301. Relative rank among commissioned officers of the Army Nurse Corps, Dietitian Corps, Physical Therapist Corps, or Occupational Therapist Corps, within each such corps, and between such officers and other commissioned officers of the Regular Army, shall be determined in the manner now or hereafter prescribed by law for the determination of relative rank among other commissioned officers of the Regular Army. Commissioned officers of each such corps shall not be entitled, by virtue of their rank, to command, except within their respective corps, and over such persons as may be placed under their charge by competent authority, but may be assigned by the Secretary of War to perform such duties as the interests of the service may require.

Commissioned officers of the Army Nurse Corps, Dietitian Corps, Physical Therapist Corps and Occupational Therapist Corps, Regular Army, shall, upon completion of the length of service now or hereafter prescribed for promotion of promotion-list officers to the grade of first lieutenant, be promoted to the permanent grade of first lieutenant; commissioned officers of all such Corps shall, after completing the length of service now or hereafter prescribed for promotion of promotion-list officers to the grade of captain, be promoted to the permanent grade of captain upon satisfactorily passing such examinations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe. Promotion to the permanent grade of major shall be by selection from officers in the grade of captain with at least 15 years service. Promotion to the permanent grade of lieutenant colonel shall be by selection from officers in the grade of major with at least 1 years' service in grade of major.

(b) The examination for promotion referred to in subsection (a), above, shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War and shall be held before a board of three officers designated by the Secretary of War. Should any officer fail to pass such examination, she shall be continued on active duty for a period of 1 year after the date upon which her promotion would normally have occurred, but without being so promoted, and upon the expiration of such year, or such time anterior to the expiration thereof as may be determined by the Secretary of War to be for the best interests of the service, such officer shall undergo such reexamination as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War and which shall be held before a board of officers designated by the Secretary of War, none of whom participated in the original examination of the officer concerned. If the officer concerned fails to pass the reexamination, she shall be honorably discharged from the service in the permanent grade then held with severance pay the same as now or hereafter prescribed for officers of the Regular Army eliminated for inefficiency.

(a) An officer on the active list of either the Army Nurse Corps, Dietitian Corps, Physical Therapist Corps, or Occupational Therapist Corps, Regular Army, after 20 years' active Federal service in the armed forces of the United States, may, upon her request, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, be retired and shall receive retired pay equal to 2½ percent of the base and longevity pay she would receive if serving on active duty in the grade in which retired, multiplied by a number equal to the number of years of such active Federal service: Provided, That in computing the number of years of such service for the purpose of determining the percentage of active-duty pay, and for no other purpose, any fractional part of a year amounting to 6 months or more shall be counted as a complete year: Provided further, That in no event shall such retired pay exceed 75 percent of such base and longevity pay: And provided further, That regardless of years of service completed, at any time after such an officer shall have attained the age 50, if her permanent grade is below that of major, or at any time after such an officer shall have attained the age 55, if her permanent grade is major or higher, she may, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, without her consent, be retired, and upon such retirement she shall receive retired pay equal to 3 percent of the base and longevity pay she would receive if serving on active duty in the grade in which retired, multiplied by a number equal to the number of years of her active Federal service, but in no event shall such retired pay exceed 75 percent of such base and longevity pay.

(b) Unless entitled to higher retired rank or pay under any provision of law, each commissioned officer who shall have served for 4 years as Director of the Army Nurse Corps, Regular Army, or as Director of the Dietitian Corps, Regular Army, or as Director of the Physical Therapist Corps, Regular Army, or as Director of the Occupational Therapist Corps, Regular Army, shall upon retirement be retired with the rank held by her while so serving, and shall receive retired pay at the rate prescribed by law, computed on the basis of the base and longevity pay which she would receive if serving on active duty with such rank, and, if thereafter recalled to active service, shall be recalled in such rank and shall constitute an additional number therein: Provided, That the commissioned officer first appointed as Director of the Army Nurse Corps and the commissioned officer first appointed as Director of the Physical Therapist Corps, pursuant to this act, shall, without limitation as to the time they shall serve in such capacities, upon retirement be retired with the rank held while so serving, and shall receive retired pay at the rate prescribed by law, computed on the basis of the base and longevity pay they would receive if serving on active duty with such rank.

(c) In determining eligibility for retirement and the percentage of active-service pay to be employed in computing the amount of retired pay under any provision of law, each commissioned officer on the active list of the Regular Army who is commissioned in any of the corps established by this act, shall be deemed to have at least the same length of continuous active commissioned service in the Regular Army as any officer junior to her in rank in the Medical Department of the Regular Army.

It's Your Patriotic Duty To Register and Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT J. McGLINCHEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. McGLINCHEY. Mr. Speaker, the results in primaries which have taken place so far this year show an alarming negligence on the part of hundreds of thousands of American citizens in their failure to go to the polls and vote. In this wonderful country of ours, citizenship is a serious responsibility. If a "government of the people, by the people, and for the people" is to be maintained, our citizens must not be indifferent about taking part in elections. In neglecting to register and vote they are failing to take advantage of a great privilege—the privilege of helping to select the type of representatives who they feel would best protect their interests and fight for legislation that will benefit not only a few selfish interests but the people of our country as a whole.

The importance of the coming November election cannot be too strongly emphasized. Every citizen who has reached the age of 21 should register—and do it now. Do not put it off until tomorrow, because tomorrow never comes.

In the recent Pennsylvania primary, only some 1,300,000 voted, as compared with three times that number, 3,794,000, who voted in 1944. I want to appeal to the people of Pennsylvania, particularly those in the Sixth Congressional District, to come out and register and vote for United States Senator, Governor, congressional candidates, State senators, and members of the legislature, so that our State will have the right type of representation in the National Congress and the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. Our Philadelphia citizens can register at City Hall Annex every weekday from 9 a. m. to 4 p. m., Saturdays from 9 a. m. to 12 noon. You cannot vote unless you are registered. The registration commission of the city of Philadelphia will set only one day for you to register in your ward for the coming November election. The last day to register at City Hall Annex is September 18, 1946.

No American citizen should take the easy way and let others do the voting. The character of our government is largely what the voters make it. Every voter is part of the Government, and he should protect and cherish his right to participate in its elections. It took 50 years of untiring work before the nineteenth amendment to the Constitution was adopted which gave women equal suffrage, but the effort has been more than justified by the deep interest which women nave taken in elections since that time.

Ask any returned serviceman the value of each person contributing his share and doing his own part in an outlined program of action. A policy of indifference can no more win the peace than it could have won the war. The parents, wives, and sweethearts of veterans will remember that our servicemen fought for the freedoms which we enjoy, and I hope that they will impress upon their friends and neighbors that the perpetuation of our democracy depends upon a wide-awake and vigilant electorate.

Every American citizen should take advantage of the opportunity to exercise his franchise. If you do this, you will express your will by voting for the candidates who you think will represent you and not some selfish interest. It is your patriotic duty to register and vote.

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK CARLSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, today we are considering legislation to modernize congressional procedure. No doubt, there are many antiquated rules and regulations that have grown upon our Congress through decades of time. This bill makes many radical changes in congressional procedure. I do not believe that this legislation will completely revolutionize Congress. It is a step in the right direction. This bill carries a 50-percent increase in salary and pensions for Members of Congress. While I will not be a Member of the Eightieth Congress, I must express my views on these important matters.

We have increased wages and salaries of others in varying amounts from 18 to 30 percent, not 50 percent. As Members of Congress, we make ourselves subject to justifiable criticism if we vote this great increase. I am opposed to it.

Pensions for workers under civil service and social security for the workers of the Nation is commendable. Our Nation is committed to a program of social security. Pensions for elected officials are different. The elected official does not run for office as a career, and to vote him a pension places him in a class as a civilian employee of the Government. It would be contrary to good policy. It would run counter to our conception of good government. I hope the House will reject this provision.

Americanism on the March

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article entitled "Americanism on the March," by John Stelle, national commander, the American Legion:

My fellow Americans, as national commander of the largest veterans' organization in all history which now numbers approximately three and a quarter million members, it behooves me to speak with utmost candor.

I appeal today for a united America. I urge every American to become militant in a common endeavor to check every threat to our national, spiritual, and moral standards.

A united America is and must be essential in our progress toward enduring peace. We cannot build the brave new world which we have so longingly envisioned during the years of war, unless we maintain the splendid national teamwork which made our military victory possible. The outlawing of war forever is a job which demands the wholehearted cooperation of every American. It cannot be accomplished by any one segment of our people. It is a national partnership undertaking.

There never has been a time in our history when national teamwork has been so vital. We are living in a new age beset with a potentially greater peril than ever before. Science has unleashed a new force upon the world whose potentiality for evil staggers the imagination. We should thank God that it has been given to America to control in the beginning. We used it to bring the greatest war in the annals of mankind to a mercifully quick close. But we all know we cannot hope to control the secret of this new force very long. In secret laboratories all over the world, scientists are working day and night to find the key even as we found it. Sooner or later others will find that key. We are in the beginning of the atomic age. The next war will be an all-out atomic war, with death and destruction so extensive it may well spell the doom of civilization if not of mankind itself.

We have a breathing space of perhaps a few years—it may be only a matter of months—in which we must rally our best efforts to build an enduring structure of peace. If we fail, no human mind can measure the consequences.

America has grown into the greatest Nation on earth because in real, genuine Americanism—the live and let live philosophy of our American way of life—has been found the strength of progress. Jew and gentile, Catholic and Protestant, Christian and Atheist, immigrant and native-born, colored and white, have found in real Americanism a common bond of freedom, justice, tolerance, and opportunity. This has enabled individual enterprise to flourish and the Nation to prosper. Americanism is the only ground on which all these racial, religious, economic, political, and geographic elements of our population could have met for common progress.

If we are to move toward the goal of lasting peace, Americanism must continue to prevail among our peoples as the bond which unites them.

Those who would destroy America are interested in undermining Americanism first. If they can kill our spirit of Americanism, they can change our form of government. Our way of life, our system of government is repugnant to those who do not believe in democracy, to those who dispute the dignity of the individual, to those who believe might is right.

The exponents of government by coercion and by dictatorship always have been aggressive. In recent decades which witnessed the rise of totalitarian philosophies of government, whether they masqueraded under labels of communism, fascism or nazism, we experienced an intrusion of these alien "isms."

We have stamped out European fascism and nazism by force of arms. But communism we have with us still today. The Communists of the world are just as virulent as ever in seeking to impose their foreign beliefs on us. They have not given up their ideal of world conquest by propaganda or by force.

I do not hesitate to make the charge that but for Communist interference and opposition, the peace-loving peoples of the world would have made gratifying progress in a common effort to outlaw war.

Every thinking American knows that every constructive step this Nation has taken along the international pathway for enduring peace has been impeded by the actions of Communists. They do not seem to want a world rid of war. Their philosophy seems to be to secure more for themselves by force and violence than by peaceful agreements.

In the campaign of world communism on the march, American Communists are playing their puppet part. They do not want an America united in international collaboration for peace. They are trying to revive the specter of isolationism, to break the ranks of American unity. They are trying to enlist Americans to go it alone again.

They represent a danger to America from within. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI, has warned publicly that the danger of communism in this country today is greater than ever before. American "commies" are in the midst of a great recruiting drive. Their leaders are swarming throughout industrial areas seeking to fan labor-management controversies into flames of consuming communism. They are trying to enroll disgruntled veterans. They are infiltrating into every strata of American society.

In their subversive efforts they have on their side numerous other un-American groups. All these groups have one thing in common—they plant seeds of distrust and suspicion, of prejudice and hatred, of bigotry and intolerance. They seek to pit class against class, creed against creed, and race against race.

One of the most infamous hate-peddlers in our midst is Gerald L. K. Smith. He is the generalissimo of the nationalist movement in this country. Smith and his ilk overlook no bets. They invite national disunity. They are quick to move into any area where trouble is brewing.

The Ku Klux Klan currently is raising its masked head again. Of all the strife-breeding, un-American organizations in our country, the Klan is the most despicable because it is of native origin, fostered by men bred in this country, who ought to know better than to seek their own Nation's disrepute.

The fifth national convention of the American Legion in San Francisco, Calif., on October 17, 1923, adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas the fundamental law of our country guarantees to all peoples equal rights and equal opportunities and the right to worship their God as they see fit; and

"Whereas it is provided that our laws shall be made and enforced by Representatives of our people, chosen under the law to do so; and

"Whereas membership of the American Legion is made up of those who served our country in time of great national stress, without distinction as to race, color, creed, or class; and

"Whereas the American Legion is pledged to the orderly enforcement of our laws through lawful agencies: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the American Legion, in national convention assembled, this 17th day of October 1923, That we consider any individual, group of individuals, or organization which creates or fosters racial, religious, or class strife among our people, or which takes into its own hands the enforcement of law, determination of guilt, or infliction of punishment, to be un-American, a menace to our liberties, and destructive to our fundamental law; and be it further

"Resolved, That we consider such action by any individual, groups, or organizations to be inconsistent with the ideals and purposes of the American Legion."

That 1923 indictment was aimed at the Ku Klux Klan and other incipient groups. As national commander of the American Legion I declare that indictment very firmly remains the American Legion policy today. We strongly condemn the Ku Klux Klan and its ilk as a deadly menace to American unity at a time when it is so tragically important for all Americans to pull together. We don't want any "invisible empire" in our country today. What we want is an "indivisible empire" of Americans.

Subversive groups are fond of employing the so-called "underground" routes. We challenge them to emerge into the open. I do not believe they would dare. Public examination would destroy them and their endeavors. We favor permitting every person free speech, so long as his voice does not transcend the limits of liberty. In such a light, the subversive groups could talk their heads off, only to flounder in the morass of their own misconduct.

If America is to move forward in its tremendous task of leading the world into a new era of lasting peace, it must reject the underground organizations seeking to set themselves up as powerful influences in our communities to interfere in matters religious, political, economic, social and racial. Elimination of the un-American groups is a "must" in our national effort to build unity. It can be done if our leaders in government and others execute their legal trust. Public opinion will force the issue.

Today America is at the crossroads. Before the children of the World War II generation reach the age of reasoning, we, the adults living today, will have chartered their destiny. There can be precious little equivocation from here on in. The decision the American people must make now is between an aggressive peace offensive and a retreat to the mock security of indifference to world affairs with its calamitous consequences not only to ourselves but to all mankind.

From Pearl Harbor to Rome to Berlin to Tokyo was a grueling haul. Prewar national inattentiveness to international developments made it an uphill struggle most of the way for our gallant fighting men and women.

Today many of these fighting men and women are back home. More than 2,000,000 of them are active members of the American Legion. They were over there when America paid the price of victory in costs of sweat, blood, and some 300,000 lives. Teamed with veterans who suffered a similar expenditure 28 years ago, they today are spearheading the American Legion's demand for vigorous prosecution of the campaign for peace.

Our peace offensive will succeed or fail depending on the national efforts on two fronts—wholehearted participation in the United Nations on one hand and the development of a program to insure adequate military preparedness on the other. The two efforts are mutually dependent. To weaken either is to sabotage the other.

The United Nations is in the awkward stage of adolescence. Until the Organization matures and exerts its full weight on the international scene no man can judge its value. The American Legion believes, however, it is the duty of the American people whose Government pioneered establishment of this Council of Nations to see that the United Nations Organization does reach maturity.

But adolescence is also the vulnerable age. Only military preparedness in the form of a substantial defense program will assure the security of our Nation during the growth of the United Nations. Military strength alone will impress others in the family of nations with the sincerity of our drive for a just and an enduring peace.

We cannot move ahead in this peace offensive unless all Americans put their shoulders to the wheel and push. To do that they must be united. They must work as a team—an all-American team.

Science has learned how to kill the great plagues. It has learned a thousand ways of snuffing out human life, each more effective than the preceding one. It has learned how to level entire cities and devastate entire countrysides. But it can never learn how to kill war. Only the human spirit can kill war, because wars first start in human hearts.

In genuine Americanism we have the best hope of the world for fostering the spirit of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and make possible a lasting peace.

That's the kind of "ism" the American Legion is fighting for.

Let's keep Americanism on the march.

A Mutilated Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELLIS E. PATTERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to call attention to an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of July 21, 1946, which expresses my own views on the mutilated McMahon atomic energy bill. I fervently hope that the conference committee now considering the bill will return it to the state in which it passed the Senate. Excerpts from the editorial in question follow:

A MUTILATED BILL

When it passed the drastically amended McMahon atomic energy bill yesterday, the House ignored or defied the President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, Chief of Staff Eisenhower, and Chief of Naval Operations Nimitz. All of these men, who are charged with the duty of national defense, approved the bill as it came from the Senate. The Senate itself passed the McMahon bill unanimously after exhaustive hearings and debates.

As passed by the House, the measure provides that a military man be placed on the five-member commission; for a military man to be head of one of the Commission's chief divisions; for authority for the armed forces to make atomic bombs under certain conditions; and for the FBI to apply a loyalty check to all persons associated in any capacity with the development and control of atomic energy.

These matters were considered when the McMahon bill was in the Senate and they were rejected. Though the McMahon bill made every proper precaution for national safety, it decided the question of military against civilian control strictly in favor of the latter. This is in accord with the basic American principle—to guard against men on horseback—that the Commander in Chief and the directing heads of our armed forces be civilians.

Secretary Patterson, who first favored the May-Johnson bill, which would have placed hobbles on scientific research, came around to favor the McMahon bill, saying:

"This bill goes further in dealing with the national defense aspects of atomic energy than the earlier bill (May-Johnson) did. There was nothing in the May-Johnson bill creating a military liaison committee, no specific provision in it at all as to how the Army or the Navy would keep posted on what was going on in atomic energy. This bill does, and it is better in that feature."

The blunderbuss suggestion by Representative DONDERO to institute a Gestapo-like examination of every man connected with atomic energy includes, of course, distinguished scientists. Many of these men, no doubt, would prefer to disassociate themselves from the work to avoid being shadowed by the FBI. DONDERO's amendment is of a piece with the Wood-Rankin committee's hysterical warning that the country should beware of the young Oak Ridge scientists, some of whom are so radical, forsooth, that they favor a world government to protect civilization from the atomic bomb.

Ku Klux Klan Condemned in Stelle Speech

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM T. GRANAHAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article published in the National Legionnaire of July 5, 1946:

KU KLUX KLAN CONDEMNED IN STELLE SPEECH—NATIONAL COMMANDER ALSO BLASTS GERALD L. K. SMITH AND COMMUNISTS

"The Ku Klux Klan currently is raising its masked head again. Of all the strife-breeding, un-American organizations in our country, the Klan is the most despicable, because it is of native origin, fostered by men bred in this country who ought to know better than to seek their own Nation's disrepute.

"We strongly condemn the Ku Klux Klan and its ilk as a deadly menace to America at a time when it is so tragically important for all Americans to pull together. We don't want any invisible empire in our country today. What we want is an indivisible empire of Americans."

The national commander, addressing his radio audience on the subject "Americanism on the March," thus answered the questions of thousands who have been asking what the position of the American Legion was to be on the question of the Ku Klux Klan, which is reported to be on the move again in an effort to attain the strength it developed after World War I, but which was eventually reduced to a political nonentity by the aroused attitude of an aroused public opinion.

In his address Commander Stelle quoted the resolution adopted at the San Francisco national convention of the American Legion in 1923, which was aimed at the KKK, and which declared: "We consider any individual, group of individuals, or organization which creates or fosters racial, religious, or class strife among our people, or which takes into its own hands the enforcement of law, determination of guilt, or infliction of punishment to be un-American, a menace to our liberties and destructive to our fundamental law. We consider such action by any individual, groups, or organizations to be inconsistent with the ideals and purposes of the American Legion."

"That 1923 indictment was aimed at the Ku Klux Klan and other incipient groups. As national commander of the American Legion, I declare that indictment very firmly remains the American Legion policy today," declared Commander Stelle.

Gerald L. K. Smith also received the attention of Commander Stelle, who declared that "One of the most infamous hate-peddlers in our midst is Gerald L. K. Smith. He aspires to be the generalissimo of the nationalist movement in this country. Smith and his ilk overlook no bets. They invite national disunity. They are quick to move into any area where trouble is brewing."

Paying his attention to communism in this country, the commander declared: "In the campaign of world communism on the march, American Communists are playing their puppet part. They do not want an America united in international collaboration for peace."

"If America is to move forward in its tremendous task of leading the world into a new era of lasting peace," said Commander Stelle, "it must reject the underground organizations seeking to set themselves up a powerful influence in our communities to interfere in matters religious, political, economic, social, and racial. Elimination of the un-American groups is a 'must' in our national effort to build unity. It can be done if our leaders in government and others execute their legal trust. Public opinion will force the issue."

OPA Itself Will Not Abolish Price Control for the Petroleum Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial appeared in a recent issue of the Tulsa (Okla.) Tribune. Mr. Rowley, the oil editor of the Tulsa Tribune, is the author of this editorial, and his article deserves serious consideration:

OPA ITSELF WILL NOT ABOLISH PRICE CONTROL FOR THE PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Chief concern of most oilmen today is what action Congress will take on reviving the Office of Price Administration and whether the new bill, if enacted into law, will contain a provision exempting petroleum and its products from price control. The OPA measure now being considered in Congress contains a provision continuing subsidies on crude-oil production from pools averaging 9 barrels or less per well per day, such subsidies to be ended by next April.

Status of the OPA measure is this: The Senate passed a bill continuing OPA for 1 year with certain products and commodities, including petroleum, eliminated from future control except in case a control board decided there was a shortage of a product in which case the board might order return of price control. That bill was sent to the House. The House, instead of acting on the measure itself, sent it to conference. House and Senate Members have been unable to compromise differences of opinion as to elimination of price control on meats and dairy products. The members of the conference committees will hold a final meeting in Washington today. It is reported if no agreement is made at the session today, the bill will be returned to the House for debate and action by the House as a whole on the measure.

The petroleum amendment contained in the measure passed by the Senate was proposed by Senator E. H. MOORE, of Tulsa, on behalf of himself and Senators THOMAS, Oklahoma; REED and CAPPER, Kansas; O'MAHONEY and ROBERTSON, Wyoming; EASTLAND, Mississippi; O'DANIEL, Texas; WILLIS, Indiana; and MCCLELLAN, Arkansas. It follows:

"Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize the Administrator to impose or maintain price controls with respect to petroleum and petroleum products processed or manufactured in whole or substantial part from petroleum unless the Price Decontrol Board established under subsection (h) shall have first determined and certified in writing to the Administrator that the supply of crude petroleum or the particular petroleum product on which price controls are to be imposed or maintained is insufficient to meet the domestic consumptive demand therefor."

The word "domestic," in the above line is significant. It would prevent OPA officials, seeking an excuse to put price controls on oils from using a shortage abroad as a reason for price control in this country.

Uncertainty as to the eventual outcome of a price control measure has caused considerable concern among oil men. Subsidy payments for stripper well production ceased with the end of OPA June 30. Naturally, owners of these small producing wells are "up in the air." Oil companies who have urged the need for better crude oil prices are marking time as to what action they take on prices because, obviously, it would be unwise to make any changes in price schedules until it is determined definitely the final outcome of a price control measure.

OPA officials have shown definitely they do not intend to lift control on prices for petroleum and products. They have broken their word time after time by failing to lift price control after they had said such control would be eliminated on all commodities or in any industry when supply approached or was in balance with demand. They have formulated weak excuse after excuse in efforts to maintain control of oil prices. When one excuse was shown to be absolutely fallacious and not based on fact, the bureaucrats came up immediately with another excuse.

OPA officials cannot be trusted to keep their promises. They have relied on misrepresentations and statements contrary to facts in their campaign to perpetuate themselves in office and to maintain control over oil-industry prices.

Unless the price-control measure finally enacted, if one is enacted, contains a definite provision eliminating petroleum and products from price control, such control will not be lifted anywhere in the near future by OPA.

Unless price control on petroleum and products is eliminated from any price-control measure enacted, it will be a long time before there is an increase approved for crude-oil prices. OPA went for more than 4½ years bull-headedly refusing to approve any general crude-oil price advantage despite admitted facts showed costs of operation had risen substantially. A leopard does not change its spots and its past record and its failure to keep promises, misrepresentations, and erroneous statements prove conclusively CPA officials are interested more in perpetuating themselves on the Federal pay roll than they are in aiding business to return to normal operations.

If price controls over oils are eliminated definitely, either by failure to enact a price control measure or by specific provision in any such measure, crude oil prices will be increased by approximately 25 cents a barrel within a very short time with a compensatory adjustment of products prices. Such an increase would go a long way toward offsetting loss of the subsidy on stripper-well production.

Any OPA renewal measure enacted probably will contain provision for continuance of subsidy payments until next April. It is likely such payments for stripper-well production would cease were petroleum and products eliminated from price control, but purchasing companies, in that event, then would feel free to increase crude oil prices so the producers as a whole would benefit.

We urge every oil man and every businessman interested in the welfare of the petroleum industry to contact Members of Congress, particularly at this time Members of the House, and urge that price control for the petroleum industry be eliminated from any price-control measure enacted. This is important. Each person should do this and not depend upon someone else to do the contacting.

Supply of crude oil and products is in excess of demand. Crude oil went into storage last week and gasoline stocks are more than 5,000,000 barrels greater than they were a year ago.

Lincoln Day Address by Hon. Wayne Morse, of Oregon

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 25 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a Lincoln Day speech which I delivered at the Lincoln Day Republican banquet at Vale, Oreg., on February 12, 1946.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, as we Republicans pay honor this week to the great Lincoln, founder of our Republican Party, we can best honor him by rededicating ourselves to his devotion to national duty. No one can study the life of Lincoln, particularly his years in the presidency, without being deeply moved by his great concern over the state of the Union and the disintegration of national unity. His now classic historical utterances such as, "A house divided against itself cannot stand," and his solemn words, "This Government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free," were dynamic expressions of Lincoln's great conviction that America's strength and future as a Nation depended upon the unity of her people in support of national ideals.

It was his teachings and his self-sacrificing leadership which gave form and substance to the Republican ideals of human rights and individual liberties which had been so long expressed in the American Constitution and its Bill of Rights but which had been ignored or violated with resulting national discord. Lincoln met the threat to national unity in his time by leading the people of this Nation to an understanding that human values expressed in the dignity of the individual and the liberties and civil rights of each one of us, as set forth in the Bill of Rights, must be of primary concern to our form of Government. He recognized the duty of government to protect property rights and to promote and encourage the legitimate interests of a private property economy but he never hesitated or flinches in support of the basic principle of our republican form of government, nemaly, that it exists to protect and advance the welfare of all of our people and not just a privileged few.

Yes; we refer to Lincoln as "The Great Emancipator" because he never failed to place human rights and freedom above material things. We revere him as "The Great Emancipator" because even at the cost of a great civil war he united this Nation in support of the proposition that political democracy cannot endure exploitation of human beings.

In the campaigns of 1856 and 1860 Abraham Lincoln and the members of the newly born Republican Party fought to strengthen our system of representative government so that its guaranties of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness for the individual citizen could become a reality. A system of government which in the words of Lincoln would grant to every man a chance to better his condition and would leave each man free to acquire property as fast as he could; a system which held it was in no way right for some men to enslave other men; a system of government where the will of the majority would rule subject to such checks and balances inherent in the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of our Government devised to protect minority rights from any irresponsible act of a majority.

Speaking in support of the principle of majority rule, a rule so completely ignored in recent weeks by a willful filibustering minority of Senators in the United States Senate, Lincoln spoke the words in his first inaugural, March 4, 1861: "A majority held in restraint by constitutional checks and limitations, and always changing easily with deliberate changes of popular opinions and sentiments, is the only true sovereign of a free people. Whoever rejects it does, of necessity, fly to anarchy or to despotism. Unanimity is impossible; the rule of a minority, as a permanent arrangement, is wholly inadmissible; so that, rejecting the majority principle, anarchy or despotism in some form is all that is left." Those words of Lincoln were prophetic of the crisis in which we live today.

Lincoln's years in the presidency molded perhaps, as no other period in our history, the destiny of our Nation. The lesson of national unity which he taught the Nation has enabled us, as a people, to meet and survive each national crisis and each threat to our national security which has confronted us in the intervening years. It is true that each generation seems to be confronted with its own crisis and hour of decision, due, apparently, to the limitations and selfishness of human beings. Our generation has been no exception and we have yet to survive destiny's challenge to our national ideals. We will survive it if we have sense enough to keep faith with the teaching of Lincoln that there must be unity among us in promoting the common good.

Honesty compels us to admit that unity among our people as to national objectives and political policies do not exist in America today. By national unity I do not mean unanimity of agreement as to the desirability or undesirability of any particular piece of legislation. Nor do I mean by national unity that our two great national political parties should be in common agreement as to policies of political administration. However, there are a great many national questions confronting us, the determination of which will destine and chart our course in history. Most of these issues are far above the level of partisan politics because they are truly nonpartisan issues. They are national issues in the true sense of the word. Nevertheless, the significance of the position taken by the Republican and Democratic parties in respect to such issues cannot be minimized either from the standpoint of the future of the two political parties or of the future of the Nation.

I happen to be one who believes that if either party plays cheap party politics with any of these great issues it will perform not only a great disservice to itself but it will spread disunity and confusion among our people at a time when we must unite in support of the great principles for which we sacrificed so much in order to win the war. I do not mean that there is not much room for disagreement and differences of opinion as to the ways and means which should be followed in meeting the challenges of the peace. But I do mean that if we are to keep faith with the spirit and principles of our own political democracy as well as the objectives of the Atlantic and San Francisco charters we must not let party differences permit us, as a people, to become disunited on the aims of the peace. If we lose the peace, and we have yet to win it, it will be because we, as individuals, cease to demand of our two great political parties that they remain united in the common objective of establishing and perfecting the United Nations Organization. As Republicans we must not fail either our party or our country in that ideal. There is no other way, at least no other way yet devised, which promises any hope for winning the peace except by the cooperative effort of members of the United Nations Organization to develop step by step and through experience by experience the machinery, procedure, and policies of the United Nations Organization.

The alternative is a return to selfish nationalism, the inevitable result of which is, as history has proved so many times that further proof is unnecessary, namely, war. We cannot, as a nation, justify a course of action which is bound to lead to war. We cannot justify on principles of international morality, and we cannot justify it from the standpoint of our own national security because the hard cold fact is that we have no assurance whatsoever that, even with the sacrifices and cost which would be entailed, we would come out of the next world war on the winning side. It is easy in these days of both national confusion and world chaos for the political demagogue to traffic on the prejudices of our people. It is true that this peace is going to be a very expensive peace. It is going to cost money to rehabilitate war devastated areas of the world.

Undoubtedly, concessions will have to be made by the United States and by other nations, too, if economic warfare is going to be eliminated from trade relations among nations. But unless economic warfare among nations can be eliminated, the chances of eliminating military war are not very good. I know that there will be politicians who will seek to convince the American people that we should not enter into any trade or economic arrangements with any other nations of the world if those arrangements can be said to cost us any money. I would be the first to agree that the Government of the United States should not spend the American taxpayers' dollars in any international economic arrangement or policy which does not promote sound international relations and thereby preserve and strengthen the peace. But we should not forget that a few days of modern warfare in material cost alone, to say nothing of the priceless value of precious American lives, is far in excess of any economic adjustment or financial loan which has yet been suggested as necessary to stabilize international trade relations or to rehabilitate war-torn nations.

Personally, I do not think the statesmen of our country have been sufficiently frank and open with the American people in explaining to them that a peace which has any hope of preventing another war—that is, a peace which will keep the peace—is going to involve considerable sacrifice on our part as a Nation. However, that sacrifice will be much, much less than the cost to us would have been had the war continued for the 6 or 9 months longer as it was expected to continue before the atomic bomb was dropped on Hiroshima. We must not overlook the fact that this war was the most costly, devastating war in history. By the grace of God, its devastation was kept from our shores, but its awful cruelties and horrors were wreaked upon the bodies and lives of thousands of our best young men.

Granted that care, caution, and thorough examination should characterize all the negotiations and agreements which this Nation enters into in settling the peace still we must admit the fact that we cannot justify adopting a narrow, blind, nationalistic attitude in regard to peace arrangements if by paying our share of the cost of a sound peace now we can so strengthen the United Nations Organization and so stabilize economic relations between nations as to reduce to the irreducible minimum the danger of another war. I say that obligation is not only an obligation and challenge to the Republican Party but it is an all American challenge which should be met by both political parties and gladly fulfilled by all citizens.

I shall not dwell on the implications of the new historical era into which we entered last August when the first atomic bomb was dropped on Japan. Yet its significance should be taken into account in determining any phase of our international policy and it has a direct bearing in varying degrees upon all our national policies. In fact the splitting of the atom has changed the course of human history and you and I are living in an era today as different from the era of human history as recently as last August 5, as the depths of the dark ages differed from the height of the industrial age. One might describe the difference between the period of Lincoln and the period of today as the difference between splitting the rail and splitting the atom.

Political parties cannot serve the country if they fail to comprehend the implications of the atomic age. Specifically the Republican Party will fail to serve the interests of the Nation if its leaders take the position that the secrets of the aomic bomb should be locked up in American scientific laboratories as an American national secret. There are some political leaders in our party that take that position but by so doing they confess their lack of understanding of the universality of science. In spite of the criticism which I have received I am proud of the fact that I was the first Member of the United States Senate to take the position on the floor of the Senate that we, as a Nation, should recognize that the atomic bomb does not belong to the people of the United States. It belongs to mankind. In that speech I pointed out that we cannot nationalize science, that we cannot even nationalize the know-how for producing the atomic bomb. Subsequent events have already proved the soundness of my observations. I did not say and I did not mean that I think this country should here and now make available to all other countries, members of the United Nations Organization, the production secrets which we have used to date to manufacture the atomic bomb. Ordinary common sense dictates that we should first perfect the best possible international agreement and procedure for the international control of the atomic bomb.

However, already, we have come a long way from the original position taken, even by the President of our country, some months ago when the hue and cry was raised by many that we, along with England, should attempt to keep the atomic bomb and its method of production a deep, dark, military secret. It is now generally admitted that our first statement of policy in regard to the bomb raised much suspicion and great fear and misunderstanding throughout the world on the part of many peoples who do not think as well of us as we do of ourselves.

So I say that neither the Republican Party nor the Nation can afford to ignore the great implications of the atomic era to world attitudes and to national and international economic development.

There are many domestic issues which I think ought to be approached by political parties from the standpoint of the interests of national unity and welfare rather than political advantage.

Take the question of taxation. Great political deceit prevails throughout the country in regard to this question. Elections are drawing nigh. The politicians are promising reduced taxes. Surely every unnecessary governmental expense should be eliminated by the Federal Government until the national debt of approximately $275,000,000,000, or the equivalent of about $2,000 per man, woman, and child in America, is greatly reduced and until the operating budget of the Government is balanced in fact rather than just on paper. However, it is the rankest type of gross misrepresentation for any politician to attempt to give the impression that the debt can be greatly reduced by savings in the Federal pay roll or by reducing any of the so-called nonessential or less-essential Government services. Some savings of a good many millions of dollars can and should be made, but when one is talking in terms of a debt of $275,000,000,000, a saving of even $100,000,000, yes, even two or three hundred million dollars, really would be only a drop in the debt bucket. Such savings, however, are important in performing the task of balancing the annual budget. But when we come to talk about protecting the value of the American dollar by reducing the huge national debt then we must recognize that taxes must be levied.

I happen to be one who believes that the distribution of taxes should be much more equitable than it now is, and I also happen to be one who believes that every citizen who receives an income which permits of a standard of living of health and decency should make some tax investment in his government each year. The privileges, benefits, and liberties of our American form of government certainly entitle our Government to a fair tax investment on the basis of the principle of ability to pay from all our citizens who are able to maintain a standard of living of health and decency. Hence, I hope that the Republican Party will stand for an honest, realistic tax policy, because I am satisfied that a great majority of patriotic American citizens not only want to see the value of the American dollar protected but they stand ready and willing to pay such taxes as may be necessary to protect the value of their dollar. This is because they know that a deflated dollar will cost them more in the loss of property values and in the reduction of real wages than the amount of taxes which will be necessary to balance the budget and start reducing the Nation's debt. Certainly, at the present time, the people in the country by and large are in a much better position to help pay some of the cost of the war, which has added so much to our national debt, than they have been at any time since 1932. Deficit financing as a long-term policy cannot be justified and certainly in such times as these when there is a surplus of purchasing power there is no good reason for Congress to reduce taxes. Reducing taxes in order to win votes should be resisted by legislators and disapproved by voters.

There is another realistic reason why the Republican Party should not adopt a drastic tax-reduction program for the next few years. It is both a moral and economic reason. You remember that before the war a popular theme of discussion in this country was that if we ever did have another war we must see to it that we took the profit out of war. Did we? You know the answer. We did not. The fact is that the country is bulging with blood money. The profit was taken out of war for a good many thousands of our citizens but most of those are sleeping under white crosses or attempting to readjust to civilian life with disabled bodies. To many, many Americans the war resulted in no real sacrifice. In fact, for those it might be said they prosecuted the war at home to save themselves and their country, but at 3 percent interest from their Government. I do not mean to depreciate in any way the great war effort which was made on the home front, but I refuse to ignore the fact that the war improved the economic condition of millions of our people. It produced many more millionaires than the last war. I do not think it is asking too much during the next few years to levy taxes at reasonable rates, in accordance with ability to pay, so as to reduce materially the tremendous national debt which is constantly threatening the value of our dollar. I think the Republican Party will stand for such a just and right tax policy.

In the field of labor relations the Republican Party should be very careful to demonstrate that those who would make it an antilabor party do not speak for the party.

Throughout its entire history from Lincoln to date the Republican Party, as a party, has stood for the freedom of labor to organize and bargain collectively with its employers. Labor today enjoys many of its rights and privileges as the result of Republican labor policies enacted into law over the decades. In these days there is much agitation for sweeping labor legislation to be passed by the Congress because many people seem to think the solution of the strike problem is the passage of so-called antilabor legislation. Such a solution is no solution at all because as long as the right and freedom of workers to strike is preserved, and it should be preserved, antistrike legislation is unwise.

On the other hand labor has no more right than any other group in our Nation to adopt policies or practices which infringe upon the legal rights of others. Hence as to demonstrable labor abuses such as violations of contracts, jurisdictional strikes and recognized unfair labor practices the Republican Party, in the interests of the public welfare, as well as the long-time welfare of labor itself, should not hesitate to pass remedial legislation. However, in the field of collective bargaining over wages, hours, and conditions of employment it is a mistake for the Republican Party to yield to the clamor of those antilabor pressure groups who would seek through legislation, to attempt to render ineffective the collective-bargaining rights of organized labor.

Farmers particularly should remember that the market basket of the American worker is the farmers' principal market. A fair wage paid the American worker bears a direct relation to farm prices because approximately 50 percent of the worker's wage goes directly or indirectly to the purchasing of commodities which come from the farm. Instead of the workers' and the farmers' interests being conflicting and hostile they are very much in common and the Republican Party should recognize that fact.

The last issue that time permits mentioning is the issue of reducing the services of Government. That is a popular slogan but not one which the Republican Party should adopt. Unnecessary Government services are, of course, a waste and cannot be justified. It is the clear duty of Congress to eliminate them.

But the fact is that many of our Government services are essential to the public welfare, and in all probability the people of this country will demand more rather than less Government services as time goes on. Whenever possible that service should be rendered by local government at the local level and not by the Federal Government. However, I think the Republican Party should stop trying to destroy confidence in government, but rather it should create and justify confidence in government. I say that because in our complex economic system in this country the private-property economy cannot survive except in cooperation with a friendly government. If the economic life of the country were left entirely to the business interests of the Nation without any Government surveillance, the public's interests would suffer because competitive forces unchecked by Government inevitably lead to exploitation. Hence, in my judgment, the Republican Party should stand for the maximum decentralization of Government services compatible with efficiency and the administration of those services at the local, community, and State level, but it will find the people very unsympathetic to a program which seeks to deprive them of Government services which they believe they are entitled to and to the new services which they will require from time to time.

Thus, the party should never forget that what a permanent majority of our people want from their Government they will manifest their intentions as Lincoln suggested at the ballot box when he said, "The most reliable indication of public purpose in this country is derived through our public elections."

The challenge of the 1946 and 1948 elections offers the Republican Party its greatest opportunity for political service to the Nation since the days of Lincoln. If it will offer itself as the party of no special group, if it will offer itself as a party that believe that representative government should function in the interest of the common men and women of America rather than to entrench the interests of just a privileged few, if it will offer itself as a party that believes that America must fulfill her part in keeping faith with the spirit and intent of the new emancipation proclamation—the San Francisco Charter—it is certain to be returned to power and trust in 1946 and 1948.

A Year After VE-Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH W. GWINN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. GWINN of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpts from an address by Virgil Jordan, president, National Industrial Conference Board at the thirtieth annual meeting of the board, New York, May 16, 1946:

A YEAR AFTER VE-DAY

If we are candid with ourselves we must admit that in the deepest sense we have lost this war more utterly than we lost the last one in terms of the moral and economic issues by which we justified it. The American people gained a glorious victory on the field of battle and on the production front, but they must know in their hearts today that they have suffered humiliating defeat in the field of ideas and ideals, and stand in greater danger of losing their freedom today than they did 5 years ago. It is not merely that, having frustrated the Nazi-Fascist-Shinto effort to rule the world, they are now faced with the Communist attempt to do the same thing. They have still to come to grips with the more fundamental and universal problem of our time, which is whether and how they can control the expansion and limit the power of government at home as well as of governments abroad.

War, which we profess to fear or hate, is only one expression of the growth of the power of the state over men's life and work, which in recent years so many have come to accept, encourage, or support as progressive and desirable. Economic warfare, class and labor conflict, inflation, bureaucratic despotism, all forms of compulsory collectivism, national and international planning, conspiracy, and espionage, and the movement toward a world superstate—all these and many other features of the economic and political panorama on the road ahead at home and abroad today are merely manifestations of the mania for unlimited government power which is evident everywhere in our time.

In place of the plenty which they hoped the promise of peace would bring, we have a planetary epidemic of political compulsion and control called economic planning which everywhere cramps and cripples, or ruthlessly exploits and dissipates the productive powers that have survived the destruction of war.

In place of the lasting peace we hoped our power would bring, we see a progressively more desperate appeasement of a power which has been made to appear to us somehow stronger than our own, more formidable and sinister than the enemy we so recently crushed, while on a planetary scale a martial parade of weapons more immense and menacing than were ever imagined, supported by armament expenditures larger than the world has ever seen, provide the setting for the opening of the diplomatic opéra bouffe of peace being staged by the insolvent successor of the League of Nations.

And, worst of all, over most of the two great continents where they fought to safeguard the flame of political freedom and civil liberty for people who had not seen its full light or lived in it long, a curtain of utter darkness and despair has been drawn by a dictatorship more ruthless, a tyranny more total, than any of those people had ever experienced at the hands of their enemies. This iron curtain of ignorance and oppression, as Winston Churchill called it when he was Prime Minister of England, is so securely and subtly fastened down that none within or without dares to lift it; but rising from its folds are those fumes of falsehood and fear, of confusion, conflict and conspiracy that persistently poison the atmosphere and darken the spirits of men in most of the rest of the world where the air of freedom, faith, and truth still lingers.

The process by which this tragic condition of moral insolvency and economic paralysis has been accomplished in which the American people find themselves today in their foreign relations and domestic affairs is subtle and many-sided, and it began long before the war or its end. The first or most important steps in it were those of the fatal 100 days in which the foundations of the form of National Socialism which we call the New Deal were laid. We know now that nothing essential in that New Deal revolution was native or natural to the mind or morals or economics of America, no matter what the emergency of depression that then disguised or excused it. As we witness its outcome today we recognize at last that it was as much and as fundamentally a foreign invasion as though, 6 years after, an army of Nazi administrators and economists, or Soviet commissars, had landed in Chesapeake Bay and occupied the Capital.

Every essential economic idea and moral principle which it applied and implied was imported from Europe or Asia, profoundly alien to the spirit, purpose, and experience of the American people, even as long ago as 1933, though apparently not so much so today. The doctrines of the disappearance of the frontier, of the onset of economic maturity, of oversaving, of Government spending, deficit financing, compensatory fiscal policy, the mixed economy, and of Government control and economic planning—to mention some of the successive slogans and semantic catchwords of the New Deal—all these are the Dead Sea fruit of the fatalism and despair of the Old World, with which its academic and political dope peddlers have drugged and bewildered the American people during that decade, until the emotional unity and the economic stimulus of the war's great crusade saved them, and saved the New Deal itself, from the economic and moral bankruptcy which seemed to be the inescapable outcome of the waste, confusion, conflict, corruption, and stagnation it produced. Whatever may have prepared the way for it before, this decade of the New Deal which imported the old delusion of omnipotent government into the mind and spirit of the American people divided them in understanding and aspiration more deeply than anything in their history had before, and the cleavage it produced alined them unconsciously but inevitably thereafter with the fantasies, futilities, and fatalities of the class struggles of the Old World.

So it is that having emerged from this war for world freedom without really winning it or even ending it, we are living today by an economic organization and under political principles which are in nearly all essentials the same as those that have impoverished, wasted, and destroyed the Old World beyond hope of redemption; with a government of unlimited power determining wages, prices, profits, production, employment, consumption, investment, management, and ownership of property, for today and the indefinite future, practically by personal decree, or according to some plan whose meaning is beyond our comprehension and the responsibility for which has passed beyond our control. Many Americans who have the living memory of freedom in their minds fear or hate these things as falsehood or tyranny, but many others who have long forgotten if they ever knew it in the alien climate which once shaped their spirits, hail them with hope or support them with passion as the promise of prosperity and security to come; and in the eroded soil of dissension and misunderstanding that fills this chasm in our American consciousness, the dragon's teeth of domestic and international conflict are being sown and our power at home and abroad is being weakened and dissipated.

The fact that so many in America have accepted the superstition of omnipotent government and become dependent upon its apparatus during the past decade which culminated in the war means much more than an idle drift down the tides of mass ignorance, indifference, or indolence on which the traditional demagog of the Old World or the New has so often floated his craft and fished in troubled waters. In our time and in this place it is an expression of a deliberate, carefully designed, and continuously directed world-wide conspiracy to capture and maintain permanent political power over the masses of men everywhere, by crippling, paralyzing, and capturing for its purpose the sole remaining source and center of that power, which rests today in the prodigious productive power of a free America. Its technique today employs on a planetary scale all the subtle arts and stratagems of trickery and terrorism practiced on the steppes of Asia for centuries past; but its purpose has no precedent or parallel in history. It is not merely to make sure that the ideas and ideals of the Old World shall conquer and reoccupy America; but to prevent those of America, and the power they imply, from liberating the Old World from its bondage; for those who seek to rule it today know that they can do so only if they can make and keep America economically and morally impotent at this historic moment, when the secret of atomic energy both as productive agent and a political weapon rests in her hands, and as she prepares and hopes to release for the purposes of peace, plenty, and freedom the colossal economic power which she acquired through the war.

When we consider the source of such a conspiracy to sterilize the strength and paralyze the purpose of America, the alarming image of Communist Russia and its manners, morals, and economic institutions comes automatically to our minds these days; but the fact is a paradox significant chiefly because it shows how far the effort to foster confusion and conflict, which is the chief weapon of that conspiracy, has been successful. Soviet Russia may, and probably does, serve today as its psychological and strategic center, but she could not support or implement it alone. Russia is a primitive, impoverished, predatory Asiatic despotism, the most complete the modern world has ever known, as Franklin Roosevelt said in 1939. It has lived and ruled for three decades by plunder and by exploitation of an immense mass of human capital in the form of political prisoners, war captives, and slave citizens, and its effective power in peace or war rests today almost as literally as it did in the time of Tamerlane and Attila on a vast pyramid of human skulls, built as the monument and symbol of the unbounded ambition of its rulers. Though this massive totalitarian structure is framed in meaningless economic dogmas which none of its people understand, and is decorated or disguised with borrowed or stolen devices of modern technology which they have not the temperament, intelligence, or training to master, it is empty of any real capacity, power, or purpose except those of oppression and plunder. Soviet Russia is insolvent in everything but the resources of insolence, intrigue, treachery, and terrorism; bankrupt of all assets but brutality and bluff, which since the war she has capitalized to the utmost in the forced march of Communist imperialism through Europe, Asia, and the Arctic, almost to the shores of Alaska.

If this were the only enemy we had to fear, it would always have been easy for Uncle Samson to face it, if he had been armed with something more than the jawbone of an ass when he sent his statesmen to meet the Soviet commissars and bargain with them about peace and the spoils of war in the oriental bazaars they have been running in Tehran and Yalta, San Francisco and Potsdam, Moscow, London, and the Bronx.

Isolation has become as impossible in our time for totalitarian socialism or compulsory collectivism as it is for free competitive capitalism. The brutal fact is that the war left us facing an encircling world of beggars or robbers, whom it has bankrupted of spiritual and material resources for peaceful, self-supporting life. The global organization in which they pretend to have banded together to safeguard peace and freedom was busted before it began, and today it has plainly become an elaborate apparatus for the purpose either of international parasitism or collectivist conspiracy, or both.

For our part, the grim dilemma that faces us is equally plain and much more painful. For the moment, as we have emerged from the war, we have in our hands, almost alone, the decisive instruments of overwhelming military and industrial strength, which we don't know how to use. If we were to put forth upon the world the full force of our economic and political power, for the only purposes for which we can conceive using it, the whole structure of compulsory collectivism in the rest of the world would collapse like a house of cards and the mirage of unlimited government would vanish into thin air. If we do not make the fullest use of our resources for the purposes of peace and plenty, the internal dissension, confusion, and conflict upon which the collectivist virus feeds, and which are being fostered among us with feverish speed will spread and increasingly cripple and paralyze our power and finally destroy us. In the kind of world in which we live today, it is profoundly true that the kind of power America commands is a power that must be used to those purposes of peace, freedom, and plenty from which it sprang or it must perish. It is a dynamic force which must unfold itself to the end of its destiny or die.

Now there is pathos as well as pride in the fact that the American people have neither the temperament, impulse, nor the talent for any form of imperialism. It is something irrelevant and meaningless in the American climate. Whenever in their history they have been drawn or driven—sometimes by the political devices or economic accidents or domestic conditions—into an imperial struggle in the rest of the world, they have done the job of ending it for the day and then have always abandoned it and gone back to their own. There has never been anything the rest of the world could give them as good as what they have gotten for themselves here at home; there is nothing they have wanted from it except to be let alone. And this is still true; but this war was the last in which they will ever be able to feel that way. The decision they face today is, I submit, fundamentally different from any they have had to make in the past, for this time the world cannot and will not let them alone. They have conquered it in fact; they will now be forced to subdue it in spirit and practice to their purpose of peace and freedom and plenty or it will destroy them. If anyone complains that the dilemma implies or drives us to a type of imperialism which must end as all others have ended, though its purpose be different, let them make the most of it, for this time we have no other choice, and will not have that one much longer unless we make it now. We must ask the world that surrounds us not merely to accept our power, but to accept our purpose of peace and freedom for our own sake as well as its own, and use our power to that end.

So whatever name you may give it, let us make the only choice we can make and proceed to the inescapable task before us swiftly and in the full confidence that at this crucial moment we still command the power to implement and complete it. Let us without delay have an end to compromise, appeasement, and retreat, and dare to repudiate all that has been done to that end and in that name. Let us stop the erosion of our material and moral resources at home and abroad in the hopeless struggle against the pervasive conspiracy to sterilize and waste them, which is reflected in the economic stagnation and paralysis of our domestic situation. Let us offer them freely to the world for a price that is worthy of our power and our purpose. Let us refuse them to anyone who is using them, as every other nation is today, for any other purpose.

Let us first offer the utmost capacity of our economic power for reconstruction freely to every people who will undertake to abolish all national military expenditure and disarm down to the level of the local constabulary. Let us, secondly, demand the unlimited right of continuous inspection and control of every industrial operation and process or every public policy which may have the most remote relationship to armament and warfare. And, finally, let us keep, improve, and make plenty of our best and biggest atomic bombs for this imperative purpose; let us suspend them in principle over every place in the world where we have any reason to suspect evasion or conspiracy against this purpose; and let us drop them in fact, promptly and without compunction, wherever it is defied.

Now if you say that this is too daring or idealistic a destiny for any nation, even America, to embrace, I admit it could happen only once in history; for the dreadful fact is that only we could do it at all; and we can do it only now, today, if we have the understanding and the will. Everything else the American people have—impartiality and purity of moral purpose, and limitless potentials of economic power which will be realized only if we are willing to employ them for this purpose.

Disarmament—the disarmament not merely of men and nations but of governments—is the fundamental and imperative condition not only of peace but of freedom and abundance in the world today, and it is the most momentous circumstance in human history that at this instant of time—never before and never afterward—America, and only America, has the power to impose such disarmament, and perhaps forever remove for mankind the curse of Mars and its inseparable companions, poverty and tyranny.

Military disarmament is not enough, it is true. The problem goes deeper than that. We must have political disarmament, too; we must ultimately deprive governments not only of the power to attack other governments but to oppress, exploit, and plunder their own people. Yet militarism is always an expression and a weapon of that gigantic modern engine of jobbery and robbery which is unlimited government, and it will be a long step toward economic freedom and prosperity, as well as peace, if we can compel the unlimited governments of the world to drop their arms and beat their swords into plowshares. Unless we can do that, I must conclude that as we enter the age of atomic alchemy one can see on the road ahead for America little promise of the peace and plenty which our scientific accomplishment and productive power make possible. One sees rather a nation and a world which is deeply divided against itself, a world which through cowardice, stupidity, and treachery becomes day by day less and less free and day by day more and more slave to the frustrations and fears which unlimited government imposes upon the life, work, and thought of men everywhere, at home and abroad.

Freedom from fear and want is a fine phrase, but there are some things I hope we in America will never cease being afraid of, and unlimited government is one of them. There are some things, too, I hope we will never stop wanting, and escape from its power is one of them. Before we can see any clear road ahead for America, we shall have to recapture and put to use again, here and elsewhere in the world, the essential ideas, attitudes, and instincts of American life and thought which have been so deeply submerged if not altogether destroyed by the invasion of the Old World during the past decade. America and all that she signifies in human welfare and progress will ultimately be forever erased if she cannot and does not mobilize, manifest, and put forth the full moral and economic power which she can now command to oppose the destructive forces that now seek to undermine and dissipate her purpose and her spirit, and compel acceptance of the ideal of freedom and peace to which we assumed her living sacrifices were dedicated in the war we so recently thought we won.

It is for us the living, to be dedicated to the unfinished work which they who fought so nobly advanced. It is for us to be dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure—that we here highly resolve that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom.

Address of Hon. Philip A. Traynor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL K. HOCH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by Hon. PHILIP A. TRAYNOR, of Delaware, at the meeting of the State of Pennsylvania Department of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks Monday, July 22, 1946, at Reading, Pa.:

It is a pleasure for me to come here to the home district of my good friend Congressman HOCH and to meet here our mutual friends in the postal service. As a Member of the House of Representatives Post Office and Post Roads Committee I feel that you and I are pointing toward the same goal, which is to furnish the best postal service to the people of our country. The postal service is the biggest business in the world, grossing well over a billion dollars annually. You people are a part of that service, the part that has helped to make it great.

When Congressman HOCH invited me to be here this evening he said that he believed you people would like to hear something of the functionings of your Post Office and Post Roads Committee. I have gathered together a few remarks which I thought would be of interest to you, and have divided them up into three topics that I believe the postal employee is thinking about and interested in. These topics are, first, the way your committee functions to bring about laws governing the postal service; second, salary and classification legislation; and finally, a brief summary of legislation that will be considered in the near future.

Your Post Office and Post Roads Committee serves as a sort of board of directors for the Post Office Department. In this sense I am speaking of the Senate and House committees collectively for, of course, both committees must act on a given piece of legislation before it finally becomes law.

When a bill is introduced in the House of Representatives affecting the postal service it is sent to the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Here it is subject to many discussions as to the ultimate effect its adoption will have on the service. Most major bills are the subject of public hearings. At these hearings we have the benefit of the advice of the Postmaster General, Members of Congress, your national officers and many others who may be affected by the bill. Congressman HOCH and your national president, Leo George, are often among those appearing to lend their counsel and make recommendations on pending legislation.

The Postmaster General or his representative presents the view of the administration and provides the committee with cost studies. As a part of the formal report of the Department there is normally included a statement as to whether or not the Director of the Budget concurs in the report. The effect that any given piece of legislation will have on the Budget of the United States is a most important one when it comes to guide a piece of legislation through the Congress.

When legislation affecting the postal employees is being considered your national representatives take an active part in the public hearings. Many of you have read the printed hearings on salary and classification which in themselves show the solid contribution made by the officials of the postal organization. I would like to say right here that you people have an outstanding group of officers presenting your side of the picture. They are the finest group that it has been my privilege to work with.

After your committee has held hearings on proposed legislation final committee action is taken in an executive session. The result of that session is reported to the Congress in a committee report which is printed and accompanies the bill.

The next hurdle is a tough one. It is then necessary to obtain a rule so that the bill may be considered. This means getting the approval of the Rules Committee for a place on the legislative calendar. This is particularly difficult when bills are controversial and when Congress has a heavy schedule of major bills.

After a bill passes one House of Congress it must undergo the same procedure in the other House and then be signed by the Senate. I mention these steps because often in committee the consideration in recommending the bill to Congress is whether it has a chance of passage. Often a bill will be recommended by a committee that does not go as far as the committee would like to have it go but its passage might be jeopardized if it represented too radical a departure from present procedure or policy. This consideration is particularly true in salary and classification legislation.

Salary and classification legislation has been given much consideration by the present Congress and also the Seventy-eighth Congress. Prior to that time the postal employees' last salary raise had been in 1925. I know that no man had to tell me when I had had a raise in pay or how much that raise had been. However, I would like to summarize the recent action of the Congress on postal salaries so they may be considered as a part of this general discussion on postal legislation.

In the Seventy-eighth Congress Public Law 25 was passed which gave the postal employees a $300 a year increase. This was a wartime measure and was on a temporary basis. The bill for this increase was introduced by Congressman O'BRIEN, the present chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee and the then chairman of the Subcommittee on Salaries.

The present Congress, the Seventy-ninth, was determined to work out a solution, on a permanent basis. We held public hearings at which the Department and representatives of the various employees groups presented their views. The result was Public Law 134 which resulted in the granting of substantial increases in base pay, establishing hours of duty, and readjusted classifications.

When the war ended and the Government returned to a 40-hour week it became apparent that the provisions of Public Law 134 should again be revised upward. It was at first proposed to grant a temporary increase of $300 per year and this was the original provision of H. R. 5059. After the testimony taken at the public hearings was evaluated, the committee decided that the equitable solution was to revise the bill to provide for a permanent salary raise of $400 per year. I can recall that there was considerable discussion at the time as to whether the bill could be steered through both Houses of Congress. At the final committee meeting at which that bill was recommended all members of the committee pledged themselves to do all possible toward its adoption. You know the rest. H. R. 5059 became Public Law 386 of the Seventy-ninth Congress.

During the time that the salary legislation was being considered our committee was as well working on new programs that it was felt would increase the revenue of the postal service. For as I said before you cannot completely divorce salaries paid and receipts in any going business. First-class mail and air mail have been the main sources of postal revenues. The House has passed and sent to the Senate a bill to reduce the air mail rate from 8 to 5 cents. Statistics furnished by the Post Office Department indicate that the change in rate and the resulting heavier use of air-mail service will result in a substantial increase in the profit presently shown by air mail. The House has also recently passed a bill which will establish an air parcel post service. The bill will establish rates for air parcel post based on the eight postal zones. The rates have been established at a point where they will produce a profit.

One of the major projects scheduled for the near future is a study of second-class rates. We hope to work out some sort of a rate scale that will more nearly equalize costs in this category.

Another matter that is scheduled for early consideration is that of relieving the postal employees from the costs of surety bonds. There are millions of dollars involved in this change and a number of plans have been advanced. However, one thing appears clear, and that is the postal employee has a top record for honesty and only a small percentage of the money paid for bonds is ever paid out in claims settlements.

Public Law 134 will probably be considered for revision to adjust any inequities that have developed since the law went into operation. Extension of the longevity features of this law will undoubtedly be among the changes considered.

I have tried to present you a picture of the mechanics of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee; to summarize the bills that have had the most interest to you as an employees' organization and to give you my opinion of important postal legislation that will be considered in the near future. I want to say that I thank you for a pleasant visit here and to especially thank Congressman HOCH for his kind invitation.

OPA Essential

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. BARRETT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. BARRETT of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, there is in existence now a situation which is disrupting and very harmful to the economy of the Nation and to the working class of people of America.

Since the expiration of the Price Control Act there has been a steady trend toward rising prices. Reports are being issued that food and other essentials are being hoarded awaiting higher prices. Should we allow this condition to go uncorrected we would have a runaway inflation which would result tragically.

Long before the demise of the Price Control Act, I was being deluged with letters and telegrams urging me to vote favorably for the extension of price and rent controls and to oppose any emasculatory amendments. I, of course, acted in accordance with the wishes of the vast majority of my constituency by voting against all the damaging amendments offered by the Republican opposition. I am now receiving an unprecedented number of communications from the First Congressional District of Pennsylvania demanding that immediate legislative steps be taken to restore price and rent controls without substantial change.

Practically all of the communications relative to OPA directed to Senators and Representatives by the people advocate continued price control, which meets with my wholehearted approbation. Exceptions to these communications have been statements from the powerful interests, industrialists and producers, who are out to kill OPA in order that they may increase the prices of products above that which the consumer can afford to pay. The nullification of price controls can only result in an economic catastrophe which would be as disastrous to the producer as to the consumer.

Because existing goods and housing are inadequate to meet the needs of our people, it is necessary that OPA be extended for 1 year for the best interest of the American public in general. Immediate legislative action to enact an effective program of Government controls is imperative. An acceptable OPA with effective controls can prevent run-away inflation once a workable price-control law is passed. Some of the proposed revisions would make OPA ineffectual and could only hinder the working of price controls. The administration is fighting such attempts at revision. The recent collective consumer moves against rising prices are indicative of the public demand for effective controls.

During the days of combat we called upon the American people to cooperate in defending our Nation by serving in the armed forces and participating in vital war industries at home. This they did wholeheartedly. Is it not our duty to respond to their pleas for protection from chaos and financial disaster by restoring ceilings on essential commodities, in order that they may get 100 "pennies' worth" for every dollar they spend?

At the request of my constituency, I invite the attention of my colleagues to this urgent demand for prompt reenactment of an effective and workable price-control law.

Hook Forestry Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK E. HOOK
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address recently delivered by me:

Friends in the Upper Peninsula, I am speaking to you tonight by request—by request of many of you who have been receiving in the mail and reading in the papers propaganda against a bill I have introduced in Congress—the so-called Hook forestry bill.

I was well aware of this propaganda campaign even before many friends wrote to me about it. There is nothing new in this attack on me or on the forestry bill. It is as old as the dollar sign. It is as predictable as the squeal of a pig when his tail is pulled. I knew when I introduced this bill to improve the lot of the small lumber operator and to protect our remaining forests that the air would be filled with the indignant squeals of the forest despoilers—the laments of the big landowners.

Their accusations do not alarm me. Their charges of dictatorship do not frighten me. Their money and power will not deter me from fighting for progressive forest legislation—for legislation to protect the many from the avarice of the few.

Shortly after I introduced the bill now being attacked by the self-styled Independent Landowners Association, through its chairman, that champion of the "four freedoms," W. A. Henze, I received a letter from Walter M. Pierce, former Governor of Oregon and Congressman from that State.

I'm going to read a portion of that letter to you because Walter Pierce knows lumber—he knows the lumber fight. This is what he wrote to me:

"MY DEAR FRANK: I recall a conversation with you in November 1942, after we were both defeated. You had lost by about a thousand and I by nearly ten thousand. I remember saying to you 'Frank, you can come back. You are young and there is lots of fight in you and you are right.' I told you I was past 81 and could not come back. I am delighted that you did come back and made a national reputation.

"It is hard, in this timber-bossed State to get the truth about forest slaughter before the people. The Governor plays the game with the pirates, and the forests are going at a terrible rate.

"I think your forest bill ideal and to date. The greatest crime of the looters was burning and destroying more than one-half of the lumber products of Oregon. They marketed only the prime lumber. By destruction of the second- and third-grade stuff, they got a little better market for their prime lumber. Oh, what a crime.

"They may beat you by turning in immense sums of money for campaigns as they did for me. Frank, fight 'em to the finish.

"Sincerely yours,

"WALTER M. PIERCE."

I plan to follow the advice of that valiant old warrior, Walter Pierce I will fight them to a finish. I construe my function as a Congressman not only to represent my people's interest, but to fight for their interests whenever they are attacked.

I am not fooled anymore than you are by the Independent Landowners Association which purports to speak for—as a recent statement distributed by it says—"us backwoodsmen, farmers, landowners, loggers, and operators." How many of you farmers and loggers and small operators have paid dues to the association—how many of you have made contributions that enable this independent association to spend thousands of dollars fighting my bill?

Where did the money come from? Whom does the association speak for through the tongue of William Henze. You know and I know who's interested in maintaining the old dog-eat-dog timber competition in the Upper Peninsula. You know who wants to get a quick profit—and the public be d——d—out of our woods. It's the big timber operators, the lumber barons who have robbed the forests of their best stands down through the years.

You farmers with a corner woodlot, you small operators who live off your few thousand or less acres, the men in the woods—you know that something has to be done, and done quick, if our forests are to survive at all.

It is not an academic question of conservation with you; it is the simple ordinary problem of how you are going to make a living when the tree are gone.

Mr. Henze isn't worrying about that. He has suddenly turned philosophic. He isn't worried about bread and butter. He's worrying about the "four freedoms." I couldn't believe my eyes when I saw that. Then I realized that he was talking about another set of freedoms when he said the forestry bill violated the "four freedoms." He didn't mean freedom from fear, freedom from want, freedom of speech and religion.

What the big lumber interests find the forestry bill a threat to is their freedom to plunder, their freedom to exploit, their freedom to waste, their freedom to cut and cut and cut. Put these freedoms together and they spell profits—unlimited profits for a few and poverty for the many.

I must plead guilty to the charge that my forestry bill violates these last four freedoms. It is not accident that it does. I wrote it that way.

I don't have sufficient time this evening to explain all the features of the bill. I urge you to read the bill and make up your own mind. I will be happy to send a copy of the bill to anyone who writes me for a copy of it. I have already sent hundreds of copies into the district.

This is an election year. I am running for reelection to Congress. I ask your support on the basis of my record in Congress, where I have served you for five terms. I am not tonight making a campaign speech—it is a little early for that. I bring the coming election into this speech only because I fear that my political opponents will attempt to make my forestry bill an issue in the campaign. There are good indications of that already. I would regret that, and I have this to say to my opponent: Fight me with every means at your command, call me every name in the book—I can take it, as I think past campaigns have shown—but don't oppose good forestry legislation just because I introduced it.

Everyone in the district who knows anything about lumber—and there aren't many of you who don't know a good deal about it—knows that our forest stands are diminishing. That means not only that the livelihood of the men in the woods, the operators and loggers, is in jeopardy; it means the whole economy of the Upper Peninsula is in danger—real, imminent danger of collapse.

The Upper Peninsula has been richly endowed with natural resources. Our forests and our minerals below the forests have clothed and fed the thousands of our people who have worked these resources for more than half a century. We have contributed heavily to the economy of the State of Michigan. The Upper Peninsula represents in all about 30 percent of the total area of the State. Nearly 90 percent of that area is forested. This natural endowment of heavy timber growth has been a mainstay of our economy here in the Peninsula since the first settlers cleared away the trees to build their homes.

What is happening—what has been happening ever since the profit greedy timber interests discovered the green gold of our forests? With complete disregard of the future, with an eye only to bank accounts far removed from the Peninsula, these ax-happy profiteers have reduced our merchantable timber to a pathetic memory of the original virgin stand.

I do not make these charges against the big lumber interests irresponsibly. I make them to emphasize that the days of forest spoilage are over. The forests of the Upper Peninsula are the God-given wealth of the people. The welfare of the people is tied up intimately with the health of the forests—and our forests are not healthy. The productiveness of the woods have declined steadily over the years. The war years have seen an acceleration in that deterioration. Somewhere a halt must be called to the practice of heedless cutting and waste of timber.

Just a few days ago the Michigan Planning Commission issued a report on the state of Michigan's forests. No one can accuse the planning commission of violating the "four freedoms"—certainly not Mr. Henze's four freedoms—and this is what it had to say:

"Unless there is a rather sharp reduction in the rate of cutting in the near future, exhaustion of old-growth timber supplies can be anticipated within the next two decades."

In other words, the State's growth of top-rate timber will be diminished to the vanishing point in 20 years.

The same report points out that saw timber growth is only a little more than half of the cut. Not a good omen for the future of the timber industry, is it?

The generation ahead of us—the babies who will be young men and women in 20 years—are going to look back either to blame or bless us for what we do today to preserve the forests for them.

I believe the only way we can preserve the forests, the only way we can protect our Peninsula economy is to recognize that the forests are part of the whole agricultural economy of the country. That, essentially, is what the bill I have introduced does. It recognizes that forests are a crop, a product of the soil, and require the same scientific planning and cultivation as other agricultural products.

I have proposed that the harvesting of our trees, the utilization of tree products, and the replenishment of the forests be given the same scientific assistance as has been given the farms of the country. My bill gives greatest emphasis to the small timber operator because, increasingly, it is the small operator who is taking over the timber production job. He needs help and guidance if he is to undo the havoc that the big operators, in their greed for profits, have created.

Here in the Peninsula you will understand the close relationship of farming and forestry. You will know the similarity of many of the problems of forester and farmer. They are, more often than not, one and the same person. The average farmer, here in the Peninsula, owns as much woodland as he does cropland. He is dependent on both for his living.

Don't be misled by the propaganda against forest legislation. Look into the source of it; examine its motives. You will, I know, conclude with me that the best interests of the Upper Peninsula lie with intelligent forestry regulation and not continued spoilation by profit-hungry big timber interests. It is these groups that are trying to hide their greed behind fantastic charges of dictatorship and regimentation.

Pearl Harbor Responsibility

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am offering as part of my remarks a newspaper article by David Lawrence which appeared in the Washington Star on Tuesday, July 16, 1946:

PEARL HARBOR REPORT PLAINLY FIXES BLAME—SECTIONAL HEADINGS TELL WHERE NEGLECT WAS FLAGRANT

(By David Lawrence)

The American people are indebted to the special Senate and House committee which investigated the Pearl Harbor disaster. Despite the impressions which the concluding part of the report seeks to establish, the headings of the document fix responsibility as plainly as if names had been called.

The report is ingeniously developed. It states factually what occurred and subdivides each important section with a heading. Future historians cannot fail to read those telltale headings, for each one states an impersonal conclusion out of which only one inference can be made—namely, that the persons who had the responsibility for each task and did not perform it efficiently are being blamed.

Thus there is language in the conclusion of the report itself, signed by the majority, which absolves certain individuals but there is no such evasiveness in the headings.

HEADINGS NOT EVASIVE

Here, for instance, are some of the committee's own headings which subdivide the conclusions and recommendations of the report:

1. Operational and intelligence work requires centralization of authority and clear-cut allocation of responsibility.

2. Supervisory officials cannot safely take anything for granted in the alerting of subordinates.

3. Any doubt as to whether outposts should be given information should always be resolved in favor of supplying the information.

4. The delegation of authority or the issuance of orders entails the duty of inspection to determine that the official mandate is properly exercised.

5. The implementation of official orders must be followed with closest supervision.

MUST INSURE ALERTNESS

6. The maintenance of alertness to responsibility must be insured through repetition.

7. Complacency and procrastination are out of place where sudden and decisive action are of the essence.

8. The coordination and proper evaluation of intelligence in times of stress must be insured by continuity of service and centralization of responsibility in competent officials.

9. The unapproachable or superior attitude of officials is fatal: There should never be any hesitancy in asking for clarification of instructions or in seeking advice on matters that are in doubt.

10. There is no substitute for imagination and resourcefulness on the part of supervisory and intelligence officials.

11. Communications must be characterized by clarity, forthrightness, and appropriateness.

OBSERVATIONS SIGNIFICANT

There are in all 25 of these headings. Particularly significant are Nos. 17, 23, 24, and 25. Here they are:

17. An official who neglects to familiarize himself in detail with his organization should forfeit his responsibility.

23. Superiors must at all times keep their subordinates adequately informed and, conversely, subordinates should keep their superiors informed.

24. The administrative organization of any establishment must be designed to locate failures and to assess responsibility.

25. In a well-balanced organization there is close correlation of responsibility and authority.

All that the historian of tomorrow needs to do is find out who, on December 7, 1941, was Chief of Staff of the Army, Chief of Naval Operations, and in command of subordinate positions in the War and Navy Departments and who was Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and then read the main headings of the report on Pearl Harbor. He will find that Republicans and Democrats were unanimous about the headings but politeness, courtesy, and deference caused the omission of the names of the personalities involved, in the case of the majority who signed the report, whereas the minority just named those responsible. It's really a unanimous report on what happened.

Emergency Housing Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NED R. HEALY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. HEALY. Mr. Speaker, despite the fact that more houses are under construction this year than in any year since 1925, and despite the fact that most of these houses are for veterans, certain interests are still at work trying to discredit the veterans' emergency housing program.

In California, particularly, where some builders are unwilling to construct low-cost houses for veterans, an undercover campaign is going on to demand "investigation" of the veterans' housing program. But veterans are not being deluded into abandoning the veterans' housing program, as the following exchange of correspondence will show:

JULY 18, 1946.

CHARLES G. BOLTE,
Chairman, American Veterans Committee, Inc., New York, N. Y.:

Thirty thousand veterans of World War II and their families in Los Angeles County are without decent shelter and we are reliably informed that similar conditions prevail in San Francisco, San Diego, and elsewhere in California. The veterans' emergency housing program as administered by the National Housing Agency, Washington, D. C., is a colossal failure and a cruel insult to the boys who fought to defend our country. We believe that this situation is a crisis of the first magnitude and we therefore respectfully request that you support a movement for an immediate congressional investigation of the failure of the veterans' emergency housing program. May we urge that you give this request your immediate and favorable consideration and advise us by collect wire your position in the matter.

H. F. DUNTON,
Secretary, Veterans Housing Association of Pasadena, Calif.

JULY 22, 1946.

H. F. DUNTON,
Secretary, Veterans Housing Association of California, Pasadena, Calif.:

As representative of the American Veterans Committee on the Veterans Advisory Housing Council I am in close contact with Wilson Wyatt and other officials responsible for emergency housing program. I'm confident that slow development of program is not traceable to National Housing Agency but rather is the inevitable outcome of tremendous demand, lack of construction during war and prewar years, delay of Congress in establishing program, delay of House of Representatives in passing Wagner-Ellender-Taft Act, and accumulated shortages in building materials and labor. Despite these difficulties more houses have already been started under program than were built in 1925, previous peak year. I respectfully suggest that instead of requesting a congressional investigation of the housing program you request the House of Representatives to pass the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill immediately. Best regards.

CHARLES G. BOLTE,
Chairman, American Veterans Committee.

Address by Senator Connally to the People of Texas on National and International Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 25 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able and timely address delivered by the distinguished senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] over the radio to the people of Texas on July 23 last.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Texans and fellow Democrats, I have embraced this opportunity to speak to the people of Texas briefly with respect to national and international affairs covering the last 6 years. I had hoped that Congress would have adjourned and I could personally be with you tonight. Congress is still in session and will not adjourn until next week.

You know how great the pressure has been upon Congress since even before the tragedy of Pearl Harbor. Under the leadership of the great and lamented President Franklin D. Roosevelt, the Congress, even before the outbreak of war, took measures of preparation. Later it raised vast armies, made provisions for the Navy, the supplying of munitions and implements of warfare, and measures cooperating with our comrades in arms. War was declared upon us by the Axis Powers—Germany and Italy. We had no choice but to fight in defense of our people and our sacred soil. An army of approximately 8,300,000 men was raised, armed, and equipped and placed in active service. The Navy of the United States was vastly expanded. Today we have the most powerful navy on the globe. The Marine Corps reached new heights. The United States air forces were multiplied and were forged into the greatest aerial armada that the eyes of man have ever looked upon.

These gallant forces recruited from the citizen soldiery of the Republic were sent into the distant stretches of the Pacific. They invaded the territories of north Africa. They landed upon the bristling coast of France in one of the greatest invasions of recorded history. The crushing weight of our brave armies swept the enemy out of France, across the Rhine, and our heroic men marched to the gates of Berlin. In the Pacific, our intrepid soldiers, marines, and naval forces with irresistible courage relentlessly drove the enemy from outpost to outpost. Our air and naval forces hammered the home islands of the Japanese until Hiroshima and Nagasaki lay in ruins.

Germany and Italy lay prostrate before the blows of the United States and her gallant allies. Japan was broken and battered, and under the rule of our armed forces.

But the people of the United States have paid a tremendous price in blood and treasure. The lives of hundreds of thousands of brave men were sacrificed upon the altar of war. Many other thousands were wounded and maimed. Many of our fighting warships were destroyed by enemy action. Our brave knights of the air were shot down over enemy territory.

This staggering tragedy of World War II was forced upon us by would-be conquerors who dreamed of world dominion. There was no alternative except resistance or submission to foreign dominion. We chose the pathway of honor and courage. We chose to fight for our cherished liberty which had been purchased by the blood of our heroic ancestors.

Next in importance to winning the war is the establishment of peace and preventing another world war. I have had the honor to serve as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate since 1941. As chairman, I appointed a special subcommittee which consulted and worked with Secretary of State Hull, Secretary of State Stettinius, Secretary of State Byrnes, and Presidents Roosevelt and Truman in devising plans for the creation of the United Nations.

A result was the Connally resolution, expressing the sentiment of the United States Senate. As its author I pressed it before the Senate. On November 5, 1943, the resolution was adopted by a vote of 85 to 5. Vital parts of the resolution read as follows:

"That the United States, acting through its constitutional processes, join with free and sovereign nations in the establishment and maintenance of international authority with power to prevent aggression and to preserve the peace of the world.

"That the Senate recognizes the necessity of there being established at the earliest practicable date a general international organization, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving nations, and open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the maintenance of international peace and security."

The resolution was the foundation upon which were later builded the Dumbarton Oaks Charter and finally the Charter of the United Nations at San Francisco. In Washington a preparatory conference drafted the Dumbarton Oaks Charter.

In March 1945, at the request of the President, I attended the meeting of the Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace, which convened in Mexico City. It had for its purpose the organization of the Republics of the Western Hemisphere for mutual self-defense and protection against war.

At the request of the President of the United States, I served as vice chairman of the United States delegation at the United Nations Conference on International Organization which convened at San Francisco on April 25, 1945. It was composed of delegates from 51 of the United Nations.

The Conference was in session 9 weeks, and it adopted a charter for the world peace organization which was solemnly subscribed by 51 nations. The Charter is a constitution for the world organization. It is composed of two great bodies, the Security Council and the General Assembly.

The Security Council is the executive authority. It is composed of five permanent members from the great powers and six members chosen by the General Assembly. Vested in the Security Council is authority to consider questions of peaceable settlement and if necessary the use of armed might to prevent aggression or war.

The Assembly is composed of the representatives of all of the 51 nations. It constitutes a free forum for the discussion of any international question that may affect the interests of the United Nations or of any international quarrel that may threaten war.

As chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I presented the Charter to the Senate. It was ratified by a vote of 89 for ratification and 2 opposed.

It will be remembered that following World War I, the treaty embodying the League of Nations was submitted to the Senate, and after months of bitter and partisan debate, the treaty was rejected. The American people have become convinced that this Nation of ours, great and powerful as it is, endowed with resources that challenge the imagination of man, with military and naval strength greater than ever possessed by any nation in the long stretch of the centuries, cannot wrap around ourselves a cloak of protection that will shut out war when all the world is aflame.

It was necessary to hold another conference in London for the purpose of implementing the Charter, selecting its officials, and putting its agencies into operation.

Our honored and patriotic President Truman had requested me to serve as a delegate to the Assembly in London, and he has appointed me a delegate to the General Assembly, which meets again in New York on September 23, 1946. I felt it my duty to respond. I felt that the people of Texas would want me to contribute my labors and efforts toward perfecting the international organization in behalf of peace. I felt that the people of Texas did not want another world war. I felt that they did not want the hour to ever come when their sons would be forced to march again to war. I felt that I could render the people of Texas no greater service than to fight for world peace.

The conference convened in London on January 10, 1946, and was in session until February 15.

The First General Assembly was an unqualified success. After San Francisco, we had only the bare skeleton of the Charter. At London the inert framework was invested with flesh and blood. It became a living organism.

Before we left London, the General Assembly had been organized. The six nonpermanent members of the Security Council had been elected and that body had organized. The 18 members of the Economic and Social Council had been selected and that body had begun its duties. The 15 judges of the International Court of Justice had been elected. The Court has met at The Hague on April 18, at its inaugural session. The Military Staff Committee had been set up. It convened in London and met again soon in New York. Its task is well in hand. The Secretary-General had been selected and its agencies had been organized.

The meetings of the Assembly suggested the projecting into world affairs of the profound political doctrines promulgated by the Constitutional Convention of the American States in 1787. It marked an epoch—it will become historic.

The agreement reached on the atomic energy resolution was encouraging to the advocates of world peace. I had the honor to report the resolution to the Assembly.

As you know, the resolution makes ample provisions for adequate security safeguards. Neither the United States nor any other country will be asked to give up any atomic energy secrets until security devices have been established to protect humankind against the terriffic blasting power of the atomic bomb.

The Security Council demonstrated remarkable vigor and vitality. It faced with courage and promptness the situations in Iran, Greece, Indonesia, and Syria and Lebanon even before it had adopted its rules of procedure.

The meeting of the Security Council was significant and historic. It was a solemn hour when the 11 members, speaking for and serving the United Nations, considered international problems affecting distant parts of the earth. It was inspiring to look upon a tribunal in which a weak nation could call to the bar of judgment a powerful nation. It was the assizes of the nations. Here peace was struggling to achieve concord among the powers capable of making war or banishing war.

At the Potsdam Conference, attended by Secretary of State Byrnes and President Truman, it was agreed that there would be set up a Council of Foreign Ministers, consisting of the Foreign Ministers of the leading allied nations.

The Foreign Ministers met in London in September 1945 in an effort to agree upon treaties with Italy, Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania, and Finland. Little was then accomplished.

The Council of Foreign Ministers called a conference in Paris on April 25, 1946. Again the President asked that I accompany the Secretary of State as one of his advisers. The Council was in session until May 15. The meeting was disappointing and disheartening. Agreements could not be reached on any important issue. The Council again met in Paris on the 15th of June, and at the request of the President of the United States, I attended as one of the advisers to the Secretary of State.

After a session of 4 weeks, the Council recessed to await the meeting of the peace conference of the 21 nations who participated in military operations against the Axis Powers affected.

The sessions of the Council were attended with substantial success. All of the questions involved were not determined, but a number of very important issues were satisfactorily settled. Among these matters were the calling of the peace conference with freedom of discussion and recommendations, the development of a better understanding among the great powers, the draft treaty with Italy, including Trieste and the Italian colonies, progress on the Balkan treaties and the understanding that Austria and Germany shall be considered at a later date.

I make no claim that the settlements reached were in each case the most desirable. The United States alone could not enforce its own views in each particular.

We shall undertake to aid in the solution of the Austrian and German problems. We want the peoples even of the enemy states to have an opportunity to rebuild their shattered fortunes and to restore their economy. We want to take arms out of their hands and replace them with implements and tools of industry and agriculture. We want to drive from their minds dreams of aggression and conquest.

The other powers were convinced that the United States was serving no selfish purpose. They were aware that the United States was demanding no territories; that it was demanding no reparations; that it was seeking the peace of the world and peace alone.

That the policy of the United States is not tinged with political partisanship gives us strength in the councils of the nations. The happy situation that our people are not divided on international issues by narrow and selfish partisanship drowns any hope among foreign interests that through division and schism our people can be weakened or undermined. Entire and complete unity made unassailable the American position.

And what shall be our course in the future toward our allies and associates?

The United States must maintain its historic international policy toward all nations. Our rights must be asserted and enforced with firmness and resolution. We shall not tolerate any form of aggression, whether by armed might or more subtle infiltration or insidious attack upon our system of government. Whether it be Russian or the Republic of Panama, whether it be Great Britain or New Zealand, we shall respect their rights and shall expect and demand that they recognize and respect ours.

We pray God that we shall never again be forced to draw the sword in defense of our security. All the world knows that we want to live in peace. All the world knows that we can wage war. All the world knows that we shall not refuse to fight when attacked or when our security is threatened.

The United States must maintain an adequate Army, trained and properly equipped, a powerful Navy, and Air Forces superior to any in the world. These are for the national defense and the preservation of peace—to strike the sword from the hand of would-be conquerors.

Someone may inquire why the United States should participate in a Council of Foreign Ministers concerning itself with Italian colonies in Africa, the settlement of Trieste, and other question in a distant continent?

We have no direct interest in Trieste or the Italian colonies as such, but we do have an overpowering interest in preserving peace. We cannot forget that World War I had its beginning in a quarrel in an obscure town in the Balkans. We do not fail to recall that the tragic war that has just come to an end had its beginning in a quarrel over Danzig on the Baltic.

I am convinced that the United States States must pin its faith and its hope on the United Nations. In his Army Day address in New York City on April 6, President Truman said: "The immediate goal of our foreign policy is to support the United Nations to the utmost."

In order to demonstrate to the world that we stand wholeheartedly back of the United Nations Charter, we should proceed to do the following:

First. In our dealings with other nations we must stand firmly on those principles of law and justice expressed in the Charter. We should expect other nations to do the same.

Second. We should unhestitatingly make available to the Security Council our full quota of the troops, planes, and ships necessary for the maintenance of world peace.

Third. We must maintain a strong Army, Navy, and Air Force so that we may protect our land and our people and fulfill our obligations under the Charter.

Fourth. We must put into treaty form the inter-American machinery contemplated in the Act of Chapultepec and make it one of the permanent pillars in the temple of peace built at San Francisco.

Fifth. We should do our utmost to secure at the earliest practicable time complete agreement with respect to the control of atomic bombs, and other weapons of mass destruction.

Sixth. We should lend our full support to the economic, social, and humanitarian program of the United Nations and thus help establish those conditions in the world which are essential for enduring peace.

While we are seeking to establish peace and repair the ravages of World War II, there are those who speak of the possibility of World War III. Such a tragedy is unthinkable. It cannot happen if the great powers cooperate in behalf of peace. We want no war with Russia. We want no war with Great Britain. We want no war with any other power.

In my view no other responsible nation wants war. It will be remembered that Generalissimo Stalin has proclaimed that Russia stands back of the United Nations Charter. The Soviet Ambassador said in Washington on July 2, that there is no basis whatever for war between Russia and the United States, and that the Soviet Union will never start a war against the United States or anyone else. Similar expressions of peaceful intent have been uttered by the leaders of Britain, France, China, and other nations.

So long as the great powers cooperate in support of the Charter, so long will there be peace. These aims can be attained only by mutual confidence, mutual respect, and mutual trust.

The life of man within recorded history is a great romance. He has advanced from days of the Stone Age when he groped in intellectual night and was moved alone by the basest passions, toward the light of civilization. From ignorance, he has marched to a marvelous intellectual development. In the field of government, through the centuries he has moved into the realm of free government and constitutional processes. In the field of science, his inventions have conquered the elements. Man has mastered the oceans. He dominates the air. He has measured the stars. The riches of the earth have yielded to his control. On the throbbing pulses of the ether, radio belts the globe with its messages. Mighty manufacturing plants produce his wants and needs. The telephone, the telegraph, the automobile, all of the modern inventions are the fruit of his genius and intelligence. Medical science has pushed ever forward in healing human ills, in solving problems of health and sanitation. Stubborn and deadly diseases have yielded to its treatments.

In the realm of science and invention there seems to be no door that is closed to the intelligence of man. With all of our marvelous and stupendous achievements, the world still clings to the brutal and savage institutions of war. Though efforts have been made through the centuries to devise plans for world peace, until now they have failed. We have before us a great challenge. It is a challenge to the statesmanship of the world. The greatest problem that faces the intellect and genius of humanity is the banishment of war and the establishment of agencies to preserve the peace. We must not be afraid. We must not tremble at the prospect of failure. This is a supreme conquest of the ages. Let us master and chain the god of war. Let us strengthen and fortify the citadels of peace.

We shall not despair. There comes ringing down to us today the words of Woodrow Wilson, uttered a few months before his death: "I am not one of those that have the least anxiety about the triumph of the principles I have stood for. * * * That we shall prevail is as sure as that God reigns."

I am today reminded of the familiar and often-quoted words of Benjamin Franklin at the conclusion of the Constitutional Convention in 1787. Pointing to a figure of the sun painted on the chair of Washington, the presiding officer, he said that often during their deliberations he had looked upon the figure of the sun and wondered if it were a rising or a setting sun, and that he was then happy to know that it was a rising sun.

As I contemplate the growing power and majesty of the United Nations supported by the solemn compact of 51 nations that they "shall settle their international disputes by peaceful means;" when I remember that the great powers as well as the small states have pledged their national honor and faith to the solemn provisions of the Charter; when I reflect upon the progress toward peace made by the Council of Foreign Ministers, I am happy to believe that today we may look into the years with the satisfaction of knowing that the cause of peace—world peace—is a rising and not a setting sun.

This is my brief report to the people of Texas as to my activities during the past 6 years. No State in the Union made a greater contribution to the prosecution of the war. No State in the Union is more attached to the cause of world peace than this great old commonwealth of ours. In war and peace I was representing the people of Texas. I feel that I could serve Texas in no better way than by laboring to promote triumph in war and the establishment of a permanent peace.

During the war, I felt it imperative that adequate provisions be made for arming and equipping our gallant troops and for sending ample supplies to our fighting men.

Finally, when our enemies had been crushed, I felt it my duty as Senator to devote every energy at my command to restoring the peace of the world and to the establishment of an international organization to secure permanent and lasting peace. Both President Roosevelt and President Truman desired that Senators participate in the making of peace. I could not refuse the President's request.

With diligence, I pursued before the departments and in the Senate those measures and problems in which the people were interested. I have constantly been in touch with all important domestic affairs.

I have not neglected the interests of my constituents with respect to domestic matters. For instance, the United States-Mexican Water Treaty took many weeks in hearings before my committee. Its ratification saved the Rio Grande Valley and assured its water supply.

Only yesterday I aided in passing through the Senate the tidal oil-lands bill that assures to the school children of Texas ownership of oil lands in the Gulf of Mexico. These are but samples of many other matters of domestic importance to receive my attention.

One of the great books of all time is that by Count Leo Tolstoy entitled, "War and Peace." The past 5 years can be comprehended within those words. Triumph in war was vital and necessary. But when the war came to an end we determined that never again should such bloody and devastating war curse the earth. As we face the future, I shall endeavor to advance the banner of peace.

My name will appear upon the ballot in the Democratic primary to be held on July 27, as a candidate for reelection to the United States Senate. I hope that my record of service and my efforts to represent the people of Texas, both in war and in peace, may receive their approval at the ballot box. I desire to express my gratitude to the people of Texas for their support through the years. There is no higher honor in the United States than to serve in the Senate from Texas. I cherish beyond any words of expression the confidence and trust of the people of my native State. My pledge for the future is that I shall render to the people the highest character of service of which I am capable.

The people of Texas and of the United States are enlisted in a noble cause—the advancement of free government and democratic institutions and the preservation of world peace. God grant that we may attain these lofty aims.

Calvin Coolidge College of Liberal Arts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following commencement address by Alexander Brin at exercises of Calvin Coolidge College of Liberal Arts at the New England Mutual Hall, Boston, Mass., June 5, 1946:

President York, trustees and faculty of Calvin Coolidge College, Major Fahey, distinguished guests, members of the class of 1946:

I am proud to have the opportunity to address the graduates, parents, and friends of this institution that represents the true American spirit and is dedicated to preserve the qualitative values which the small New England colleges have always stood for and which recognized merit as the sole and exclusive factor in the admission of students, and not the accident of birth, of race or creed or nationality. Calvin Coolidge bears the name of a great American personality whom it was my privilege to have known intimately while he was the Governor of the Commonwealth and later as President of the United States.

To appreciate at its full value the civilization we characterize as American one has to read the public addresses and the State documents of Calvin Coolidge from the time he assumed the Governorship of this State until he retired from the Presidency. His conception of the American form of Government might be read and reread and studied with profit by the student in all seats of learning.

If there are two causes which, throughout my public career I have championed more than any other, they are those of the science of human relations and liberal education. As the senior member of the Massachusetts Advisory Board of Education and as a member of the Board of Collegiate Authority of the Commonwealth, I am pledged and conscience-bound never to cease working for the advancement of the art of living together with our fellowmen, no matter where they may be, and toward making it possible to gain for Massachusetts boys and girls the best possible education. It has been my constant dream to see the day when no Massachusetts young people shall need to leave the State to secure as fine and complete an education as can be gained by anyone in the world. I am striving, with all my heart and limited force, to bring that day nearer.

No pleasure of greater proportion or more gratifying satisfaction has been mine than the opportunity year in and year out at commencement exercises to greet thousands of young people. It makes one feel young. It is nice to be young. Mark Twain once said: "It is better to be a young June-bug than an old bird of Paradise." The greatest single asset that our State and Nation has is its young people. All our material possessions would be of little permanent value if we did not have a well-trained youth. The young men and young women of our colleges are the pattern of the coming generation. They are our debenture of the future.

Young people today may not believe it, but this was once a beautiful world. Yes, those of us who are in the middle life today, and older, know how fine the world once was, especially for us who are citizens by choice, who were fortunate to come to this country, "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all human beings are equal," Where we could enjoy the inestimable blessings of religious and civic freedom, free speech and a free press, higher standards of education and living, and a tradition of fair play, fellowship and peace. There was a certain amount of stability about the age we lived in. There was a zest for living. Despite all the modern inconveniences of our day, we constantly looked forward for better things to come. We did not appreciate it at that time; we did not count our blessings; but we know it now by contrast; now that it has passed away. Today we live in a fast-moving world, a world of speed and not durability. What is new in the morning, is outdated in the evening. While in the world of yesterday there were, indeed, poverty and misery enough forty years ago when I was a newsboy selling papers in the streets of Boston, yet all of us were confident that the progress of science and the extension of trade and the raising of the living standards of the people would soon produce enough physical comfort so that poverty and deprivation would disappear forever. In the world of yesterday, there was ignorance enough, but we were confident that the spread of schools from land to land and the improvements in education would soon banish ignorance and prejudice from the globe. In the world of our childhood days there were sickness and disease. But we were sure that step by step human ailments of body and mind would be controlled, and many of them totally and permanently eliminated.

We looked forward to an increasing life span for the average man, ample provision for his physical wants, nations permanently at peace and the world marching forward to nobler goals. We, who were fortunate enough to live in this blessed land and enjoy to the fullest democratic human values, looked forward to a Utopia, where all men would be free and happy, where they would live in security and mutual understanding at a time when the world would become a veritable garden, fair with the choicest flowers of justice and righteousness, peace and contentment, when every man would live under his own fig tree with none to make him afraid. And we thought that the world was advancing toward that direction. We somehow believed that the humanitarian philosophy evolved in the latter half of the nineteenth century would become the foundation stone of organized society, and the world would become a family of nations, knit by bonds of common interest. Consequently there was happiness in the world, and a sense of peace of mind. And now that it is gone, we mourn its departure and have at least this melancholy satisfaction today; that we had the privilege of living in one of the finest ages of human history.

Many of us remember the time when commencement addresses exhorted graduates to go out in the world with the firm resolve to use their own brain and brawn in carving out a career to fame or fortune, or perhaps to both. The glaring example of material success held up to the eager of the young and ambitious were not those who started out in life on the proverbial silver spoon, but those who had by their own bootstraps pulled themselves up from the gutter. The graduates were reminded that America is magnificent because it is the world's best place to give the purely human qualities a chance to succeed.

This is the land of aristocracy of character against the aristocracy of birth and wealth. Here in the United States there are no regal traditions to influence, if not to thwart us, in the evolution of an instinct to perfect freedom. Every citizen is judged by his worth and rewarded according to his merit. From the humblest stations of life, the most obscure men and women have risen from poverty and simplicity to places of glory, power, and riches. We in America are proud of self-made men, without regard to creed, class, or conditions. We are proud because such men are living proof that our democracy works. Work, work hard and unrelenting, was the counsel of the day. Work, long and tedious. Work without regard to the time clock and pay envelope—that was the formula for the attainment of success.

"Go West, young man," was the cryptic admonition of the historic days of Horace Greeley. "Go out, young man," they said, "in those wide open space where a vast region and undeveloped territory awaits your energy, your ability, and your perseverance. Hew from its untouched soil and wood and rock the fame and fortune that can come to you in no other way. Be a pioneer, a doer, a real honest-to-God builder, a hard-muscled and clear-thinking man."

Then came the mass production machine and cafeteria education age. The tune of the commencement addresses changed. To the young, eager, ambitious go-getting hopefuls came the admonitions: "Go snob." Don't waste your time climbing from the bottom in the slow tempo of horse-and-buggy days. This is the age of speed. Get your success fast and sure. Don't work for it. Don't make the economic and social mistake of marrying the boss's stenographer. It is just as easy to marry the boss's daughter—and much more profitable. We were promised two chickens in every pot and two cars in every garage.

A mad and inconceivable race for material success overtook the Nation. Their cry was: Get there no matter how. The eleventh commandment was "Don't be found out." Then came the terrible depression. Great landmarks and business institutions disappeared overnight.

We have just come to the end of an era. We have just finished the greatest of all wars, the second world war in our generation. The last chapter was written in toil, tears, and blood. Millions of lives had to be sacrificed so that we might once again establish the value and dignity of the individual, human personality. More than 300,000 young Americans alone fell in battle in every part of the globe. More than 1,000,000—the flower of our youth—have been maimed and wounded, some of them losing from one to four limbs. What a sad commentary upon the advancement of civilization for thousands of years, during which time art, science, literature, invention, and social happiness have reached heights that could be looked upon only as a dream a few centuries ago! Yet we are standing in the midst of the greatest tragedy ever perpetrated in all the recorded history of the human race! From the very dawn of human life, through the mists of the stone age and the period of the cave man, through the beginnings of civilization in the valleys of Mesopotamia, through all the darkness of the Middle Ages, right to this day, never was there committed any other crime so cruel, wicked, and diabolical, of such extraordinary magnitude, as the crimes against the human race committed by the Nazis since the rise of Hitlerism in Germany. In addition to the killing of millions of young men and women on battlefields, through bombing attacks and on the seas, the Germans used millions of live human beings, innocent old men, women and children for the making of soap, axle grease; they confiscated their belongings and even extracted the gold from the dentures of the victims to enrich the coffers of the German people. These acts of baseness and cruelty followed in the wake of a complete collapse of ideals, the annihilation of sense of honor and moral code, the complete absence of economic and social justice and respect for human life.

We have paid a terrible price in World War II because the world forgot the supreme teaching of religion that all humanity is one. War is indivisible; peace is indivisible. Americans ought to understand this radiant ideal of religion. You cannot hate, you must not hate one member of the human family, for all mankind is one. Their fate is indivisible.

The one problem which in importance surpasses every other, whether national or international, is how the civilized people may now and hereafter live and work together without resort to war and without its constant threat. Despite the fact that the Allies have won the greatest of all the wars on the battlefields of the world, never before have so many people wondered about the future. The fear of atomic insecurity is the world's new common denominator. All the concepts of security, safe homes, tremendous armies, air and sea superiority, industrial ingenuity, underground factories, the kind of power that won the war only a short time ago, are now outmoded.

The battle for peace, the struggle for recovery from the devastations and dislocations from the war, has become as dramatic, as terribly earnest, as war itself.

The Hebrew prophets teach us that the Creator of the universe never afflicts a man with a disease without first having created the remedy.

Exactly 1 year ago this week it was my singular privilege to occupy a front seat when a modern miracle took place, momentous in its significance to the human race. It was this week that marked the closing of the San Francisco Conference after 7 weeks, at which the delegates of the United Nations, representing 1,500,000,000 human beings—or 8 out of 10 people on the globe—created the organization of a safe and peaceful world. On that day the world that we were born in was gone forever.

It is a distinct effort to restrain one's enthusiasm over the progress made during the year by the United Nations. Despite the disagreements and clashes, there are indications that slowly but surely we are advancing. It seems to be very clear that the nations of the world are eager to make a go of it. Cooperation, understanding, confidence, giving others the benefit of the doubt, the elimination of suspicion—these will help create out of the present groping toward a united world the kind of agency that will indeed assure peace to a world that has been sorely stricken and smitten twice in our own time.

The atomic age, like all the preceding eras in human history, depends upon its men and women as to what kind of a world shall be ours. Man's enlightenment, his morale, his psychological and his innate character will write the future history as they have written the history of the past.

There are times in the history of the world when certain phrases crystallize the sentiments of an age, challenge the loyalties of mankind and express a hope and prophecy that seem the very aim of life. "One world—or none" is such a declaration. That should be a slogan of the nations of the world. It is a bitter, ominous truth. This modern slogan will live as the finest designation of the very essence of the peace movement and to command the sacrifices and services of all lovers of peace in the pursuit of peace, even as the slogans of former years, "No taxation without representation," "Give me liberty or give me death," "Making the world safe for democracy," stirred men to action and changed the course of history.

It has been said that civilization means the mastery of nature and the taming of man. The mastery of nature is the task of science. The taming of man is the task of religion and education. The contribution of science cannot be denied. The marvels of everyday life, the extent of the constructive and destructive forces with which we are familiar serve at least to remind us that science is doing its job amazingly well. But what of education? What advances are we making to tame mankind? The state of world affairs provides the obvious answer. Atomic energy and man's conquest of space through flight and swift communication should convince us that the world today is essentially a unit; and that continents, national boundaries, languages, and alleged differences of race as obstacles to human cooperation toward the highest human ends are all terms that belong to the world of yesterday.

Man's advancement through savagery and barbarism down through the ages has been a procedure of improvement through a course of educational methods. The lessened emphasis on the humanities in our educational institutions is one of the root causes in converting the world of construction into a den of destruction. We have discovered that education and learning no longer makes the man. The world now knows that an individual or a nation may attain an unusual degree of technical skill and intellectual efficiency, and yet remain spiritually unprincipled and morally without character. Germany had less illiteracy than other nations and still it led the world to the brink of destruction.

Knowledge is not enough. "The devil can quote Scripture to his purpose." Twenty-five hundred years ago Plato said, "Education is that which teaches us to love that which we should love and to hate that which we should hate." Life is made up of choices. There are two ways of doing everything. Until the people learn to make the right choices we shall face the specter of a third world war and the attendant destruction of civilization. The tremendous challenge facing education for the world of tomorrow is not the acquisition of knowledge. It is the development in the individual and in the state of those ethical and spiritual standards which will make the proper choices automatic.

The times require and conditions need a recasting of the whole curriculum in every educational institution, especially in the primary and intermediate grades of our public and private schools. We need to introduce new ways in our educational system, a changed point of view, a better spirit with which to teach and interpret current problems, which will plant seeds of universal peace, world citizenship, and finer human relations between man and man. Education for the world of tomorrow must contribute to character building of your Americans or prepare future citizens for the willing and intelligent participation for living in one world. Universal peace cannot be brought about through the United Nations organization alone. The mind and spirit of man must be developed to the point that he will truly love justice and peace. It is the only formula by which man may live and not die.

For the first time in the recorded annals of international relations, the importance of education has been formally recognized as one of the chief cornerstones of the United Nations structure dedicated to establish enduring peace and to conquer injustice and insecurity for the 2,000,000,000 people occupying 55,000,000 square miles of territory on the globe.

Now that mankind has paid the colossal price by substituting catastrophe for imagination twice in our own lifetime, we have come to realize now more than ever before that civilization is truly a swift race between education and catastrophe.

Now that education has become the lifeline of the future, a great responsibility rests on educated men and women and on our educational institutions to keep this and every generation educated to the necessity of peace by teaching the advantages of peace as against the horrors of war with its toll of human lives and loss of material resources, and its devastating effect on the morale and morals of the people.

It is the task of education to give man a feeling of security in the world of tomorrow. Education alone is the only force left to control the young giant science capable of destroying nations with his mere breath. The science of education must be revolutionized in order that it may be used to save the world from self-destruction. Education must be utilized to rediscover the moral and spiritual order of the universe. Knowledge, progress, education, and invention must be used to bring out the best in man instead of the beast in man, education must be used to consecrate man for the welfare of man instead of warfare on man, education must be used for consecration to the dignity of man instead of the extermination and elimination of man.

Some of you may no doubt know that for some time I have been advocating an international university for world citizenship, because the current crisis in world affairs demands that all nations know one another better: their history, ideals, way of life, manner of artistic, spiritual, and intellectual expression.

America stands at the eve of her greatest influence to extend democracy's frontiers all over the world. The proximity of Massachusetts to the international capital of the world offers an unparalleled opportunity to make this State the greatest intellectual and trade center of the world. Massachusetts can become the supertype State of the Union if we are conscious of and alive to the responsibilities and opportunities that the UN offers.

America is the greatest laboratory of democracy where racial cooperation is essential to our future success. Our pioneer job now consists of the art of living together with our fellowmen regardless of race, color, or creed. It is our duty to keep America for mankind as a great fortress of freedom of thought, religion, education, and opportunity. The distinctive American character is the square-deal idea for all people. This generation of Americans will have the unique, blessed opportunity to establish enduring peace on earth if we but rise to the greatness of the moment.

The finest minds of our age have discovered in the terrible state of the world that the example of the United States is worth to be studied as an experiment in achieving a successful society of nations based on fellowship and international friendships. The American way of life is so modern and so up-to-date that the world is just beginning to appreciate it. America is the only object lesson on our planet that demonstrates the fact that members of various nationalities can be absorbed and assimilated with benefit to mankind. For powerful and great as is the United States of today, it is but a conglomeration of all existing nations. From all corners of the earth came group after group seeking refuge and finding shelter in the United States, the melting pot of all the nations. Its great success is a living example to the entire human race.

The greatest single question that faces mankind in the atomic age is whether it can save itself from its own doom. The doom that will come from another war. To meet the challenge, world friendship must march ahead with vigor and speed. Human beings must come to feel a sense of kinship which binds all people from one end of the earth to the other in an indissoluble unity.

Through inter-relationship we will discover that there are no superior or inferior races, that there are only superior and inferior individuals of all races. There are 26 letters in the English alphabet—each is different and each is essential. In misguided hands, these letters may be arranged into profane words, as the Nazis used their language to appeal to the lowest, meanest, and the basest passions of human beings. But in skillful hands, they may produce a drama of Shakespeare, a prophecy of Isaiah, and a Constitution of the United States, and a Charter of the United Nations. There are eight notes in the musical scale. Arranged by the unskilled, these notes may be arranged into discordant sounds; in the hands of a master, they become lovely melodies. Thus it is with each race and nation. Every race is essential in the development of civilization and the progress of humanity. When the inhabitants of the world are taught to appreciate the gifts of all the races, they will be encompassed in a pervading good will which will inevitably lead to a substantial peace.

America is now the international capital of the world. Let us rise to the occasion and strengthen the forces of international understanding. Through this procedure, we will demobilize the minds of men and will eradicate the arrayed prejudices and misjudgments, obliterate misunderstandings, which have set men against each other through the ages, which for the past 3,500 years have brought 13 years of war for every year of peace.

Are we of this generation willing to act as trustees and guardians of universal brotherhood under the smile of God? It is for us to give the answer or forfeit this great unprecedented and unparalleled privilege.

As members of the class of 1946, you must realize that you face a world far different from that which has confronted any group of graduates since the dawn of civilization. You must learn to think logically, dispassionately and carefully about the great issues of our day. You must learn to understand what it means to live in this age. The atomic discovery by our Nation has conferred on the United States the role of spiritual as well as material leadership. We are not only custodians of our future and of our children, but in a peculiar sense the custodians of the world. In our hands rests the fate of civilization. And one recalls that it was Lincoln who told his countrymen: "We shall nobly save or meanly lose the last great hope of earth."

It is your generation that must build this new humanism whose foundation is mutual well-being, and whose keystone is social sanity. Wars must be averted once and for all. By the side of Jefferson's Declaration of Independence we must now put a declaration of interdependence. Prejudices are mental walls. Our minds need fewer walls and more windows. Our first President and one of the founders of the United States predicted more than 150 years ago: "We have sown the seeds of liberty and union which will sprout little by little throughout the earth. One day on the model of the United States of America will be formed the United States of the World. The United States will be the legislator for all nations."

Let us rally to the call of the greatest soldier-statesman of our generation, General Eisenhower, who has called on the American people to rise to greatness in the following words:

"Unless there is a moral regeneration throughout the world, there's no hope for mankind—and we'll all disappear in the dust of an atomic explosion. I belive in organization as much as in moral regeneration. Through the church, the forces of tolerance, good will, and sympathy may be used to save the world. We must show the world what can be accomplished by tolerance, love, and the appreciation of the hopes and fears of other peoples."

What applies to churches is applicable to our educational institutions. Will we take the opportunity to fashion a peace of freedom and plenty or shall we face atomic war and the end of civilization? It is this generation that must prove to the world that man is not obsolete.

"This day I set before you life and death," said the sages of old.

Let us choose life.

Railroad and Coal Strikes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. HOOK

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me on June 1, 1946:

Friends in the Twelfth District, I am speaking to you from Ironwood. I had hoped to be able to visit all of the counties of the district during this trip but that has now become impossible. I must return to Washington to attend to urgent legislative business.

All of you are well aware of the crisis that arose last week as a consequence of the railroad strike, and of the critical situation brought about by the stoppage in the Nation's coal mines. Not one of you has been unaffected by these two labor disputes in one way or another. Some of you may have suffered serious inconvenience or hardship because of these two labor disputes.

A lot of angry, injudicious words have been spoken about the railroad strike and the coal strike. I agree and concur in deploring these two strikes. I do not, however, agree with the remedies that have been proposed in the same atmosphere of angry, injudicious debate in Congress.

Certainly the public interest has been jeopardized by the fact of the strikes in the mines and on the railroads. Certainly it was, and remains necessary to avoid such strikes so vitally involving the public interest. A formula must be found whereby labor's rights can be protected, its wrongs redressed through the exercise of those rights, and at the same time the Nation's health and general economic welfare maintained and preserved.

The emergency strike legislation offered by the President of the United States does not contain such a formula. I was not in Washington to attend the extraordinary session of Congress when the President proposed his so-called emergency bill. I had left the city before it was known that he planned to take such a serious step, and was unable to return in time to vote on the bill. I do not hesitate to say without equivocaton that, had I been there, I would have voted against the bill. I would have registered the most vigorous protest I could manifest against this hasty, ill-advised, hysterical departure from constitutional law.

I was shocked to learn that the House of Representatives, presumably a deliberative legislative body, had suspended its rules and endorsed, without change and almost without comment, the most drastic legislation to come before it in half a century.

In the flush of angry resentment against the railroad workers, a great many, perhaps even a majority of American citizens applauded this action of the President and its endorsement by the House of Representatives. Sober reflection now has come to the rescue of reason. The American people are jealous of their constitutional prerogatives. They will not abandon them—even in the name of emergency—nor countenance their abandonment by the Government.

The serious implications of the drafting of labor against its will, the confiscation of profits from business, and the rejection of basic civil rights now becomes apparent. The clear and frightening parallel between the proposed measures and the techniques developed in European countries in the name of national emergency and the public interest have dampened the ardor of even labor baiters and labor haters for punitive action. The debate in the Senate—the bipartisan opposition to the bill—is a good omen for the preservation of the American system of constitutional government.

I predict that when the emergency bill comes back before the House of Representatives the men and women there who voted for it there will reject it. It is my earnest hope that the President will reconsider his action and blot out this unfortunate stain on his record of progressive, liberal, and democratic action.

There is no denying by sober realists that a crisis has arisen in the collective-bargaining processes since the end of the war. That such a crisis was brewing was apparent to all those who are seriously interested in the preservation of good relations between labor and management. The makings of the crisis were there long before John L. Lewis called his miners out of the pits, or the railroad men left their engines in the roundhouses.

Nothing that has been proposed as a legislative remedy for the labor disputes of the past several months goes to the heart of the matter. Neither the President's bill, nor the Case bill, adopted by both Houses of Congress would prevent a recurrence of the kind of near paralysis of the national economy that the two strikes caused.

The Congress has now adopted the Case bill, not as emergency legislation but as permanent labor legislation. Let us take a look at the bill adopted, in the heat of anger and hysteria, and judge whether the congressional majority was addressing itself to the realities of the situation, or whether it was responding to a vindictive demand by antilabor elements to "do something—no matter what—just do something." Well, they've done something all right. Let's take a look at what they have done.

The Case bill provides for a cooling-off period of 60 days during which unions could not strike, failure to comply carrying a penalty of forfeiture of all rights under the National Labor Relations Act. We saw the futility of such cooling-off periods in the operation of the Smith-Connally Act. Increasing the period from 30 to 60 days in which labor's constitutional right to strike is withheld is certainly not conducive to labor peace.

The Case bill calls for the creation of a Federal Mediation Board whose responsibility it would be to assist in settling labor disputes. This Board would absorb functions now performed by the Conciliation Service. Certainly peaceful mediation of labor disputes is desirable and should be promoted in every way possible. We have had mediation through Government agencies and through private individuals accepted by both labor and management for many years. The Railway Mediation Board, so long pointed to as a model for the handling of labor disputes, is essentially the same as the Board set up in the Case bill. All well and good—being for mediation is like being for the protection of American womanhood—everyone's for it. But it does not in any way improve on the facilities for mediation already available for both the railroad and the coal disputes. Nor for any strike situation where there develop apparently irreconcilable differences between labor and management.

Beyond this the Case bill also proposes the creation of an emergency commission to be appointed by the President when the Mediation Board is unable to effect a settlement in an industry where a work stoppage would mean a substantial interruption to a vital public service. These commissions would investigate the dispute and make recommendations to the President on wages, hours, and working conditions.

There is nothing new in this suggested procedure. The President has been following almost precisely this pattern since VJ-day. He has named several commissions of distinguished citizens to make investigations and recommendations on wage disputes. In this connection, I think it is important to remember that in almost every instance where such a Presidential board or commission made recommendations as to wage increases the recommendations were rejected, not by labor, but by management; and it was against management's refusal to accept the recommendations that the unions struck.

Here again you have a reiteration of a proposal already possible under existing laws, and commendable enough in itself, but without bearing on the real issue, and without effectiveness to prevent major strikes.

In addition the Case bill, as passed by Congress excludes supervisory employees from the protection of the National Labor Relations Act, although they are left free to join unions. What this discriminatory clause, running counter to decision of the Supreme Court, will do to promote collective bargaining I do not know.

There are other provisions in the Case bill. One ostensibly aimed at racketeering, already amply guarded against by State and local laws. Another providing for joint union-management control of health and welfare funds. This by the way, will do much more to promote labor strife than to prevent it in view of the great many existing health and welfare funds operated by unions which must, after the expiration of present contracts, be jointly operated, whether management wants a hand in them or not.

Many of these programs have been in existence for years and have operated to the entire satisfaction of both labor and management. This provision is obviously vindictive, aimed directly at the coal miners, whose demand for a health and welfare fund is the only such demand which has occasioned a major strike. Whatever you may think of the manner in which John L. Lewis has presented this demand, or the manner in which he has supported the demand with the strike weapon, you cannot accept this punitive legislation, directed at one man, but directly affecting millions of American workers and employers.

The Case bill further authorizes suits in the Federal courts against violators of collective-bargaining contracts and outlaws the use of secondary boycotts. These two provisions are clearly designed to penalize and restrict labor unions, thereby again promoting labor strife. Not one major strike since VJ-day has resulted from the violation of terms of a contract, despite allegations to the contrary, the record will demonstrate that strikes result from the attempt to write new contracts after the old ones have expired. I do not believe any serious charge of irresponsibility can be leveled at labor for failure to live up to its agreements. The provision against secondary boycotts also has no relationship to the problem of preventing strikes or of promoting genuine collective bargaining. I can recall no serious strike in this period resulting from use of the secondary boycott.

I have briefly run through the major provisions of the Case bill, debated and passed by Congress during the gravest labor crisis this country has faced since before the passage of the National Labor Relations Act, to emphasize my contention that this bill does not approach the problem of the breakdown of collective bargaining which has led to the several serious strikes in major industries since the end of the war.

The Case bill was born of the unhappy union of reaction and hysteria. Its purposes are not to promote peaceful labor relations but to curb labor. It takes as a main premise that labor has been at fault in every strike situation that has developed. Its aim and its effect will be to seriously restrict, if not destroy, labor's rights under the National Labor Relations Act and the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunction Act.

It is 9 months since the end of the war. We are still faltering and fumbling with the reconversion program. We cannot afford, as a democratic Nation, to continue this course of indecision and inaction, dictated by day-to-day expediency. We stand in danger not only of losing the fight for an economy of full production and full employment, but of losing our democratic rights in that defeat.

I do not now have a rabbit to pull out of my hat. I do not have the answers to the problem so dramatically pointed up by the railroad and coal strikes. I don't know how any man or group of men could have found the answer in the atmosphere of angry recrimination which has marked the debates both in the House and the Senate, whenever labor legislation has come up since VJ-day. I do not believe any off-hand answer can be found.

Several months ago, shortly after the end of the war, I suggested that an investigation be made into the cause of strikes. I suggested that the Congress endeavor to find out—before it was too late—why the men who had stayed on the job, who had done an outstandingly patriotic job of production and maintenance during the war, felt it necessary to strike after the war was over.

At the time I made my proposal for such an investigation there was no strike involving the public interest such as the coal and railroad strikes; but I felt that such an investigation should be made before a national emergency did arise. My suggestion was voted down in the Labor Committee of the House. A slim majority of that committee decided that no investigation was necessary.

Just before I left Washington, I offered that same proposal to the House Committee on Labor. This time it was accepted. A committee of seven men has been appointed to try to find out the basic causes of the strikes—to find out what the workers' grievances and demands are—and also to find out why management in so many instances prefers a shut-down of production to meeting those demands or redressing the grievances. When Congress has these facts before it, it can legislate, if legislation is then found to be necessary, in the light of reason and reality.

I have been asked to serve on this investigating committee. I have accepted the commission with enthusiasm because I feel so strongly that without the facts before us, Congress cannot fulfill its obligation to the people of the country to meet the present crisis with intelligent action.

It is for this reason, and to take part in final action on legislation still before Congress—and I am sure that the last word has not been said on the Case bill—that I must return to Washington and forgo a further trip through the district.

The Flag

REMARKS

HON. JOSEPH CLARK BALDWIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. BALDWIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to my attention that the American flag which flew over the Capitol when we declared war on Germany and Italy and also on Japan has flown over all the capitals of our enemies, carried there by our troops, and is now in Japan in the hands of our forces there. I am not quarreling with that fact, but I think it should be brought to the attention of the House so that in due time that flag may be returned to this Capitol. In my opinion, it would be wise to have it shown in the rotunda or some other suitable place so that our people can see what has become of one of the most historic flags in history.

Mr. Speaker, I include the following poem in connection with this flag:

THE FLAG

The identical flag that, uniquely, alone,
From our Capitol dome was unfurled,
When we entered the war, methinks, ought to be known
As the victory flag of the world—
This same flag, whose rare history had just begun,
Eisenhower flew over Algiers,
In north Africa, where he triumphantly won
His campaign, and the praise of his peers.

This world-victory banner that first was unfurled
From the base of our Capitol dome,
In the peace-loving heart of the great western world,
Next, in triumph, was flown over Rome,
Liberating Italians who, hopelessly, by
Mussolini had long been enslaved,
To walk out, as freemen, under heaven's clear sky,
Where their own flag of freedom once waved.

Over ruined Berlin this world victory flag
Was unfurled upon Germany's sod,
While her own, in defeat, a contemptible rag,
In the dust, lay, forgotten of God.
May the Stars and the Stripes, under God, never cease,
Wheresoever Old Glory's unfurled,
To be heralded as the defender of peace,
The true victory flag of the world.

This world victory banner flew over the great Battle steamer, Missouri, the scene
Of the Japan surrender, while she lay in wait
In the sheltering harbor between
The Pacific's wide wastes and the shores of Japan—
Over Tokyo then 'twas unfurled,
Where, with bombing of peaceful Pearl Harbor, began
Her intended conquest of the world.

Mussolini's conquest ended in his defeat,
Hitler's hell-devised plans all fell thru,
Tojo, Japanese lord, in spite of his deceit,
Failed to see his debased dream come true—
They led Italy, Germany, yea, and Japan
To invade peaceful lands, without cause,
And, that world-wide conquests might be theirs, they began
To outlaw international laws.

Our own United States, 'neath the Stripes and the Stars,
That flew from her own Capitol Dome,
Joined with England and Russia, to end all world wars—
And, since this flag o'er Algiers and Rome
And Berlin, and the steamer Missouri, was flown,
Ere o'er Tokyo it was unfurled,
It should be, by all nations, respected and known
As the Victory Flag of the World.

Denazified Germany Leaderless, Adding to United States Job, Bellamy Says

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the fifth in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called A Trip Through Hell, and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

From the lowest private to the highest general in the American occupied zone there is evident a stern resolve that the Nazis shall never be able to wage war again.

This resolve is implemented by the policy of the so-called denazification, a phrase whose author is unknown, but which expresses as well as anything could the processes by which former Nazis are detached from positions of honor in the public service and also from supervisory and managerial positions in industry and commerce.

I have not been able to get any accurate figures as to the number of Nazis actually turned out of their jobs, but I have been told that it would run at least 100,000 in the American zone. This may be wide of the mark, however, because the process is continuous.

One of the results of this necessary purging, and it is vital and necessary unless we are to have another war with Germany, has been unfortunate, however, in that, to put the matter bluntly, all the leadership, all the drive, all the imagination in Germany was pretty much in the Nazi party. The result is that after a community has been pretty well purged of Nazis, the bad ones sent to a stockade for screening to determine those who have actually committed specific crimes serious enough to cause them to be sent to Nuremberg and elsewhere for trial, there is a great void left in German leadership.

The late Gen. George S. Patton was conscious of this when he made the remark, which was widely criticized in America as being too soft on the Germans. He said, in effect, he thought the denazifying process had gone about far enough and could be easily overdone. He had in mind the quite obvious fact that in the British and French zones no such thorough-going purge had taken place. We do not know what the Russians have done, but they are practical people. What Patton saw was that we were not able to get any public officials for the German civil set-up under our military authority who would be aggressive enough, and that the same paralyzing ban lay all over industry and transport in Germany.

Make no mistake about the thorough adherence of the Germans as a whole to nazism. There were a few glorious exceptions, on the whole numbering some thousands, but they were a drop in the bucket compared to the "Heil Hitler" crowd. For the few who manfully fought the Nazis and were not entirely liquidated, the American authorities have reached into the former concentration camps and into the attics and cellers where the patriotic Germans were hiding out, and have brought these men forth and entrusted them with positions of honor in the new set-up of Germany. But they are mostly old men and tired men. The future leadership of Germany certainly does not lie in them.

Inasmuch as the future leadership of Germany will not be permitted to fall into the hands of the former storm troopers and the Nazis, the result is pretty obvious. There is no leadership in Germany. There cannot be for another generation, at least, which is another way of saying that America faces a long occupational job in Germany before Germany can ever stand on her own feet again.

I say America faces a long occupational job in Germany. She does if she stands by her commitments to guarantee the peace of the world. If she takes another run-out powder as she did after the First World War, we might as well all prepare for a thoroughly communistic Europe.

And that is where the rub comes. Will America stand for this long, nasty policing job? It involves us in duties which are foreign to our generous natures. Have we got enough iron in our blood to last it out? That is the question. And the answer is by no means certain at present.

When one talks to able military officers in Germany and hears the sickening story of the dismantling of the Army, the constant change in personnel, the deterioration in quality of troops and officers due to the fact that the best are being demobilized, one feels a little doubtful about the future of the world.

NO LOOPHOLE

The result of General Patton's remark was the issuance by General Eisenhower of a rule called Law Eight, which really did the business on denazification. It left no loophole for the escaping Nazi. It provided for the most searching inquiry into every German's past. It provided for the turning over of this job to the German civil government set up throughout Germany under our military commanders.

Under law eight it is ordained that Nazis turned out of positions of trust and consequence, must earn their living by the sweat of their brows, at hard labor. The rule in Germany is pretty simple. No work, no eat. Such a rule, if applied in America, would certainly change the strike picture, but however one is opposed to strikes, he could hardly desire to eliminate them by going Nazi.

Now this is all very well from our point of view, but from the point of view of the German it is not so pleasant, because most of the German civil authority set-ups are immediately put down as Quislings by their fellow Germans, and although at present none has dared to use the word openly for fear of punishment, it is only natural that this should be so. If the American Army were to withdraw tomorrow there would be a very complete liquidation of all of the Germans who have so far been raised to civil authority under our aegis.

One of the most difficult problems in denazification is in connection with the professions of law, teaching, and the church, by which I mean, quite frankly, the Protestant Church.

In Germany as well as in Austria there is now a great shortage of competent prosecutors and judges because nearly all the able ones in the sense of having knowledge of the law were Nazis. Similarly with teaching. The teaching profession, we are told, was probably more highly infused with Naziism than any other profession in Germany. Thousands of them have been separated from their jobs. Hitler made a special effort to capture the imagination of the teachers, realizing their decisive influence in molding the minds of the youth of Germany. In this he was most successful.

The result has been that the reopened schools are very short of teachers at present. Classes in some parts of Germany run as high as 156 pupils per room. The teachers are mostly old men. There have never been very many women teachers in Germany, because the Germans thought that women should mostly stay at home and have babies, and that only a man was capable of instructing his fellows. Since the denazification began more women have been introduced into schools, and this will probably have a good effect in humanizing the school population.

NEW TEXTBOOKS PREPARED

The textbook problem is terrific, too. All the Nazi textbooks glorified the state and the state above the individual, and they had to be eliminated. The expedient was tried of using some of the old pre-Hitler textbooks, but it was found that they were almost as much inoculated with the glory of the state as were the Nazi books. Hence the occupying forces were under the necessity of preparing new textbooks which they got ready for the opening of schools last October, and the school textbook shortage, while still existing, is not anywhere near as acute as it was. Texts are available in fairly good quantity up to the eighth grade, but still very short in the high schools and uinversities, some of which have been reopened under new management, as the American phrase is.

The Protestant Church, that is, the state church, the Evangelical Lutheran, was badly tainted with nazism and I, as a Protestant, am deeply ashamed to say this. Of course, there were exceptions, but I am speaking about the general run of all Protestant ministers. They are mostly now shoveling coal and clearing rubble, as they have been removed from any spiritual contact with their flocks.

There is no doubt whatever about the absolute fundamental necessity of complete denazification, but the alternative, as I have said, is the destruction of leadership in Germany. We have chosen one horn of the dilemma, the only possible one, and we must not cry about the results. No one could go through the present stockades which we visited, one at Dachau, the horror camp, and one in Salzburg, and look into the faces of those physically fit, malignant young storm troopers and Hitler youth without realizing that if they were turned loose they would immediately seize control of Germany again and we should be in for it.

OPA—Legalized Chaos

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a noted newspaperman, David Lawrence, has correctly analyzed the new OPA bill and, as part of my remarks, I am extending his article at this point:

NEW OPA BILL SEEN AS WORSE THAN FIRST—DEMOCRATIC PARTY IN CONGRESS, NOT TRUMAN, MAY PAY PENALTY

(By David Lawrence)

The OPA bill now being considered by Congress in final form is worse than the one President Truman vetoed. It is worse for industry, worse for consumers, and worse for the country as a whole.

The President logically should veto it. The reasons he gave before apply even more so from his viewpoint to the pending measure. A resolution to continue rent control is all that is really needed. The country would make far better progress if the OPA legislation, with the exception of rent control, were killed altogether.

Under the new measure, many of the food products which enter into the cost of living are to come from under controls before the end of the year. This means the workers will become restless and demand wage increases to meet the costs of living, and strikes will ensue.

TO SLOW PRODUCTION

As for industry, it will suffer because the formula puts profit control into the hands of the OPA with instructions virtually to squeeze the increased costs out of current profits. This will mean that some businesses will not be able to see reasonable profits ahead and this will slow up production. General rules, applying equally to high- and low-cost producers, means demoralization of particular industries.

Unless there is a free market and an incentive to produce goods, the United States cannot have its postwar recovery. Unless the cost of living is kept down by the laws of supply and demand, wages will remain unstabilized.

Politically, of course, the Republicans gain by the confusion. The administration naturally will wish the country to believe that it achieved something by the veto and by the rewriting of the legislation. The administration, however, will ensnare itself by that strategy. For if the OPA bill is hailed as better than its predecessor, the Nation will assume that the President won out and hence the cost of living should be kept down, whereas, under the measure, it really cannot be.

SPIRAL SET UP

Actually, the Nation has not been fully informed on the many increases in prices which the OPA had to sanction on account of wage increases early this year. All this was camouflaged in the hope of getting a renewal of OPA authority and to hide the effects of the President's policy in encouraging an 18-cent-an-hour increase in wages. The pattern set by Mr. Truman was copied widely in industry, irrespective of the merit of the increase in individual categories. As a consequence, the inflationary spiral set in motion by the President had to be met by granting increases through the OPA.

The idea that wage costs can rise but prices cannot is the doctrine of those who want to sabotage the private-enterprise system and encourage state socialism or communism. Many labor union leaders who want to take over the management of industry with councils such as the Soviet Union uses are fighting price increases and contending the wage costs can go up just the same.

The OPA controversy has created some fallacious impressions. Consumers have been led to believe that Congress is anxious to send upward the cost of living. Actually, Congress has been trying to get rid of controls that operate against increases in production and a balance of supply and demand.

GIVES GOP AN ARGUMENT

It will be noted that Senator TAFT, Republican leader, signed the conference report. He has always insisted that some price control was better than none. He fought to get for industry a chance to apply prices to cover costs, but he did not succeed. The formula is such that industry is bound to be injured.

But Senator TAFT and the other Republicans can argue next autumn that Mr. Truman got his price-control measure and prices are still high and goods are still short and black markets still flourish. The political strategy of the Republicans is understandable. They want Mr. Truman to shoulder the blame for the Nation's economy under an extended OPA. But Mr. Truman isn't up for renomination until 1948, and meanwhile the country will have to voice its protest in other ways.

The chances are that the Democratic Party in Congress will be hurt most by Mr. Truman's failure to accept the advice of his own leaders a month ago and sign the bill that he vetoed. The economic loss of the last month to the Nation as a whole is not offset by any appreciable gains to be derived from the new OPA bill. Mr. Truman would be well advised to veto the bill and carry the issue to the country in the coming campaign. It's self-defense politics for him.

Congressman Bill Stevenson Reports From Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, spontaneous movements are developing throughout the United States to give force to the fact that old-fashioned American patriotism, reverence for the Constitution, and support of the American way of life are rapidly making their reawakened influence felt as an offset to the growing arrogance and power of certain groups in this country. Apparently Sidney Hillman's announcement that his CIO-PAC (Political Action Committee) was prepared to spend millions to "elect its friends" has brought about the revival of pro-American activity on the part of people in all walks of life. The people have accepted the challenge hurled at them by so-called "liberals" and by "radical groups" in the United States.

Members of Congress from all States are reporting that farmers, businessmen, professional men, clerks, workmen, veterans, and substantial Americans of all occupations are joining hands to meet the challenge of these self-proclaimed "liberals" who have announced their program to spend millions of dollars to elect public officials who will go along with them."

CIO-PAC ENDORSES STEVENSON'S OPPONENT FOR CONGRESS

The Wisconsin CIO News has announced in its columns the candidacy of my opponent. In its announcement the CIO News states:

Fred F. Miller will run against William Stevenson in the Republican primaries. Mr. Miller has been endorsed by the PAC.

The CIO-PAC (Political Action Committee) will consider the nomination of my opponent at the primary election a distinct CIO-PAC victory!

STEVENSON BILL PROVIDES RESEARCH FOR CURE OF "INCURABLE" DISEASES

Good government is concerned with the greatest good for the greatest number. I have always stood for the highest precepts of government for the benefit of all. I am concerned with the fate of millions of our people who are doomed to mental and physical torture and death due to so-called incurable diseases. With that in mind I have sponsored H. R. 5715 to enlist the full development of the Nation's scientific and medical resources to conduct and support research to find the cure for cancer, infantile paralysis, rheumatic fever, rheumatic heart disease, Bright's disease, diabetes, arthritis, brain fever, anemia, arteriosclerosis, and other so-called incurable diseases that have plagued the human race for ages.

To discover the cure for one or more of these diseases will mean the alleviation of untold mental and physical suffering. Dr. Spencer, Chief of the National Cancer Institute, says:

A cure for cancer would be the greatest medical news in all history.

Dr. Rutstein, health commissioner of New York, says:

Rheumatic fever and rheumatic heart disease is the commonest cause of death of children and young people between the ages of 5 and 24. These diseases deserve concentrated scientific effort to combat them.

We in Wisconsin know how terrifying the scourge of infantile paralysis has been in our State, leaving death and lifelong suffering in its wake. Given time and money and a concentration of scientific and medical brains, all these so-called incurable diseases can be cured. That is the purpose of the Stevenson antidisease bill. My bill has received the endorsement of the Department of Health of the City of New York, the Health Department of Boston, the American Heart Society and the department of cardiology of the Wisconsin State General Hospital. My bill has also been endorsed by the American Legion of my district, by various civic clubs, insurance companies, farmers' organizations, and women's clubs.

Congressman PRIEST, of Tennessee, chairman of the Public Health Subcommittee, has written me regarding the Stevenson antidisease bill, as follows:

DEAR BILL: I have been very much interested in your antidisease bill, which as you know was referred to the Public Health Subcommittee, of which I am chairman. Allow me to express my appreciation to you for your action in introducing a bill of this nature. Reading the provisions of the bill I find them to be well drafted and certainly reasonable. I trust there will not be any delay in reporting the bill to the House for action. Certainly such a constructive piece of legislation deserves early and favorable consideration.

This legislation should be passed. Human beings must not be allowed to die without concerted effort on the part of science, medicine, brains, and money to discover a cure for all degenerative diseases.

Price-Control Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. BARRETT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. BARRETT of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter addressed to me by Mr. Chester Bowles, former Director of the Office of Economic Stabilization, in which he expresses appreciation for my continued efforts to enact price-control legislation to be effective for another year without substantial change from the previous Price Control Act.

OFFICE OF ECONOMIC STABILIZATION,
Washington, D. C., July 10, 1946.
The Honorable WILLIAM A. BARRETT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BARRETT: As I leave Washington, I do want you to know how much I appreciate all you've done to support the stabilization program and me personally during the three rather tough years I have been down here. A great part of the satisfaction that I've gotten out of what we have been able to accomplish so far comes from the knowledge that a few people like you have gone down the line so consistently for us.

I am sure there have never been times when some of the things that we had to do in order to hold prices and rents generally on even keel seemed to work a hardship on somebody. The way you have continued, however, to base your judgment on the basic issues involved has been tremendously encouraging to me.

Naturally, I wish that we could have avoided all the strain of the last hectic days before the bill expired. I do, however, greatly respect the President for his courage in vetoing the bill when it was clearly demonstrated that it was worse than no bill at all.

Although the last 3 years have not been easy ones, my real thought in resigning at this time was that I could thereby help to take personalities out of the picture and force a decision on the real merits of price control. I am still tremendously hopeful that a way will be found to get the train back on the track. It seems to me that if we can hold prices and rents reasonably stable during the fall months, we have a good chance for the continued cooperation between labor and management which is so imperative if we are to get over the production hump by Christmas.

Many, many thanks for sticking with us during this long, tough struggle. I am sure the cause has been, and still is, of vital importance to us all. Without your help in the House, I am sure we could never have been so far along the road.

Sincerely,

CHESTER BOWLES.

Is John Bull To Be the Administrator of the World OPA?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REID F. MURRAY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, while innumerable hours and days are spent in discussing the domestic OPA, sufficient attention has not been given to the world OPA.

The world OPA may not be able to control prices at the retail level, but it will control the price at the wholesale level. Here are a few questions for the farmers, the factory workers, and the businessmen of America to consider:

First. Does not John Bull control the world's wool market at this time? Is not the United States sheep industry in a demoralized condition?

Second. Is not John Bull about ready to control the wheat of the world? If he has the Canadian and Australian wheat market under control, can he not just about control the United States market price of wheat and make the United States price the same as the world price?

Third. Does not John Bull try to control the beef market? Is not John Bull waiting for the duty reductions of the World Economic Conference which has been postponed until after the elections?

Fourth. Did not Uncle Sam recently purchase over a million pounds of butter from John Bull at 44 cents per pound, butter which he purchased from New Zealand for 32 cents per pound and which he at first tried to sell the United States for 55 cents per pound? If the duty is reduced to 7 cents per pound, can you not visualize 32-cent and 7-cent butter in the offing? Did not our domestic OPA, contrary to law, provide that imported Swiss cheese could have a 12¾ cents per pound higher ceiling than the domestically produced product?

BUTTER

London and New York are the two important butter markets. (1) Before the war about 40 percent of the milk produced in the United States was converted into butter, and (2) during the war domestic per capita consumption of butter has been drastically reduced and the consumption of butter substitutes promoted. Do you realize the influence that butter prices can and will have on milk, cheese, evaporated milk, and powdered milk produced in the United States?

John Bull surely will be administrator of the world OPA and at the wholesale level and will be telling the American people what they are to pay for their food and the American farmer what he gets for his product as well.

The following facts have been compiled from official Government records:

Non-British butter pays a duty of 3.3 cents per pound when entering the United Kingdom. Butter from British countries enters free.

When the difference between the wholesale price of butter in New York and that in London amounts to the effective duty the New York market becomes an attractive market for foreign butter.

Under the present duty the price differential must be close to 14 cents for New Zealand, and 10.7 for, say, Denmark to cause New York to be an attractive market. If the duty was reduced to 7 cents the price differential between the two markets would have to be about 7 cents for New Zealand, about 3.5 cents for Denmark to cause New York to be an attractive market. No allowance is made for transportation costs.

The following tabulation shows the number of months in the 17 years from 1922 to 1938, inclusive that the price differential between the New York and London markets for butter equaled or exceeded 3.5, 7, and 14 cents per pound.

Year	Rate of duty per pound	Number of months the price of butter in New York equaled or exceeded that in London by—
		3.5 cents per pound	7 cents per pound	14 cents per pound
1922	6 and 8 cents	6	5	1
1923	8 cents	12	10	1
1924	do	6	5	0
1925	do	7	3	0
1926	8 and 12 cents	10	6	2
1927	12 cents	12	10	4
1928	do	12	10	1
1929	do	11	6	0
1930	12 and 14 cents	10	7	1
1931	14 cents	6	4	1
1932	do	7	4	0
1933	do	10	5	0
1934	do	12	11	1
1935	do	10	7	5
1936	do	12	10	1
1937	do	12	8	2
1938	do	5	1	0

From the above, one can see the effects that the duty reduction on butter can have on the American market. This is especially significant when one realizes the seasonal differences between countries. It has been said that one never misses the water until the well runs dry. If some forward thinking is not done at once, we can expect to see many milk wells running dry. States like Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming and other Western States that are affected by so many crops and products like sheep, beef, dairy products, wheat, and sugar, most assuredly have a great interest in these shadows of things to come under the New Deal if it is kept in power.

In 1942 there were 20,081,000 pounds of butter imported into the United States with a total import value of $3,250,000. This represents a price at the point of origin of less than 16¼ cents per pound. With the 14 cents per pound present duty, to say nothing about the proposed 7 cents per pound duty, does not this import factor register with everyone interested in the future of the dairy business?

The OPA has always contended that butterfat over 55 cents per pound converted into butter would cause inflation. But the fact that butterfat can be sold in a bottle of milk for $2 per pound or over is another reason why the butter people must continue to be vigilant. Butter is the foundation of the dairy business and its price largely determines the price of other dairy products.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL WILSON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, due to the fact that I have just recently been called upon to vote on the three and three-quarter billion dollar loan to Britain, which legislation I opposed, I wish to include as a part of my remarks a table showing how that increased indebtedness, along with our present national debt, affects the people of my congressional district. A careful analysis of the figures reveals the startling fact that the Ninth District's share of the national debt already stands at a figure approximately four times greater than the assessed valuation of all real estate in my district. My congressional district's share of the national debt is shown to be $482,636,000, while the assessed valuation of all real estate is $125,117,976. The British loan adds an additional mortgage on my people's future income to the tune of $6,757,044.

The table follows:

County	Population 1940	Assessed valuation (real estate)	County's share of British loan	County's share of national debt	Number of times greater national debt is than assessed valuation of real estate

Net Working Capital Position of New Haven Railroad

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH E. TALBOT
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Speaker, it is my desire to submit a statement made by Howard S. Palmer, trustee and president of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., before Division 2 of the Interstate Commerce Commission in Chicago on July 22, 1946.

This information was not available in time for the debate on the Reed bill, H. R. 5924 held earlier this week, but I think it should fully answer and explain the arguments made by the proponents of the bill, and it shows just exactly the condition and net working capital position of the New Haven Railroad at the present time.

The statement follows:

I understand there has been some thought that the railroads, particularly some of the carriers in reorganization, are in very fine shape so far as net working capital is concerned, and that such net working capital could and should be used to pay off back interest and should be used to offset future deficits from operation. So far as the New Haven is concerned I would like to make a statement as to these suggestions.

Our latest balance sheet information filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission is as of May 31, 1946, and this shows the net working capital position as follows:

Current assets (including materials and supplies, $8,916,538)	$79,325,571
Current liabilities	28,538,367
Net current assets as per books	50,787,204

The above current assets include the following:

Cash	$28,749,759
U. S. Treasury tax savings, notes due serially Sept. 1, 1946, to Sept. 1, 1948	30,268

Attention is called to the fact that the foregoing figures do not include many liabilities and reservations of cash, nor, in the case of carriers in reorganization proceedings, interest in default which is carried under deferred liabilities. In the case of carriers not under reorganization matured and unpaid interest would, of course, be carried under current liabilities.

The items which I have just mentioned reduced the net working capital as shown by the books from $50,787,204 to $5,743,209 and are specifically as follows:

Interest in default:
Interest on secured bonds	$17,497,208
Interest on other issues not secured	7,813,793
Total	25,311,001
Unpaid taxes on Old Colony and Boston & Providence Railroads, unpaid bond interest and taxes accrued on Boston Terminal Co. property, unpaid reorganization expenses allowed by court	8,646,994
Liability for loss and damage to freight, personal injury, damage to property	4,041,760
This gives a total of liabilities carried on the books as deferred liabilities and unadjusted credits in amount of	37,999,755

In addition there are other estimated liabilities not included on the books such as estimated reorganization expenses, interest on unpaid taxes of the Old Colony, Boston & Providence, and Boston Terminal Co., and possible deficiency assessments in connection with prior years' income taxes, amounting to a total of $7,044,240.

This gives a total of interest in default, liabilities carried as deferred, unadjusted credits and other liabilities not on the books of $45,043,995.

This amount deducted from the net working capital as reflected by the balance sheet would show the net amount remaining, as previously mentioned, of $5,743,209.

In addition to the foregoing there are certain cash reservations that must be made for capital improvements:

Reservations for capital improvements

Additions and betterments authorized in 1944 and 1945 but not completed	$4,000,000
Office building, New Haven, under construction	2,000,000
Passenger equipment, down payment	5,000,000
Freight equipment, down payment	1,600,000
Pullman sleeping car purchase, New Haven proportion	1,500,000
Total reservations for delayed capital improvements	14,100,000

After allowing for these cash reservations, it will be noted that our net working capital actually shows a net deficiency of $8,356,791. Of course, one big factor in this computation is the item of interest in default which would be taken care of to a large extent by the issue of new securities or new stock if the reorganization of the New Haven as presently approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Connecticut District Court is finally approved and allowed to go through. However, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in New York has rendered no decision upon the order of confirmation and, in addition, we are faced with the possibility of either of the so-called Reed or Wheeler bills being passed which might have the effect of taking the New Haven out of reorganization proceedings and turning the property back to the stockholders to allow them an opportunity to attempt to negotiate a better reorganization settlement.

If we could make our future plans upon the basis that the reorganization plan as it is now approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Connecticut District Court, including merger of the Old Colony and Boston & Providence Railroads, would be consummated, it would eliminate the item of $25,311,001 as an interest item, and would have the effect of changing the deficiency of $8,356,791 to a net working balance of $16,954,210.

This is, of course, a far different figure from the one of over $50,000,000 which is reflected by the balance sheet of the company as the net working capital position. With the present traffic situation and rising costs, it is our opinion that the company requires a liquid cash position of from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000.

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BROOKS HAYS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Daily News of July 26, 1946.

LA FOLLETTE-MONRONEY TRIUMPH

When history is written a few hundred years hence, of the rise and decline of the American Republic, the outstanding event of the Seventy-ninth Congresss, in our opinion, will be passage of the La Follette-Monroney bill.

This is the first legislation in our generation designed to recapture for the legislative branch of Government the power and responsibility outlined for it in the Constitution, which is our original charter of government.

Over the decades the authority and prestige of the law-making branch have been whittled away by the relentless encroachments of the ever-expanding executive department—so much so that even the power of the purse has been reduced to a figment of tradition.

The La Follette-Monroney bill, by stipulating for Members of Congress salaries and retirement more in line with what a free market offers for such talent, by setting up a more efficient committee system and providing more expert research and counsel for our lawmakers, and more effective budgetary controls, will prolong our years of self-government.

And the small additional costs should be saved many times over in reducing the billions wasted in the executive branch.

BOB LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin, and MIKE MONRONEY, of Oklahoma, have earned a great place in American history.

Antipollution Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM W. LINK
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. LINK. Mr. Speaker and Members of Congress, an antipollution bill, in my opinion, not only to stop further pollution in our streams but also to clean up polluted streams throughout our country is a very important piece of legislation. I have personally seen pollution at its worst, and I know that regardless of how badly polluted a stream or river has been that it can be cleaned up. As a boy I used to swim and fish in the Chicago River. As big industries settled along its banks and dumped sewage into the river, the stream in which I swam and fished, within a period of a few short years, became so polluted that instead of swimming in it we used to throw sticks into the river and watch them stand up in the muck on the surface.

Today that river is considerably cleaner—but at a terrific cost. It took but a few short years to pollute the river so badly. It will require many more years to clean it up completely, and this will cost many millions of dollars more.

I am in favor of the antipollution bill, H. R. 6024, because it has teeth in it, in that it makes the Federal Government a partner. We, in Chicago, have a friendly State next to us, and yet, when a strong southwest wind blows the Calumet River flows into Lake Michigan and barrels of chlorine must be dumped into the lake to make the water safe to drink. State rights are good in some instances, but this should be a Federal right, for we will never clean pollution out of streams, and keep them clean, unless the Federal Government, with its over-all authority, will be the watchdog.

I am definitely in favor of this antipollution bill and sincerely hope that it will be passed by the House. I am sorry that it will not be acted upon at this session, but I sincerely hope that when the new Congress assembles in 1947 this bill will be among the first to be acted upon.

Need for Constructive Statesmanship in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL
OF DELAWARE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, July 26 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD excerpts from an address delivered by Hon. Louis Johnson before the Thomas Jefferson Club of Wood County, at Parkersburg, W. Va., on April 13, 1946.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There is greater need for constructive statesmanship in Washington now than ever before. Some mistakes have to be rectified at once. Other measures are urgently needed.

First, the country needs a real system of national defense. An honest system which tends to replace a system of planned disintegration. The War Department did an excellent job in organizing in two years' time the greatest Army the world has ever seen. I may be pardoned for saying that this was possible in part because some of us in the War Department had worked for years setting up plans to produce weapons and munitions, to draft a democratic Army and to train that Army in national defense. The work of making ready for war and of fighting was well done. Unfortunately the War Department and some of the senior officers did not realize that war is not finished when the enemy surrenders. It is finished only when peace is made, and order reestablished, and provision was not made for that.

The system of demobilization was not well thought out. Actually the method of demobilizing by individuals on the plan of "points" overnight reduced an Army which had been a splendid organization into an aggregation of individuals looking for the quickest way home. We now know that this was not the right system and we are paying a diplomatic price for it. Under that system an air squadron would suddenly find itself without pilots, or a tropical base without malaria control officers, or a tank corps without gunners, or a regiment without officers.

Even where we had direct obligations, as in occupied Germany, the officers charged with military government and trained for that purpose were demobilized irrespective of the damage it did to our political organizations in Germany and Austria. This needs to be radically overhauled.

Further, we must have a remobilization plan necessary in case of need. In two wars we have done well because between us and our enemy there was a screen of intermediate countries and it took our enemy a couple of years to fight through these countries. Germany had to go through France, Belgium, Holland, and England before she could effectively attack us, and this gave us a couple of years to get ready after the danger was clear.

But the next war will not work that way. Our enemy wherever he is will be able to send planes, paratroopers, bombs, and perhaps rockets at the drop of a hat, and we have to be prepared to stop it at the drop of a hat. Instead of recklessly sacrificing organization and material, we ought to be maintaining the necessary units and supply arrangements, and keep in practice on mobilization so that we can act quickly if occasion arises.

Even if the United Nations, which I wholly and heartily support, avoids threat of war, we still have military obligations as a member of the United Nations. We have to stand ready to contribute to policing the world if there is threat of war anywhere. We must be ready to fulfill those obligations, as we are not at present. For that reason, capable representation in Congress is a top-flight defense necessity.

Second, we need a clear-cut constructive policy in connection with meeting the direct needs of the people of this country. Naturally I think first of veterans, many of whom are without houses, who are even having trouble in buying clothes. But the rest of the public is in much the same fix.

Now it is absurd to say that a country which a year ago could produce enough to munition most of the armies of the world and to supply a considerable amount of the civilian needs of the United States and of other countries cannot pull itself together sufficiently to build houses, manufacture clothes, make automobiles and other necessaries of American life. The men are here, and the materials are here and there is more money than we can find outlet for. It is nonsense to allow any combination of special interest groups to hold up needed civilian production. On principle, I dislike subsidies; but if subsidies are needed to keep our veterans and the rest of the public housed on an American standard, then I am in favor of doing what is necessary.

We cannot and must not go back to the policy of drift which prevailed after the crash in 1929. Then the country waited in vain for some leadership—a leadership it did not get until Franklin D. Roosevelt provided it in 1933. We need some of that leadership now, and some of it ought to come from the Senate of the United States.

Finally, if we are going to have an effective peace, we must have a perfectly clear-cut American foreign policy, supported by the Congress. At the close of world wars, when great areas are struggling for their very existence, huge rivalries are let loose. These do not correspond to the pledges we and every other country made when we issued the Atlantic Charter and signed the pact of the United Nations and formed the United Nations organization. We declared for a policy based not on diplomatic dickers or secret trades, but on principles and on the rights of peoples, and as evidence of our good faith we renounced all territorial ambitions. And yet, somehow, we seem to be back in the days of 1938–39 when we were leaping from crisis to crisis. I believe that the Congress of the United States is prepared to accept fully and whole-heartedly support a foreign policy based on principle and not on opportunism; and I think that is what the world wants and expects of us. It is also, in my judgment, the only way we can avoid getting into a groove which will mean a third world war now or later. This, I think, was what Mr. Cordell Hull meant when he called for a true revival of international law backed up by a world organization.

All of this means having men in the executive and legislative branches of the Government of the United States who can think clearly, who will seek out their differences, who are not afraid of special interest groups, and who have the courage to tell the truth to the American people, even though that truth may not always be agreeable. We are rapidly coming to the end of the talk stage in both domestic and foreign postwar reconstruction. The time is not far off when only results will count. You cannot keep order in a conquered country with an empty or rapidly changing roster roll. You cannot house veterans or anyone else with lobbyists' plans. You cannot produce enough goods to clothe and to feed the country or stop inflation if any special interest group holds up the works.

Our Republican friends, with some honorable exceptions, have stood mainly for a policy of doing nothing on the general theory apparently that production, like prosperity, was just around the corner. Plainly the job of getting all this off dead center is our responsibility, and I am glad to raise my voice in support of one of the men who is able, willing, and ready to meet that responsibility.

Just at this moment the Government of the United States is trustee of a huge economic and political problem, national and international, responsible for the safeguarding of the rights and exacting the corresponding duties of many millions of veterans and their families and many more millions of Americans. The tools for meeting the situation are in its hands if it chooses to use them and has the vision and courage to go ahead. Yet we are seeing those tools either laid aside or misused, while national, international, and local conditions, big and little, get steadily worse and pressures pile up on all sides. Senator KILGORE has admirably fulfilled his responsibilities in the past and he will go far in the future. He is a progressive, willing to meet the responsibilities which are piling up to huge proportions. For that reason I urge that he be returned as Senator from West Virginia, and I will do everything I can to help him both before and after his reelection.

In the March 11 issue of Life, in discussing the Senators who are up for reelection this year, the editors of Life said under Senator KILGORE's picture:

"KILGORE of West Virginia (Democrat) has risen in 6 years from an obscure county judge to a leading position among Senate New Dealers.

"He is the author of an unemployment compensation bill and helped write the new minimum wage bill. A student of military history and tactics, he has done hard work on the Military Affairs Committee and the Truman (now Mead) committee.

"Constituents at home think he has yet to prove himself on domestic affairs. He tends to pay too much attention to world and national affairs, too little to the small things that keep home folks happy.

"Opinion: One of the able Senators on the Democratic side."

While not so intended such comment as this reference to Senator KILGORE's interest in world and national affairs is highly unfair. I ask you, friend or critic of the Senator, what you would have the Senator from West Virginia do in time of war except to take care of the interests of these United States? Unless we repeal or change the Constitution of the United States, the Senate is the "custodian" of our foreign policy. A Senator, to serve well the people of his own State, must fulfill his duty on international as well as national affairs. Senator KILGORE measures up to the highest standards here. I have been told by both Democratic and Republican Senators, and by people high in Republican circles, that no one has come to the United States Senate who, in so short a space of time as Senator KILGORE has served, has made a better record of service to the Nation.

We, of West Virginia, are proud that he had the ability and integrity—and that they were so quickly recognized—that in the hour of the Nation's greatest crisis he adequately represented the State of West Virginia by first serving the interests of the people of the United States. We must reelect him. We owe that to his high record of service in these days of great crisis. The peace is not yet won.

With KILGORE as its senior Senator, West Virginia will march on in the tradition of Jefferson, Jackson, Woodrow Wilson, and Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. GWYNNE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. GWYNNE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with permission heretofore granted, I include in this extension of remarks a letter from Robert W. Green, of Mason City, Iowa. Mr. Green's letter is a brief and clear statement of the factors relating to price control, and I am in complete accord with the views he expresses so well.

MASON CITY, IOWA, July 14, 1946.
The Honorable JOHN W. GWYNNE,
United States Congressman from Iowa,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GWYNNE: I have never before communicated with any Congressman to express my opinion of any measure or to ask any personal favor. However, the situation which has arisen in regard to the OPA and its extension is too much for me to endure in complete silence. I therefore wish to inform the persons representing me in Washington of my opinion on the subject, for I know of no other practical method by which you could inform yourself of my opinion. I would like to say now that the opinion I express is shared by my family and many of my friends; but they, unfortunately, like so many good Americans, just never find time to write their Congressmen to express an opinion.

My stand is briefly this:

1. I favor a much modified OPA. Such an organization should control prices only on those necessities whose demand promises to exceed supply for a long time—at least a year or longer.

2. If a choice must be made between the OPA as it has been or no OPA at all, I much prefer to take my chances on an open competitive market as opposed to the administration's ponderous controls of all economic activity. I choose no OPA at all.

Allow me, before proceeding, to express my appreciation of your reply to the Clear Lake Chamber of Commerce. It has been so rarely that the administration of the past 14 years would trust a group of private citizens (unless they were a bloc or labor union of some sort) that to see you accept the pledge of the Clear Lake businessmen is a reassuring thing indeed. I am sure the whole Nation will fare better when some of this antagonism between warring factions is replaced by a little mutual trust.

I am not a person of wealth, but a disabled veteran primarily dependent on a disability pension for my living. I am against the OPA as it was until June 30 because I feel that it will do a lot more harm than good for most people, especially if the problem is considered from a long-range point of view. If you wish to take the time to read why I feel as I do, I shall state as completely but briefly as possible my reasons for being against the OPA as it existed until June 30, 1946.

1. What is the chief inducement to increase production? Everyone admits the best way to avoid inflation is to increase production. You cannot get increased production if the incentive for production is removed; if manufacturers, businessmen, and farmers cannot produce and sell goods at a profit, they will (1) store the goods awaiting a price rise, or (2) not produce at all. The Government (in a system of free enterprise) is not a producing agent itself; it depends on others to produce goods. There are but two ways the Government can get producers to produce; they are (1) Insure that the Nation's economy is in such a state that the producer can produce at a profit, or (2) bribe the producer to produce—such bribes being termed "subsidies." The importance of economic incentive, or profit motive, cannot be overemphasized when you are trying to get production going. From whatever standpoint you study production, it is very obvious that you can't get the goods on the market unless the people involved are rewarded for their time and energy. The administration is well acquainted with the profit motive, or it wouldn't have been so busy passing out cost-plus contracts to everyone during the war when we all knew we had to have materials to use to fight, and we had to have the materials right away.

2. Will OPA work?

The proponents of OPA say, among other things, that the OPA will grant price increases as are necessary to allow producers a reasonable profit, but the business world is not a place where you can operate for 6 months at a loss while your applications for price increases are floundering in miles of red tape and your costs of production are steadily rising. The OPA has been caught time and time again fixing one price for a given article made by one concern, and fixing another price for the same article made of the same quality materials by another concern. If that policy is willful, it is quite damning enough in the eyes of any fair-minded person; if it is not a willful policy, it is just more evidence that the whole scheme of price control is utterly unworkable. No one agency, nor the whole Government put together, could keep an accurate tab on every different producer in the Nation, his different costs of production, and fix a fair price for them all. In a flexible system of free enterprise it is absolutely unworkable. Of course, those who have no taste for free enterprise will favor OPA.

During the war it was possible to freeze for the duration a number of commodity prices. But the war itself is over now, and all of us are faced with a fluid situation. If people are not free to adjust the prices of their goods and services to the changing conditions under which they must make a living, they risk every sort of hardship for only the minimum return. The economic situation in the United States today is changing far too fast for any Government agency to intelligently anticipate and competently fix the price of every item or service on the market.

3. Whom is the OPA protecting and against exactly what? During President's Truman's speech at the time he vetoed the OPA bill on which Mr. TAFT tacked the fatal amendment, the President referred again and again to the consumer, the producer, the landlord, the veteran, the laborer, the farmer, the manufacturer, the grocer, naming some as saints, some as villains. All these people are consumers; all these people are producers—either of goods or of services. Price control affects them all. Even landlords must buy groceries; and the farmer needs manufactured goods which the laborer helps produce.

Just what is the OPA preventing? Since June 30 there have been few soaring prices, but certainly more livestock has appeared for legal slaughter than at any time since the war ended. Recalling many meatless days not long past, I fail to appreciate the difference between having to pay more than one can afford for meat on one hand, or on the other hand not having any meat available at the ceiling price. We might as well have soaring inflation prices on goods as not to have any goods available at all. It is time for a change when people have to break the law to buy a loaf of bread, whatever its price may be.

And that is why I feel as I do about the OPA. I could fill a large volume with specific examples to support my stand, but the basic reasons behind my attitude are those I have already listed.

Thank you for your time and attention.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT W. GREEN.

Equal Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, July 26 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, at the request of Mrs. Elizabeth S. Magee, general secretary of the National Consumers' League, Cleveland, Ohio, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Equal Rights," published in the Washington Post of July 21, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EQUAL RIGHTS

Although the Senate failed to give the proposed equal-rights amendment the two-thirds majority required of both Houses before it can be submitted to the States, its advocates will undoubtedly continue the struggle to append it to the Constitution. The fact that both the Democratic and Republican Parties' platform indorsed the proposal and a majority vote for the amendment was recorded in the Senate shows that the issue is still a very live one. This misguided attempt to legislate equality between the sexes cannot, therefore, be dismissed as a quixotic campaign conducted by a few enthusiastic advocates of women's rights.

We do not question the sincerity of purpose of supporters of the amendment. Nor do we challenge their contention that some States have laws that discriminate against women. However, we believe that in their zeal to remove such discriminations advocates of the amendment are pursuing a course that threatens to deprive women of needed protection as wage earners, wives and mothers. Senator WAGNER, whose record as a friend of laboring men and women is unquestionable, summed up the case against the amendment in telling fashion. Instead of "hitting each form of discrimination in the manner best suited to its elimination," he said the amendment proposed a "scattergun approach, which in the opinion of eminent legal authorities would transform every provision of law concerning women into a constitutional issue to be ultimately resolved by the Supreme Court of the United States."

More specifically, the amendment would jeopardize State laws setting maximum hours of work for women in industry, along with other kinds of protective legislation applicable to women only. It would, in the opinion of outstanding legal authorities, probably abolish the primary obligation of a husband to support his family, necessitate radical modifications of divorce laws, laws relating to property rights of wives, and countless other laws that make a distinction between the rights and duties of men and women, respectively.

Many of these distinctions are justified by the inherent differences between the sexes. Many are the result of the institutional organization of our society, based on family units. Recognition of the fact that the duties and the rights of a wife and mother are different from those of a husband and father is not only rational but essential to the smooth functioning of our present social order. Hence to impose upon women an unreal equality of rights under the law, defined in sexless terms, would spell defeat of the purposes of friends of the amendment. Instead of emancipating women from hampering restrictions and insuring them a fairer deal in the battle of life, such an amendment would be a handicap welcome only to those few reactionaries who would gladly arrest the march of progress toward a real working equality of the sexes.

Register and Vote—It's Your Privilege and Obligation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. BARRETT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. BARRETT of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the results in primaries which have taken place so far this year show an alarming negligence on the part of hundreds of thousands of American citizens in their failure to go to the polls and vote. In this wonderful country of ours citizenship is a serious responsibility. If a government of the people, by the people, and for the people is to be maintained, our citizens must not be indifferent about taking part in elections. In neglecting to register and vote they are failing to take advantage of a great privilege—the privilege of helping to select the type of Representatives who they feel would best protect their interests and fight for legislation that will benefit not only a few selfish interests but the people of our country as a whole.

The importance of the coming November election cannot be too strongly emphasized. Every citizen who has reached the age of 21 should register—and do it now. Do not put it off until tomorrow, because tomorrow never comes.

In the recent Pennsylvania primary only some 1,300,000 voted, as compared with three times that number, 3,794,000, who voted in 1944. I want to appeal to the people of Pennsylvania, particularly those in the First Congressional District—Philadelphia—to come out and register and vote for United States Senators, Governor, congressional candidates, State senators, and members of the State legislature, so that our State and the city of Philadelphia will have the right type of representation in the National Congress and the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. Our Philadelphia citizens can register at City Hall Annex every weekday from 9 a. m. to 4 p. m.; on Saturdays from 9 a. m. to 12 noon. You cannot vote unless you are registered. The registration commission of the city of Philadelphia will set only 1 day for you to register in your ward for the coming November election. The last day to register at City Hall Annex is September 18, 1946.

No American citizen should take the easy way and let others do the voting. The character of our Government is largely what the voters make it. Every voter is part of the Government and he should protect and cherish his right to participate in its elections. It took 50 years of untiring work before the nineteenth amendment to the Constitution was adopted which gave women equal suffrage, but the effort has been more than justified by the deep interest which women have taken in elections since that time.

Ask any returned serviceman the value of each person contributing his share and doing his own part in an outlined program of action. A policy of indifference can no more win the peace than it could have won the war. The parents, wives, and sweethearts of veterans will remember that our servicemen fought for the freedoms which we enjoy, and I hope that they will impress upon their friends and neighbors that the perpetuation of our democracy depends upon a wide-awake and vigilant electorate.

Every American citizen should take advantage of the opportunity to exercise his franchise. If you do this you will express your will by voting for the candidates whom you think will represent you and not some selfish interest. It is your patriotic duty to register and vote.

Resolution Adopted by Catholic War Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein a resolution unanimously adopted by the National Convention of the Catholic War Veterans, expressing the thoughts of their membership on the matter of relations between the Vatican and the Government of the United States:

Whereas recent press stories have indicated the existence of a concerted effort to bring about the recall of the Honorable Myron C. Taylor as the President's personal representative to the Vatican state; and

Whereas the basis for such demands has been the assertion that maintenance of such a representative is "contrary to the historic American principle of the separation of church and state"; and

Whereas the United States has been consistently throughout her history and is now diplomatically represented by officials appointed to countries where the head of the state is at the same time the head of the established church, as witness England, the Scandinavian countries, and in the past the Russia of the czars and the Japan of the emperors; and

Whereas the value of permanently maintaining a United States representative to the Vatican state in a world grown suddenly small and interdependent is both obvious and incalculable: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Catholic War Veterans, in national convention assembled request that in the interests of international amity and peaceful intercourse between nations, the United States be permanently represented at the Vatican state by an official with the rank of Ambassador; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of State and to the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Address by Hon. Abe Murdock, of Utah, Before Liberal Party in New York City

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABE MURDOCK
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, July 26 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. President, on June 5 of this year, I addressed a meeting of the Liberal Party in New York City. I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The essential difference between the Democratic and Republican Parties is best illustrated, I believe, by the following anecdote:

A loaf of bread was brought out and placed upon a table.

Two men were then brought in and told to examine it carefully.

One of the men was a Democrat.

The other man was a Republican.

Each of them was asked to identify the object on the table.

"It's a loaf of bread," said the Democrat.

"It's a loaf of bread," said the Republican.

There was no disagreement here. Each of the men knew a loaf of bread when he saw it.

Then each of the men was asked what the loaf of bread was for.

"It's something to eat," said the Democrat.

"It's something to sell," said the Republican.

Does this story seem far-fetched? Any one who has closely observed the Washington scene during the fateful months since the end of hostilities must admit that there is in this anecdote a very large element of truth.

Take, for example, the legislative battle over price control.

Here is a conflict between the interests of those who are primarily consumers and those who, above all else, are concerned about the profits to be made from things which are sold.

The consumers make up the great bulk of the American people. They are not well organized. They do not have skilled lobbyists to exert pressure for them. They do not have huge slush funds to spend in order to get their case across.

Now, I do not wish to be interpreted as being against legitimate business interests. America has grown great and strong under its system of private-business enterprise. The business community is entitled to a fair profit.

But business—and by that I mean big business—is a minority. Nevertheless, it is more than able to hold its own. It is superbly organized to achieve its own ends, and it has unlimited funds with which to propagandize.

Furthermore, in a situation like the present one, all the cards are stacked in its favor. There is an acute shortage of most types of goods, brought on because for the last 4 or 5 years industry was engaged largely in war production. At the same time, there is an unprecedented amount of purchasing power. The skids are greased for runaway inflation if it is ever allowed to get a start.

In this hazardous situation, the Democratic administration has cast its lot with the majority. It instituted price controls, and it is conducting a valiant fight to insure that such controls are retained until the danger is past.

The Republican Party, on the other hand, has cast its lot with those who have hungrily eyed a feast of exorbitant profits, regardless of what the end results of their gluttony might be.

By and large, the Republicans opposed the establishment of price controls when they were first instituted as a war measure. And today, with the line against inflation in grave jeopardy, the Republicans are in the forefront of the assault upon continued controls.

Basically, it is a conflict between the opposing concepts of bread as something to eat and something to sell.

Or, take another example from current legislative history—the fight over the veterans' housing program.

I don't have to tell you people here in New York City what the housing shortage means. You know from sad experience. You know the all but hopeless situation that confronts the person or the family who has to find a place to live. You know the high prices and rentals that are demanded for inferior accommodations, and you have had plenty of experience with the sharp practices employed by many landlords to evade OPA regulations.

Is there any one of you who does not shudder to think of what the picture would be like if the much-maligned OPA, with its inadequate staff and enforcement machinery, did not stand in the way of a completely free hand for those who would like to make as much as the traffic would bear?

The big building interests, the real-estate speculators, and their Republican friends in Congress. had their own proposal for the acute housing shortage.

Simply remove all restrictions and controls, they said, and eventually everything would turn out all right.

Of course, that would mean that prices of houses and rents would soar to even higher levels than at present. Even they admitted that. But, they said, for that very reason there would be greater incentive to produce building materials and construct houses. Sure, a lot of profits would be made, but a lot of houses would also get built.

These gentlemen were not at all concerned about the fact that houses built under such conditions would be too expensive for any but the well-to-do. According to them, all the house-hungry public needed was patience. In time—perhaps in 3 or 4 or 5 years, when there was enough housing to go around—prices would come down.

But President Truman and Housing Expediter Wilson Wyatt and most of us Democrats took a different view of the matter.

We believed that veterans who had come to the defense of the Nation in its hour of peril should have houses at prices that they could afford to pay.

We were of the opinion that veterans should have these houses just as soon as they could be built—not after a wait of several years.

We believed that if a veteran bought a house his investment should be safeguarded against the collapse in values that would be certain to follow any further boom in real estate prices. We did not think that a veteran who mortgaged himself now in order to buy a house should have to face the almost certain prospect of having his property decline in value by 50 percent or more after the bust had set in.

We believed that it was the duty of the Government to protect veterans and others from gouging by speculators, so we held out for price ceilings on new and existing homes. We succeeded in retaining ceilings on new homes, but we were not able to impose ceilings on existing houses.

We also believed that it was legitimate for the Government to get production rolling through subsidy payments which would come out of the United States Treasury rather than through higher prices that could only come out of the pockets of people desperately seeking homes. We won the fight on subsidies, and now the housing program is under way. But every day the program was delayed during that fight meant postponement of construction on 3,000 badly needed homes.

Again, the basic conflict was between houses as something to live in and houses as something to sell. The Republicans had their minds set on profits. We Democrats were concerned primarily with human need.

And so it has been since the earliest days of the Republic. The struggle between the ideas of Jefferson and Hamilton was the first expression in our national political life of this basic conflict which is still being waged today.

Jefferson, the Democrat, believed in the people and fought to protect them from the aristocratic minority who hoped to manage affairs in this country as their fellow aristocrats had done for centuries in Europe. Hamilton, the Federalist—today we would call him a Republican—scorned the people and saw in them only a source of further enrichment for the privileged few.

Andrew Jackson, the Democrat, carried on the fight that Jefferson initiated and broke the stranglehold of the financial oligarchy which was ruining the country by manipulating public funds for private gain. Henry Clay, the Whig—today he would be called a Republican—fought desperately to restore the power of this plunderbund and curb the growing democracy.

For 12 years—from 1921 to 1933—the country went through its most recent experience of Republican rule. It was an experience that will not soon be forgotten. Before it was over, people throughout the land were saying, "What this country needs is a good 5-cent nickel."

With the country on the brink of disaster in 1932, the people called upon another great Democrat to lead them—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Their faith in him was soon rewarded. In place of the inaction and banal mysticism of the man who had been elected 4 years earlier as the "Great Engineer," Roosevelt immediately launched out upon a true program of social engineering.

As a result of this program greater advances have been made during the 13 years than in any other period of the Nation's history.

Our national income has been multiplied nearly fourfold until it now stands at the unprecedented figure of $150,000,000,000.

This achievement shows that there is no conflict between human rights and property rights—if by property you mean the belongings and assets of the vast mass of the people. Indeed, the enjoyment of human rights is dependent to an extent on the possession of property. The Roosevelt policies have not only created more property but they have resulted in a wider distribution of property. The Republican policies, on the other hand, have always encouraged the concentration of property in the hands of fewer and fewer people.

Today business—including small business—is in better condition than ever before. The small businessman has been protected against unfair competition and domination by monopoly. All business—large and small—has been aided through soundly arranged Government credit. And most important of all, business has been assured a larger and more stable market by the numerous administration measures which have kept the purchasing power of the people at a high level.

These sound, progressive policies have resulted in a steadily declining rate of business failures. According to the Wall Street credit-rating firm of Dun & Bradstreet, bankruptcies throughout the entire Nation last year fell to an all-time low of 810. This is indeed a far different situation from the one that prevailed in the Republican heyday of the 1920's, when business failures numbered more than 20,000 a year.

Look also at the record with regard to bank failures. Since the beginning of 1940, there have been only 44 bank failures, and since the beginning of 1944 only one. Even in those few instances in which banks have failed in recent years there has been no loss to small depositors, thanks to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, which was established in the early days of the New Deal.

In the 12 years of Republican rule leading up to the bank holiday in 1933, on the other hand, there were 14,820 bank failures, involving nearly $8,500,000,000 of depositors' money.

Through the Securities and Exchange Commission Act, another early New Deal measure, the investor today is protected against the many abuses and unscrupulous dealings that prevailed in the securities market under the Republican regime. Of course, you can still lose your money in Wall Street, but if you do it is your own fault. You at least have the satisfaction of knowing that you weren't swindled.

The farmers of the country, likewise, have prospered and produced more than ever before. When President Roosevelt took office in 1933, agriculture was down and practically out. Farmers were losing their land and their homes by the thousands, all over the country.

In rapid succession, one measure after another was enacted to aid the farmer—to give him much needed credit, to support and stabilize the prices of his products, to assure him of a ready and continuing market for his goods, to help him restore and increase the fertility of his land, to lighten his labor and increase his productivity by making cheap electric power available to him.

During Roosevelt's first term farmers' net income tripled. Today farm assets and farm income stand at an all-time high, and farm mortgage indebtedness is steadily being reduced.

We Democrats also launched out upon the greatest conservation program ever undertaken. For decades our rich natural resources—irreplacable capital assets—had been subjected to ruthless, senseless, short-sighted exploitation. Rich reservoirs of wealth and productivity remained untapped because it did not pay individual promoters to develop them.

Today all this is changed. Now our extensive grazing and forest areas are being husbanded and improved. Vast areas that were once waste land have been reclaimed and put to productive use. Great flood control projects now protect large regions from the periodic devastation and ruin that once visited them. At the same time these projects provide cheap electric power to make life easier and happier for millions of people.

Labor also has benefited.

The right of collective bargaining was written into the law of the land under a Democratic administration, despite strong opposition. Today this right is universally acknowledged.

With passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act in 1938, child labor was abolished, a floor was placed under wages, and a ceiling over hours, in a large section of American industry.

There were strong protests, chiefly from Republicans, that such innovations would mean the ruination of business. But the results were quite the opposite. For the first time in their lives, millions of workers were able to earn enough to live on at least a minimum level of health and decency. As a result, industry got not only a better and more productive force of workers but more and better customers. And employers who wanted to be fair with their workers were protected against the unscrupulous competition of sweatshop operators.

In 1935 we Democrats sponsored and achieved the enactment of a social-security system to protect workers against the economic hazards of old age and unemployment. This law also made provision for improved health services as well as for aid to the blind, the needy aged, and dependent children.

The Social Security Act, too, brought forth strong protest from the Republican standpatters in Congress and elsewhere. They said that it would undermine the moral fiber and initiative of the American people and bring the Nation to the verge of bankruptcy.

Today, when we look back at these wild charges we recognize clearly how ridiculous they were. Nearly everyone who opposed the Social Security Act now recognizes the great good that it has accomplished. Many of its strongest opponents are even favorably inclined towards broadening and liberalizing the terms of the act.

The great and sweeping changes for the better wrought by the Democratic administrations since the Hoover depression have dictated the main line of Republic campaign policy in the last three presidential elections.

Knowing full well that the people approved and applauded the progressive program of the Democratic Party, the Republicans did not dare come right out and say that they were against it.

Instead, they said to the people, "Elect us, and we will do it better."

That was the keynote of their campaign in 1936 when they offered Mr. Landon as their candidate. The tactic was repeated in 1940 when Mr. Willkie was their standard bearer, and in 1944 when Mr. Dewey made his bid for power.

Thus, the Republican Party, which had held firmly to a do-nothing policy while the country was headed for disaster in the late twenties and early thirties, continued to cling to a do-nothing philosophy throughout the years when we Democrats were putting into effect a concrete, progressive program of action.

But during these years the Republican Party was not merely a party of inaction. It was also the party of active obstruction.

While its leaders and campaign orators paid lip-service to the aims, and even to some of the accomplishments of the New Deal, its representatives in Congress, for the most part, did their utmost to block and sabotage the Democratic action program which they knew was favored by the vast majority of the people.

The people were not blind to this duplicity, as the election results showed in 1936, 1940, and 1944.

Today, those Republican leaders who call the tune in the GOP appear ready to abandon the "Me too" policy which brought them three successive defeats. The Tafts, the Brickers, and the Reeces are no longer saying, "Elect us and we will do it better." They are saying, "Elect us and we won't do it. We will give you an entirely different kind of program."

By some strange process of reasoning these Republican strategists seem to believe that the American people will turn their backs on the aims and objectives they have so steadfastly adhered to for the past 13 years.

I am confident that they are as wrong as they have consistently been in the past. For when their so-called program is analyzed it turns out to be nothing but a promise to take the country back to the unlamented "normalcy" of the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover era.

Thus, they emphatically disclose the fact that their hearts and minds are as firmly set against progress, as inseparably wedded to the dead and discredited past, as they have ever been.

The utter bankruptcy of the Republican Party as far as ideas and issues are concerned was plainly revealed as soon as its self-styled program was announced in Chicago last December.

Even the Republican-minded newspapers found it impossible to stomach this incredible document.

The Republican New York Herald Tribune called it "vague where it ought to be specific," and said that "it avoids vital national issues."

The ultraconservative Washington Star characterized it as "a masterpiece of evasion."

The Washington News, which by no stretch of the imagination can be called an administration sheet, said that it was "a sorry apology for a program. * * * A jumble of vague promises, shabby phrases, glittering generalities, and vacant viewing with alarm."

One would think that such a barrage of verbal tomatoes would have discouraged the Republican phrasemakers and induced them to come forward with something a little more positive, as well as a little more plausible.

But no; subsequent statements by the GOP leadership have been equally devoid of either substance or sense.

In order to divert attention from the fundamental emptiness of their platform, they have lately resorted to the technique known as "the big lie." With an effrontery unequaled in American politics since 1840, when the conservative Whigs donned coonskin caps and tried to palm themselves off as the party of the plain people, the Republicans now have taken to calling themselves "the liberal party in America."

The liberal party, indeed—with the reactionary and isolationist John W. Bricker way out in front for the Presidential nomination.

With the ultraconservative Senator ROBERT A. TAFT steering it on legislative matters.

With Representative CARROLL REECE as its national chairman—a man who rarely during his 25 years in Congress ever cast a liberal vote.

With steel magnate Ernest Weir, oil king Joe Pew, and Wall Street's Winthrop Aldrich paying the piper and calling the tune.

The liberal party—that opposes full employment, higher wages, a housing program for veterans, ceiling prices to protect consumers, health insurance, and just about every other liberal measure that is introduced.

That kind of technique—the technique of the big lie—may have worked in Germany where it was originated by Herr Hitler, but over here I am inclined to think it won't be good for much more than a laugh.

The 21-point program put forward by President Truman is the exact antithesis in every respect of the nebulous policy statements issued by the Republicans.

It is specific and concrete, as well as comprehensive.

It is presented in terms that are easy to understand. No one who reads it can have any doubt as to what it means.

But most important of all, it is a program that envisages the kind of America that Franklin D. Roosevelt worked for and fought for with all the boundless energy and statesmanship which he possessed.

That kind of an America—which there can be no doubt that the great majority of our people want and are determined to have—can be achieved only by adherence to the principles and policies that motivated Roosevelt in all he did.

I am confident that the people realize this, and that for this reason they will return a majority of Democrats to Congress next year to help Harry S. Truman complete the task that his illustrious predecessor began.

Terminal Pay for Enlisted Men

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, July 26 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the Boston Post entitled "Treat All Alike."

The editorial states the objections to the payment in bonds to enlisted men entitled to terminal leave pay and sets forth strong reasons why payments should be made in cash.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREAT ALL ALIKE

The vote by the Senate to pay off the enlisted men for their terminal pay in bonds, whereas the officers have been paid in cash, again revives the old caste system which it was thought had recently been discarded by the new regulations eliminating all the salutes and kowtowing to which the enlisted men had been subjected whenever they met an officer.

It is significant that the measure was passed by the Senate by a voice vote, the Members up for reelection this year evidently not being desirous of having their vote recorded and open for examination by the justly indignant GIs and gobs who are thus being discriminated against in this matter of pay-off.

The measure, as it was passed by the Senate, provides that the enlisted men shall be paid off in bonds which are not due for 5 years, and even in the meantime they are nonnegotiable. This means that right now when the young men back from the wars and trying to make a start in life, setting up in business or starting a new home of their own, just when they need the cash most, it will not be available to them. The amount it is estimated will average about $250 to $300. This is a substantial sum to most of them now, but 5 years from now when they have established themselves in business or are getting along in the world with these 5 years of experience behind them, the $250 to $300 would be of small account.

But aside from the mere value of the money there is the natural irritation that they are being discriminated against and, in addition, treated as if they were children or morons who did not know how to handle money. As stated above the officers mostly have already been paid off in cash. So the rallying cry is raised in the House, where the bond plan was not even considered, that "If cash is good enough for the officers it is good enough for the enlisted men."

The plea made for the bond plan rather than cash is that the total sum to be paid out will probably amount to $3,000,000,000 and that this would tend to be inflationary. Fairly enough, the response is shot back by advocates of the cash payment that the inflationary cry is always raised when anything is to be done for the boys who saved the country in its hour of peril. But Britain can be handed $3,750,000,000 and almost every other country in the world—friend and foe—are on the carpet waiting expectantly, and with apparently good reason for hope of a substantial handout. At this moment, when the young GI's are trying to save up enough to buy an electrical refrigerator or a washing machine for their new homes, the Senate refuses to pay a just obligation in cash; but at the same time it is granting hundreds of millions to be spent in Germany, Italy, Yugoslavia, and a dozen other countries for rehabilitation in the form of food, farm machinery, building materials, and all kinds of electrical appliances.

The American people have shown that they want this discrimination between officers and enlisted men abandoned, and it should be wiped out all the way through.

Yet, besides this discrimination in the matter of cash payments for services, the Government is apparently going ahead with another form of discrimination against the enlisted boys who lost their lives fighting for their country. In every State a new national cemetery is to be provided as a memorial for the soldier dead. In the populous States there will be two such cemeteries. Massachusetts will have two, one in the eastern and one in the western part of the State.

But here in these national shrines the officers will be allotted big plots with plenty of room for monuments, while the enlisted dead will be crowded in such small space there will be hardly room to put a marker above the grave. Surely it is hardly in line with our democratic ideals that this discrimination should be pursued even into the grave.

"Commies" and the Poll Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS G. ABERNETHY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial:

"COMMIES" AND THE POLL TAX

Two of the supporters of proposed Federal anti-poll-tax legislation have served notice that they will call up their measure when the Senate completes all other preadjournment business.

The poll tax abolition issue via the Federal legislation route is so old and so familiar to the public that any comment on it would, for the most, be rehash of what has been said again and again. The Commercial Appeal's position on the question is, too, as old and as familiar as the issue. It believes in poll-tax abolition, but it should be achieved only through local State action and after a registration system which is foolproof has been created.

A great many fine Americans in and out of the Congress believe that the poll tax should be abolished. Most active toward that end, however, are some who are not and never will be good Americans—the American Communist Party and its members, for instance.

One of the planks in the 1940 Communist Party platform was:

"Pass the Geyer anti-poll-tax bill."

In that same year the Communist Party of Arkansas, then using post-office box 453, North Little Rock, Ark., in its published list of platform planks had this:

"Abolish the poll-tax requirement for voting."

The American Communist Party and its front organizations carry on a persistent campaign for poll-tax abolition where the tax is still required.

It doesn't hurt for the people to know who is advocating what in these days and times of Communist expansion.

In Tennessee poll-tax funds go to support education and the schools.

That's a good thing to remember, too.

Operating Subsidies and Construction Loans Awarded by United States Shipping Board

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, July 26 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement entitled "An Index to Certain Matters Bearing on Operating Subsidies and Construction Loans, Awarded by the United States Shipping Board Under the Merchant Marine Act of 1928." I think the statement contains data which will be of interest to the Senate.

I have obtained from the Government Printing Office an estimate which indicates that the statement will exceed the two printed pages allowed under the rule and will cost $240.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN INDEX TO CERTAIN MATTERS BEARING ON OPERATING SUBSIDIES AND CONSTRUCTION LOANS, AWARDED BY THE UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD UNDER THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT OF 1928

This index relates largely to debates in the Senate during the Seventy-first, the Seventy-second, and the Seventy-third Congresses of the United States, prompted by Senate Document No. 210, Seventy-first Congress, and other matters inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD upon the request of the Honorable KENNETH MCKELLAR, senior Senator from Tennessee, including an extensive tabulation of construction loans which had been made at rates of interest which yielded $22,000,000 less than the interest rates paid by the Government on its bonded indebtedness. This index is in two main divisions as indicated below.

PART I. ITEMS RELATING TO OPERATING SUBSIDIES

Item 1. "The Truth About the Postal Contracts." In the Senate, June 30, 1930; CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 72, part 11, page 12076.

"Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document an article entitled 'The Truth About the Postal Contracts,' by John Nicolson, former director of several bureaus of the United States Shipping Board. I wish to say that it is a very remarkable document, and after it shall have been printed I hope that every Senator will undertake to read it."

So ordered. Made Senate Document No. 210, Seventy-first Congress.

NOTE.—As the accuracy and integrity of this document were attacked by communications also inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—and indexed also in this compilation, together with replies thereto—we here quote from the debates the comments of Senators revealing the continuing faith of the Senate in its accuracy and integrity. See also the colloquy quoted in item 8 of this index.

Item 2. Senator Fletcher's letter to a number of his colleagues of the Senate, re "The Truth About the Postal Contracts."

In the Senate: December 20, 1930; volume 74 of the RECORD, part 2, at pages 1236-1237:

Mr. King (p. 1236) (having referred to the receipt of one) said: "In that letter he [Senator Fletcher] directs my attention to an important publication presented by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] on June 30, 1930, and printed as a public document. The publication is entitled 'The Truth About the Postal Contracts.'" He then quoted from the letter, including the following comment in it by Senator Fletcher: "The facts revealed in this Senate document relate to a field with which I am fairly familiar, and the document itself has been carefully examined by me. It is a splendid piece of work, and the author has rendered a fine public service" (p. 1237).

Item 3. Debate in Senate, December 20, 1930; volume 74, part 2, pages 1236 to 1243, inclusive: In it Senators King, Jones, McKellar, Moses, Vandenberg, and Fletcher participated. In the course of it Senator Fletcher said (p. 1240) "Senate Document No. 210, to which attention has been invited, contains many of the facts about which I knew; in fact, I called attention to some of them in the Senate heretofore, and to some of the sacrifice sales that have been made. * * * This document gives additional information upon the subject, and I regard it as very important information which the Senate ought to have. It is a most enlightening document and gives facts which I have no right to question from a gentleman who was formerly director of several bureaus of the United States Shipping Board charged with promotional work in aid of private lines, and who likewise was counsel to the committee on legislation of the Shipping Board."

Item 4. Report by the Shipping Board, through its Vice Chairman, the Honorable Edward C. Plummer, criticizing Senate Document No. 210, The Truth About the Postal Contracts.

In the Senate, January 23, 1931; volume 74, part 3, pages 2926, et seq.:

"Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a short time ago there was printed in the RECORD an article prepared by Mr. Nicolson with reference to postal contracts entered into by the Shipping Board [through] the Post Office Department. I have here an analysis of that article by Mr. Plummer, Vice Chairman of the Shipping Board, and also a letter from him stating that the analysis has been unanimously approved by the Board. I think the letter and the analysis should be printed in the RECORD."

So ordered. It is printed in the RECORD immediately following Senator Jones' remarks.

Item 5. Reply by the author of the Truth About the Postal Contracts to the criticisms of that document (S. Doc. 210) by the Vice Chairman of the Shipping Board, published in the RECORD for January 23, 1931.

In the Senate, February 9, 1931, volume 74, part 4, pages 4290 et seq.:

"Mr. MCKELLAR. Some time ago there was a controversy in reference to the Truth About the Postal Contracts. I have in my hand a reply to the criticisms of that report—which was printed as a Senate document—made by Mr. John Nicolson. I ask unanimous consent that it [the reply to the criticisms] may be printed in the RECORD."

So ordered. It immediately follows the Senator's remarks. It is presented under the following titles: "I. As to Accuracy of Data in the Truth About the Postal Contracts. II. As to Integrity of Its Statements. III. The Contracts Were Subsidies, Though Camouflaged As Postal Contracts. IV. Attitudes of Senators Frye and Hale—former Members of the Senate. V. Sales Prices of Vessels As Subsidies. VI. Modern Vessels in Competition. VII. The Number of New Vessels In Fact Built Under the Contracts Were But Few. VIII. The Oceanic and Oriental Navigation Contract—Awarding a Subsidy Exceeding Current Operations and Replacement Value of the Vessel. IX. New Vessels Voluntarily Built. X. Question of Responsibility for Data in Records of the Board." The reply dwelt on the matters indicated by these captions only because the criticisms of the Shipping Board had dwelt on them in the attack on the document.

Item 6. The accuracy and integrity of Senate Document No. 210 sustained: Because of the formal attack by the United States Shipping Board on this document, further references to it, in the course of the debates, are quoted below—revealing the continuing confidence of Senators in its accuracy and integrity—notwithstanding the attack upon it by the Shipping Board. Wherein consider:

I. In the Senate, February 16, 1931; volume 74, part 5, at page 5036. Subsequent to the publication in the RECORD of the criticisms by the Shipping Board, and subsequent to the publication of the author's reply thereto, Senator Fletcher said (p. 5036): "I have full confidence in Mr. Nicolson's article—published as a Senate document. I think it is substantially correct. There has been an attempt to meet it by a statement from one of the commissioners, published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and he [the author] has replied very explicitly, as will be found on page 4290 of the RECORD of February 9. I would invite the attention of Senators to Mr. Nicolson's [reply] inserted in the RECORD at that time by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]."

II. In the Senate, February 16, 1931; volume 74, part 5, at page 5036:

"Mr. KING. A [letter] from Mr. Nicolson which I have compared with the data I have, and if the Senate will allow me I should like to refer to it. * * * In his letter Mr. Nicolson criticizes Mr. Plummer's attempt to discredit his statement."

Mr. King then reads a paragraph from the letter, in part as follows: "In the attempt to discredit the Senate document in its references to two contracts given the Robert Dollars for their two lines to Manila—under which they will receive $27,000,000, and yet neither contract requires the building of a single vessel—the Commissioner says the fact is they are building two fine large vessels, meaning of course they are doing so incident to these contracts the Senate document criticizes. * * * The Vice Chairman——

The Senator here pauses and interjects: "Speaking of Mr. Plummer, who attempted to criticize Mr. Nicolson and to discredit his statement: 'The Vice Chairman fails to mention that the two vessels are being built for the postal route, the round-the-world route, covered by a third contract—which contract is not mentioned at all in [his] criticisms of the Senate document.'"

The Senator paused and interjects: "That is the document which was presented, written by Mr. Nicolson.

"Mr. FLETCHER. That is what I supposed; that was my impression.

"Mr. KING. Mr. Nicolson continues: 'Under the third contract the Dollars are receiving $14,000,000 more—in addition to the $27,000,000 paid under the two contracts criticized—thus leaving the $27,000,000 untouched, and payable under the two contracts which, we repeat, do not require any new vessels to be built; thus leaving the Senate document intact and true.'" (See also IV, below.)

III. In the Senate February 16, 1931; volume 74, part 5, I offer for the RECORD a list of the contracts let under the Merchant Marine Act of 1928, and ask to have it printed.

So ordered. Then follows the list which, on page 5036, Senator Fletcher describes as follows, but not mentioning the source from whence it came: "I have here a statement showing the awards under the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act of 1928 for carrying foreign mails. It is noted that this statement shows the number and estimated cost of new vessels required, vessels required conditionally, and remodeling or reconditioning of vessels required * * * and the aid furnished to ship builders and ship operators, in connection with these postal contracts." (See also V below.)

IV. In the Senate, February 16, 1931; volume 74, part 5, at page 5038:

"Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent, following the statement presented by the Senator from Florida, there be inserted in the RECORD a letter which I have received from Mr. Nicolson, a paragraph from which I read a few minutes ago."

So ordered. The letter is dated February 5, 1931. As thus requested by Senator King it is printed on page 5038, immediately following the statement introduced by Senator Fletcher. It was, as its date reveals, preliminary to the author's reply to Commissioner Plummer's attack, presenting, preliminarily, criticisms and the exposure of many errors in that attack.

V. In the Senate, February 26, 1931; volume 74, part 6, at page 6052:

"Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the body of the RECORD, because it replies to some data with reference to postal or ocean mail contracts, a letter from Mr. Nicolson."

So ordered. It is dated February 25, 1931, and assumes to point out errors in the tabulated statement put in the RECORD by Senator Fletcher on February 16, 1931. (See also III above.)

Item 7. In the Senate, December 20, 1930; volume 74, part 2, pages 1236 to 1243, inclusive. In the course of the debate embraced in these seven pages of the RECORD, various Senators introduced into the RECORD different parts of the document they were discussing, viz, Senate Document No. 210, The Truth About the Postal Contracts. The parts thus introduced are here indicated by their captions; but in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD not only are the captions printed; the full text appearing in the original document under such captions, respectively, is also printed:

I. At page 1238: The compilation entitled "The Mail in Fact Transported," presenting in comparative data the payments in fact made the steamship lines involved, with the payments that would have been earned at normal rates for mail transportation.

II. At page 1238: The chapter of the document having the following caption, "Monopoly in bidding: Competition was excluded by specifications, compliance with which was possible by one person only."

III. At page 1239: The chapter of the document having the following caption: "Subsidies very excessive: The subsidies greatly exceed the handicap of American vessels in foreign trade; they greatly exceed also the operating deficits of the subsidized lines."

IV. At page 1241: The chapter of the document having the following caption: "Vessels subsidized twice: A double subsidy is received by those lines which have purchased vessels from the board—and then awarded a postal contract."

V. At page 1242: The chapter of the document having the following caption: "List of sales price concessions." Comparing the cost of construction of various vessels and the price at which sold by the board.

VI. At page 1242: The chapter of the document having the caption, "The present law is defective. Responsibility for the kind of contracts made is chargeable either to the text of the law or to administrative officials—which?"

Item 8. In the Senate, February 16, 1931; volume 74, part 5, pages 5031 et seq.:

"Mr. NORRIS. I think it would be well to put into the RECORD at this point just how much of a subsidy we are paying to the various ship companies on their various postal contracts. * * *

"Mr. BLACK (at p. 5032). Mr. President, in response to the inquiry made by the Senator from Nebraska a few moments ago, if the Senator from Tennessee does not object, may I give just a little of the difference between the normal price for the mail [transportation] and the subsidies they were given? It will take me about 1 or 2 minutes.

"Mr. MCKELLAR. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

"Mr. BLACK (continuing). The American-Scantic Line's compensation at normal rates would have been $2,600; the amount in fact paid was $260,000.

"The American-South African Line's compensation at normal rates would have been $375. The amount paid by the Government was $165,000.

"The American-West African Line at normal rates would have received $735. The amount in fact paid was $195,000.

"The Dollar Steamship Lines—I presume that is one of the small companies that need assistance from the Government—for 15 voyages would have received, at normal rates, $13,500. The amount in fact paid was $728,000.

"The Eastern Steamship Line at normal rates would have received $1,400. The amount in fact paid was $147,000.

"The Munson Steamship Line—which, I assume, is another one of the small companies—at normal rates would have received $33,200; under the Government contract it gets $920,00.

"The New York & Cuba Mail Line at normal rates would have received $35 for carrying the mail, but under the contract it received $224,000.

"Mr. NORRIS. How much was that—$35?

"Mr. BLACK. Thirty-five dollars is what it would have received according to the normal rate that had been previously paid for carrying the mails; but the company, of course, in order to get a slight assistance from the Government, was awarded a contract of $224,000.

"The Oceanic & Oriental Navigation Co. for eight voyages at normal rates would have received $535, under the contract received $113,000.

"The Oceanic & Oriental Navigation Co., on another route, at normal rates, would have received $145. Under this contract it received $123,000

"The Pac-Argentine-Brazil Line's compensation for six voyages, at normal rates, would have been $3; under this contract it received $102,000.

"The States Steamship Co., at normal rates, would have received $145. Under this contract they received $230,000.

"The States Steamship Co., on another route, would have received $133 at normal rates. Under this contract it received $122,000.

"So the indications are that while it is very bad to give assistance to the starving unemployed, it is perfectly all right to give it to the 'starving' steamship companies.

"Mr. NORRIS (p. 5032). From what was the Senator reading? Will he tell us?

"Mr. BLACK. I was reading from information placed in the RECORD by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] which gave the statistics on these contracts.

"Mr. NORRIS. What is the source of the information.

"Mr. KING. That information was collated by Mr. Nicolson who, for many years, was a trusted employee of the Shipping Board, and one of the most intelligent men in that organization. He presented a report, based upon most meticulous investigation, which was printed as a public document—No. 210, as I recall.

"Mr. MCKELLAR. It is. I had it put in the RECORD, and I will say to the Senator that it is the most perfect compilation of facts that I have seen in a long time.

"Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator from Utah or the Senator from Tennessee to get any idea that I was asserting or even suggesting, that the information was not reliable.

"Mr. KING. Oh, no; I did not get that impression at all.

"Mr. NORRIS. I wanted the RECORD to show, however, where the information came from, so that its reliability would appear on its face I have myself gone over some of the records, and while I have not the figures at hand, they correspond quite well with those the Senator has just read into the RECORD.

"Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, it is a fact that Mr. Nicolson, who is a very great expert, has gone into the matter very carefully, and some of the facts which he submits, and which have not been denied, and cannot be denied, show a perfectly astounding situation. * * *

"Mr. NORRIS (pp. 5032–5033). The figures given by the Senator from Alabama, that were placed in the RECORD by the Senator from Utah, do not even tell the whole story. They do not even give us a complete idea of the great subsidies that are being paid to these shipping companies. They have bought ships from the Government of the United States, and then they have been given a subsidy besides, to operate them. * * *

"Mr. BLACK (p. 5040). Mr. President, will the Senator [Norris] yield to me?

"Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

"Mr. BLACK. The Senator referred a few moments ago to the shipping line which carried $3 worth of mail and obtained $102,000 from the Post Office Department.

"Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

"Mr. BLACK. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that that shipping line carried that mail in vessels bought from the Government. It cost the Government $15,034,000 to build those vessels. They were sold to the line which is receiving the subsidy, for $396,285. So the Senator will note that the cost to the Government was over $15,000,000, and the cost to the shipping company for these subsidized lines was $396,000. I call the Senator's further attention to the fact that the total cost of all these subsidized vessels to the Government was $258,000,000; but the subsidized companies purchased them for $23,000,000."

NOTE: These data appear in full detail in Senate Document No. 210, The Truth About the Postal Contracts, chapter V.

"Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for his contribution, and I am wondering if he has not omitted one other item. When the companies bought these ships, did they pay for them in cash, or on time?

"Mr. BLACK. My understanding is they were all purchased on time.

"Mr. NORRIS. And at what rate of interest?"

NOTE.—The low rates of interest granted by the Government on loans made shipping companies is dwelt on in part 2 of this index.

Item 9. In the Senate, March 2, 1931; volume 74, part 7, at page 6677:

"Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have here a letter dated February 26, 1931, from Mr. John Nicolson, somewhat in answer to a letter dealing with shipping matters which was placed in the RECORD by me some time ago. I think it but fair that it should be printed in the RECORD, and I ask permission that that be done."

(The letter or report Senator Jones thus refers to as having been previously printed in the RECORD, was the report of Commissioner Plummer appearing in the RECORD of January 23, 1931, at p. 2936 et seq., criticizing S. Doc. No. 210. See item 4, above.)

In a concluding paragraph of a reply by the author of the Senate Document No. 210—printed in the RECORD of February 9, 1931, at page 4290 and following—it is mentioned that that document would be later supplemented by a further reply having special reference to the subject there indicated. The letter now introduced by Senator Jones is the supplemental reply there referred to as yet to be made.

Item 10. In the Senate, May 2, 1932; volume 75, part 9, pages 9382–9383:

"Mr. MCKELLAR. I ask that there may be published at the end of my remarks * * * this very valuable comparison of payments made under the ocean-mail contracts. I earnestly ask that Senators give this matter their attention. It is a matter involving at least $100,000,000 to this Government. I hope they will give it enough attention tomorrow morning so that they may be informed about the true facts."

So ordered. The document has a caption reading as follows: "Comparison of payments made under ocean-mail contracts (title IV, Merchant Marine Act, 1928) with the normal transportation-value of the mail in fact carried. Compiled by John Nicolson from data furnished by the Postmaster General to the United States Senate, in response to Senate Resolution 85 (S. Doc. No. 69), April 30, 1932, based on International Postal Union rates."

Item 11. In the Senate, May 12, 1932; volume 75, part 9, at page 10049:

"Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as part of my remarks a compilation of the instances where competition in bidding on mail contracts was made impossible under the specifications of the Post Office Department, by Mr. John Nicolson. It gives most valuable information, and information that the Senate ought to have. It is compiled by an expert long familiar with the business of shipping and ocean routes, and having had a long experience as an official of the Shipping Board, and it ought to be made a part of the RECORD."

So ordered. The document has a caption reading as follows: "Instances where competition was impossible under the specifications of the Post Office Department in the award of ocean-mail contracts. The data in the tabular statement below have been compiled from the report of the Postmaster General in response to Senate Resolution 85 (S. Doc. 69), Supplemental Comments are given at the end, John Nicolson. May 9, 1932." (See also item 7, par. II, of this index.)

Item 12. In the Senate, June 2, 1932; volume 75, part 11, at page 11787 et seq.:

"Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a statement of the subsidizing transactions between the United States and the Franklin Roosevelt Dollar group of steamship companies, giving them over $100,000,000, compiled from the official records of the United States Shipping Board as of May 1932, by John Nicolson."

So ordered.

Item 13. In connection with the colloquy, initiated by Senator Norris, and participated in by Senators Black, King, and McKellar, quoted in item 8, above, from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 16, 1931, volume 74, part 5, and particularly the comment of Senator Norris, above quoted from page 5032 of the RECORD, viz:

"Mr. NORRIS. The figures given by the Senator from Alabama, that were placed in the RECORD by the Senator from Utah, do not even tell the whole story. They do not even give us a complete idea of the great subsidies that are being paid to these shipping companies. They have bought ships from the Government of the United States, and then they have been given a subsidy besides. * * *"

In conjunction with that comment, it is appropriate to point out that more complete information in the field mentioned by the Senator in those parts of Senate Document No. 210, which were inserted in the RECORD by various Senators, as previously indicated, and more particularly in the following:

I. The chapter of the document (S. Doc. No. 210) printed in the RECORD, volume 74, part 2, at page 1239, the caption of which is: "Subsidies very excessive: The subsidies greatly exceeded the handicap of American vessels in foreign trade. They greatly exceed also the operating deficits of the subsidized lines."

II. The chapter of the document printed in the RECORD, volume 74, part 2, at page 1241, the caption of which reads: "Vessels subsidized twice: A double subsidy is received by those lines which have purchased vessels from the Board—and then awarded a postal contract."

III. The chapter of the document printed in the RECORD, volume 74, part 2, at page 1242, the caption of which reads: "List of sales—price concessions," under which is presented the sales to the subsidized lines, respectively, the price at which the vessels were sold and the amount the construction of these vessels had cost the Government.

That chapter closes with the following recapitulation:

"The 10 subsidized lines enumerated above represent 104 vessels sold. The total sales price for these vessels was less than $23,000,000. The total cost of construction for the 104 vessels was $253,000,000. Their cost of construction, therefore, exceeded the total sales price by more than $225,000,000. In other words, the sales price in the aggregate, was not 10 percent of this cost of construction."

For the subsidy in the form of compensation for transporting mails, and the extent such payments exceeded the normal transportation value thereof. See Senator Black's statement in item 8 above, read by him from the chapter of the document printed in the RECORD, volume 74, part 2, at page 1238, under the caption: "The mail in fact transported."

PART 2. THE TABULATION OF CONSTRUCTION LOANS AWARDED AT RATES OF INTEREST WHICH YIELDED TO THE GOVERNMENT $22,000,000, LESS THAN THE RATE PAID BY THE GOVERNMENT ON ITS BONDED DEBT.

Item 15. In the Senate, May 27, 1932, volume 75, part 10, at pages 11370–11373:

"Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as part of my remarks, a statement of loans by the United States Shipping Board at interest rates lower than 3½ percent, compiled by Mr. John Nicolson, formerly connected with the Board. In this connection, I beg to say that Mr. Nicolson, from the records of the Board, shows the enormous loss to the Government from loans made by the Board at such rates as one-fourth of a percent, three-eighths of a percent, one-half of a percent, seven-eighths of a percent, and 1 percent, and other exceedingly small interest rates. * * * This is a very carefully prepared statement. It gives the exact figures taken from the records of the Board * * * The loans at such rates were indefensible, and in my judgement, no member of the Board who was a party to the granting of such loans, at such interest rates, should be reappointed to the Board, or confirmed again by the Senate * * * I invite the especial attention of every Senator to this very remarkable statement."

It was ordered printed in the RECORD accordingly. The document has a caption reading as follows: "Statement of loans by the United States Shipping Board at interest rates less than 3½ percent. Compiled May 1932, from official statement of the Board. By John Nicolson."

Immediately below the above and therefore also a part of the caption, is a note by the compiler, reading as follows: "NOTE.—Such rates as one-fourth of 1 percent, one-half of 1 percent, seven-eighths of 1 percent, 1 percent, and others less than 3½ percent minimum now fixed by law, are claimed to result from section 301 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1928. A reasonable interpretation of that section does not, we think, result in any such consequence. Furthermore, whether a loan should be made was discretionary with the Board. If the applicant was unwilling to pay a reasonable rate, by contract, the loan could have been denied. All know that Congress did not intend the interpretation, that was applied."

A the end and immediately following the tabulated statement is a "Recapitulation with supplemental comments" purporting to show that the rates were unjustified by the provision of law which it was claimed required them.

This tabulation was the subject of extended debates in the Senate reported in volume 75 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, part 12, as follows: On June 18, 1932, at pages 13372 to 13385; and on June 20, 1932, at pages 13487 to 13497.

The attack upon and the confirmation of the accuracy of the tabulation of loans

Item 16. In the Senate, June 20, 1932; volume 75, part 12, at page 13495. Senator WALLACE H. WHITE, of Maine, in the course of a long address incident to the debates on the construction loans which had been made by the Shipping Board, attacked the accuracy and dependability of the tabular statement of loans introduced as above and said of it: "I say to the Senate that there is hardly a truthful or accurate statement in the three pages making up this report."

Item 17. The Secretary of the Treasury confirms the accuracy of the tabulated statement. In the Senate, May 27, 1933; volume 77, part 2, at page 4441. Senator McKELLAR introduced into the RECORD a letter dated March 25, 1933, to Senator WHITE, from the compiler of the tabulated statement thus criticized by Senator WHITE, one statement in which letter is as follows:

"Concerning the tabulation you have said: 'There is hardly a truthful or accurate statement in it.' Now, as to the seven columns thus really involved in your comment: These contain basic data. The first three of these are data originating in the Shipping Board. All the others, viz, columns 4, 5, 6, and 7 relate to Federal securities involved in fixing interest rates on construction loans. This data originated in the Treasury Department. You say of it: 'There is hardly a truthful or accurate statement in them.'

"Hon. Ogden L. Mills, Secretary of the Treasury, was requested to have these columns checked up, and by letter dated February 4, 1933, he certifies that all the data in columns 4, 5, 6, and 7 are substantially correct * * *. Of all these the Secretary of the Treasury says: 'I have had the statement checked and find that the information therein is substantially correct.' The Secretary notes no exceptions whatever; not one. Will you not kindly read his letter? It is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 20, 1933, pages 625-626."

Item 18. In the Senate, March 20, 1933; volume 77, part 1, at page 625:

"Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a letter to me from Hon. Ogden L. Mills, Secretary of the Treasury, dated February 4, 1933, relating to the Federal securities listed in the tabulation of construction loans in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for May 27, 1932."

So ordered. Then follows the full text of the letter, the parts immediately germane being as set forth in item 17, next above.

Debates on the interest rates revealed in the tabulated statement; and on the text of the law which is alleged to be the source

Item 19. Senator McKELLAR'S criticisms of the loans at the very low interest rates which had been used, were not only revealed by him when he introduced the tabulation into the RECORD (see item 15 hereof) but, as the leader of the attack on the system which made such loans possible, his attitude and his criticisms appear to many points through the debates. He especially emphasized that the provision in the text of the law which excluded the 2-percent postal bonds from being a standard of measurement for the interest rate, itself revealed, on the face of the law that the rate in no case should be less than the rate on those bonds. He further emphasized that whether a loan should be made was in the discretion of the Shipping Board—hence it was within their control to dictate a contract rate that was reasonable—or refuse to make the loan—course the Secretary of the Treasury had in fact suggested. And furthermore:

Item 20. In the Senate, June 18, 1932, volume 75, part 12, at page 13373: During Senator McKELLAR's presentation of the matter the following brief colloquy occurred:

"Mr. HOWELL. I would like to ask the able Senator [McKELLAR] if the Shipping Board could have been compelled to make the loans?

"Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; there was nothing in the world to compel them to do so.

"Mr. HOWELL. It was in their discretion?

"Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; it was a matter in their discretion. They did not have to make the loan at all."

Other Senators dwelt on this aspect of the matter. That it was optional with the Board wheher a loan should be made, a fact Senator WHITE also conceded (p. 13494).

Item 21. In the Senate, June 18, 1932, volume 75, part 12, at page 13379: After presenting the facts of a particular loan in illustration, Senator McKELLAR said: "I would not like to say this was a fraudulent transaction, but it is about as near a fraudulent transaction as I have even known, not to be one.

"Mr. WHEELER. In other words, if it is not fraudulent, it has all the earmarks of being fraudulent.

"Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it has all the earmarks and all the appearance of being fraudulent. It certainly is fraudulent in law, whether intended to be fraudulent or not.

* * * * *

"Mr. WHEELER (p. 13379). I think one of the wickedest things that has come to my attention since I have been in the Senate is the way of these men going out and loaning Government money. It is not only wicked, but in my judgment, it is unlawful under the provisions of the act, and cannot be justified. I think the Senator, or whoever brought it to the attention of the Senate, deserves the praise of the Senate."

The test or source from which the rates of interest were derived

Item 22. In the Senate, June 18, 1932; volume 75, part 12, at page 13378:

"Mr. WHEELER. I am not clear as to how they could arrive, even under the law, and under the Senator's [WHITE] statement, at the figure of a quarter of 1 percent.

"Mr. McKELLAR. I will tell the Senator how it was. Wealthy men would lend the money to the Government on the Government's bills at a discount of a quarter of 1 percent, and that subterfuge was used by the Shipping Board for fixing a rate of interest for 20 years—at the low rate of interest I have mentioned. These bills, as they were called, where the Government accepted the money and paid that small rate of interest, were for a very short period of time, perhaps 30 days or 60 days, or on demand. They were not the kind of an obligation of the Government that was referred to in the act—as is shown by the exception that was made, that the Board was not to consider the 2-percent interest on postal bonds.

"Mr. WHEELER (pp. 13378-13379). I think the Senator is absolutely correct, and I think it is quite clear from the Senator's statement, that what these men did was to violate the provision of the law itself. * * * I think any of these executive boards that come in here and admit that they loan money in violation of the provision of law, and through means of a subterfuge, instead of being here asking for confirmation, ought to be impeached."

Item 23. In the Senate, June 18, 1932; volume 75, part 12, at page 13373:

"Mr. VANDENBERG. I completely agree with the Senator's [McKELLAR] reminiscence that the interest arrangement was an utter outrage on the Treasury of the United States, and was indefensible in any shape or manner."

Responsibility for the failure to report existing conditions to Congress

Item 24. In the Senate, June 18, 1932, volume 75, part 12, at page 13373:

"Mr. VANDENBERG. If this section of the law was as outrageous as the Senator and I both agree that it was, though it has since been corrected as the Senator has indicated, I think the primary responsibility was on the Treasury of the United States—even before it was upon the Shipping Board—to have checked against any such back door to the Treasury; and that primary responsibility rests upon the Treasury for neglecting to have notified Congress that the change should have been made. * * *

"Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator that the Treasury Department was derelict in its duty. The first obligation [however] was upon the head of the Shipping Board. He was the man primarily entrusted with the trust fund. He above all others was responsible for these ridiculously low rates of interest [resulting] in this enormous loss of $22,000,000 to the American taxpayers on the loans that were made.

"Mr. WHITE. In my opinion, the responsibility rests upon the Congress of the United States for the legislation. We wrote into that law the rule which should determine the rate of interest. * * * If the responsibility is on anyone, it is on the Congress of the United States and not upon the administration offices."

Item 25. In the Senate, June 20, 1932, volume 75, part 12, at page 13496:

"Mr. VANDENBERG. I have no pride of opinion in my letter or its authority in relation to the correcting of this outrageous situation; but I do have a very keen interest as a measure of the diligence of the personnel of the Shipping Board, in knowing the Senator's [WHITE] judgment as to whether or not the correction would have been made had not the letter been received. So I ask the Senator [WHITE] this categorical question: Is it his judgment that the shipping rate situation would have been speedily corrected upon the initiative and action of the Board itself?

"Mr. WHITE (p. 13496). It is a pure matter of speculation as to whether they would have acted without the Senator's letter or not. * * *

"Mr. VANDENBERG (p. 13375). I am wondering whether or not the Government would not still—June 1932—be loaning money to shipping companies for almost nothing, if I had not happened to stumble upon the circumstance, or if some other Member of Congress had not happened to have stumbled on it.

"Mr. McKELLAR (p. 13375). The Shipping Board would be lending to the shipping companies of the country money at this ridiculous rate of interest right now, if the Senator from Michigan had not in some way—I do not think he has explained how, as a member of the committee discovered the fact that these ridiculously low rates of interest were being charged, and brought it to the attention of the country through the amendment."

The part the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States had—or was entitled to have, if any—in determining the Board's action

Item 26. In the Senate, December 26, 1930; volume 74, part 1, at page 788: Senator VANDENBERG introduced a letter, dated December 11, 1930, from the Chairman of the Shipping Board to himself, in which the Chairman of the Board said: "Referring to our conversation a few days ago * * * in keeping with a recent informal opinion of the Attorney General (copy of which I understand you have seen) the Board today, because of some impending loans upon which rates of interest must be fixed, took action to abide by the Attorney General's opinion."

Item 27. In the Senate, June 18, 1932; volume 75, part 12, at page 13382:

Mr. McKELLAR dwelt on and read from a letter of the Chairman of the Shipping Board, dated July 7, 1930, to Admiral Cone, a Commissioner of the Board and chairman of the committee on construction loans, in which the Chairman said, in part: "In response to a request of Secretary Mellon I visited his office this afternoon, and had a conference with the Secretary, the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Hope, and the Solicitor, concerning the letter of July 1. I had written him (re, interest on loans). * * * They suggested that the Shipping Board should take the position that 3 percent would be the rate, and that it be handled as a matter of agreement between the borrower and the Shipping Board, in which event nobody would be allowed to complain. And in view of the fact that the administrative officials would be a party to loaning money for 20 years at a ridiculously low rate, which loans we were not bound to make at all under the law, that the parties thereto agree on a specific rate."

Mr. McKELLAR (continuing). "It was the advice of the Treasury Department, and afterwards the advice of the Department of Justice, in the informal opinion of the Attorney General, that the Board had a right to make a contract with them, the shipping companies, and ought to do it. Yet (the Board) disregarded that advice, and continued secretly to make contracts at that ridiculously low rate of interest, costing the American people and the American Government $22,000,000 in the amounts that were loaned; it is indefensible.

Mr. McKELLAR, continuing (p. 13489): "A great deal has been said about the Attorney General's opinion. Mr. President, in his opinion the Attorney General said that it was the duty of the Board * * * that a contract rate should be put in. Mr. Mellon advised a contract rate (p. 13374) * * * I have said the Shipping Board was not compelled to loan money to any company; the Chairman of the Board assented this was so. * * * The responsibility of the Shipping Board for this interest rate is sufficiently shown in the 'Recapitulated and supplemental comments' at the end of the [tabulated] statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 27, 1932, at page 11372. The RECORD gives the whole matter."

Item 28. In the Senate, June 18, 1932, volume 75, part 12, at page 13379:

"Mr. McKELLAR. The Secretary of the Treasury, believing that the rates certified were not in accord with the intent and policies [of Congress], suggested that the Board arrange the loans on the basis of a contract-interest rate, and thus obtain a reasonable and a substantial uniformity * * * (p. 13380). The Board explains its abandonment of this suggestion by a legal opinion from the Attorney General which on its face, by the way, is just a copy of something. Whether it was a real opinion of the Attorney General nobody knew; on its face it expressly mentions that it is 'informal.'

"Assuming it had been a formal opinion, intended as a basis of final action, the fact remains that:

"Such judicial or quasi-judicial bodies as the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board, for reasons too obvious for comment, are not subject to or estopped by rulings or opinions of the Attorney General—hence responsibility cannot be transferred to the Department of Justice. Such quasi-judicial bodies are charged with direct interpretation of laws affecting matters in their jurisdiction, subject only to judicial decisions as precedents, and subject to reversal only by the courts—when wrong."

New York Post Foreign Correspondent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein articles written by Ruth Gruber, New York Post foreign correspondent, on Palestine:

PALESTINE TODAY IS IRELAND OF 1921 AS BLACK AND TAN TERROR RULES

(By Ruth Gruber)

Palestine is the Ireland of this postwar period. That is the biggest story I found in the Holy Land.

The fierce hatred of the British, the concentration-camp atmosphere, the destruction of civil liberties, the growth of a people's army—the same social and political explosives which made Ireland the tinderbox of the last postwar period, make Palestine the time bomb of this one.

Even the hated special police, the infamous Black and Tans whom the British sent to suppress the Irish, and who were in their day as notorious as Nazi Storm Troopers, were recruited by the British and actually sent to Palestine to keep order.

JEWS CATCH ON

The British began creating the parallel themselves by their colonial policy, by using torture on men and women suspected of political activity, by suppressing civil liberties, by turning Palestine into the same kind of police state that Ireland was before its liberation.

Now the Jews are catching on to the technique which the Irish used successfully to fight the British. They have learned at last what the Irish learned after centuries of bloody battle—that the only language the Foreign Office seems to understand is the language of guns.

They have learned to their sorrow that appeasement of the Foreign Office in the thirties led directly to the White Paper of 1939, to the ghettoizing of Palestine and the tragic restrictions on immigration. At a time when the hounded Jews of Europe found every escape route from the Nazi fortress being rapidly cemented, the British suddenly dropped the iron curtain on Palestine, too.

A few months ago, waiting for a plane in Ireland's Shannon Airport near Limerick, an Irishman said to me, "The British don't understand justice and decency and fair play in colonial policy and international politics. You've got to hit them on the snout."

Even in America some of my Irish friends used to smile at Jewish naïveté, "The Jews think they can get justice out of the British."

Now, in Palestine, I met a number of Jews who were waking up to the facts of colonial life. They were studying Irish history. They were getting ready to hit the British on the snout.

At the outset of this series, I want to make clear that there are stories I could not cable from Palestine, facts that I could not tell before, without endangering my sources, many of whom, I am sure, would have found themselves in jail.

CENSORSHIP DOES EXIST

The British Foreign Office will tell you that there is no censorship in Palestine for foreign correspondents. Officially that is true. The open censorship is for the local press, and every Palestinian newspaper printed in the three official languages, English, Arabic, and Hebrew, is censored down to its weather reports and lipstick ads.

No newspaper, for instance, is allowed to print the name of Hitler's friend the grand mufti of Jerusalem, unless his name is mentioned on the floor of Commons or unless it appeared in testimony before the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry on Palestine.

We were told by the Government censor that for us foreign correspondents there was absolutely no censorship. But everyone of us knew that our stories were being studied and made available to the British Foreign Office people in Palestine almost before they reached our editors' desks at home. The result was complete destruction of normal relations between the correspondent and the source of news. Some of the facts which I obtained I had to hold back until enough time had elapsed to obscure the identity of my informants.

"OLD GUARD" HANGS ON

I want to make clear too that I am not anti-English; I am anti-British-Foreign-Policy, particularly as I saw it in action in Palestine. The English at home are as valiant and admirable a people today as they were during the war when their backs were against the wall and they held the Nazis off alone.

But either the English who are noble and fine and democratic at home are not the English who run the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office, or, if they are, they change psychologically when they leave home.

I found the Foreign Office being run, for the most part, by men who have never broken with the tradition of the old British imperialists, men who think back through their grandfathers, men who, knowing that the days of grabbing and expansion are over and only the days of clutching and hoarding are left, are now imperialists by despair.

BRITONS' GREATEST ENEMY

To me, the British Foreign Office is the greatest enemy of the English people. I cannot believe the English people indorse Attlee's absurd demand that the report of the Anglo-American Committee cannot be accepted unless the underground armies are suppressed. Who can suppress an army which includes every citizen from the age of 15 to 50?

I cannot believe the English people will accept the betrayal of Bevin's promise to the committee that the British would carry out whatever recommendations were made, a promise repeated to me in London by several members of the commission after the famous luncheon Bevin gave.

The cynical betrayal of promises, the reign of terror in Palestine, the operation of a black-and-tan police state—these are the actions of men who have everything to lose. The wages of the British Foreign Office are war.

HOW BRITAIN RECRUITED PRO-NAZIS AND SPENT $20,000,000 ON JAILS

(By Ruth Gruber)

Palestine is a police state. Officially, there is no mail censorship, but nobody dares write honestly in a letter. Officially, there is no wire tapping, but nobody dares talk freely on the telephone.

Officially, the war is over, but Palestine still has a curfew; no automobile can enter the city gates of Jerusalem after 6 p. m. Each night the jail in Jerusalem fills up with people caught entering the city at 3 minutes past 6 or later. If your car gets one flat tire on the road, you are likely to spend the night in jail until your friends learn that you are missing and come to bail you out.

Palestine is a police state. There are 124 huge police stations in this tiny country. The British have spent 5,000,000 English pounds ($20,000,000) building police stations. They have spent about half a million pounds for education.

One of the problems discussed almost daily before the Anglo-American Committee was Palestine's absorptive capacity. The absorptive capacity for jails never came up.

JAILS EVERYWHERE

As you drive through the country, past collective farms and villages, where only a few years ago there was nothing but parched land and biblical stones, you see at steady intervals huge concrete buildings dominating the hills. Once you might have thought, as I did, that these buildings were giant hospitals to care for the disease-ridden Arab fellahin, or agricultural centers, or universities spreading the culture of Shakespeare and Einstein to the Jewish and Arab population.

But you learn very soon that money is not spent by the British for culture and education and health; the mandatory government spends its money for police stations and jails. Palestine's most costly architecture, typically enough, is prison architecture.

The most striking parallel between the Ireland of the last war and the Palestine of this one is in the police. The Royal Irish Constabulary, the infamous "Black and Tans," who inflamed the whole world for their outrages against the citizenry, were recruited and sent to Palestine.

Their technique in the Holy Land was the technique they had learned in Eire. Members of the force broke into citizens' homes, raided for arms, confiscated correspondence, and generally substituted a "Hate the Jews" policy for their old "Hate the Irish."

HORST WESSEL HEARD AGAIN

At the outbreak of the war with Nazi Germany, the British recruited Fascists from the Mosley gang. These men, who loathed the idea of fighting their friends, the Nazis, embraced with passion the idea of fighting Jews.

They walked around the streets of Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, the city built by Jews, singing the Horst Wessel song. They marched into crowded market places giving the "Heil Hitler" salute. They drove in British police trucks with swastikas chalked on the side. Underneath the swastikas was the familiar slogan—"Kill the Jews."

To be sure, the job of being a policeman in a police state is not easy. The police know they are hated; they never know when they may get a bullet in the back.

It is as impossible for the British to keep morale high among the police force in Palestine as it was to keep morale in Ireland when the Black and Tans looted, drank, wrecked whole towns and shot prominent Sinn Feiners who were often the most respected men in their communities. While the police were alienating the friendship of the world, the Irish patriots and now the Palestine patriots were winning new friends each day.

SOME ARE DECENT

Palestine is a police state—but even some of its policemen are decent human beings. There are some among them who so loathe the tasks the British gave them that they have quit the forces in disgust. I met a former British policeman who told me that the tactics of the forces had made him pro-Zionist and he was now fighting for the Jews.

During the war the Palestine police were conscripted and not permitted to leave to enlist in the army or the air forces to shoot Nazis instead of Jews. Some of them actually committed felonies in order to be locked up and dishonorably fired from the Palestine police force so they could get into an honest war.

Palestine is a police state—and the long arm of the police stretched even to Switzerland, where the Anglo-American Committee was writing its report. A Captain Ayers came to Lausanne from Jerusalem to "guard" the committee members. When the committee recommended that 100,000 Jews be allowed to enter Palestine, Ayers told several committee members, "You don't know how much easier you've made the job for the Palestine police."

COPS BEHIND THE WIRE

The force is as terrified now of the young men and women in the Haganah, the citizens' army, as the Black and Tans were of the young men and women in the Sinn Fein. The joke in Palestine is that the ones who are really behind barbed wires are the policemen, who lock themselves up in terror at night.

Most of the attacks by the three resistance organizations, the Haganah, an army of minute men to which almost every able-bodied Jew belongs, and by the smaller movements, the Irgun Zvai Leumi and the Stern Gang, are directed against the police.

Why? I asked that question every time I spoke to a member of one of the underground armies. The answers were clear—the police are the arm of the British Foreign Office. The police are the special organ, the eyes and ears of the white paper regime.

The police are the vanguard of the move to suppress Jewish immigration. The police treat, and have treated, the people brutally, using concentration camp methods to get information from political suspects. The police use agents provocateurs. Some of the police are anti-Semitic and almost all of them are anti-colonial. The police are hated because Palestine is a police state.

JEWS AND ARABS GET ALONG WELL—UNTIL BRITAIN RAISES FALSE ISSUES

(By Ruth Gruber)

Since my return to America, almost everyone I meet asks me, "What is the chance of an Arab holy war breaking out if the 100,000 Jews are allowed into Palestine? Can the Arabs and Jews really get along?" Most of my friends in America seem to picture the Arabs and Jews constantly at each other's throats.

Actually, the most extraordinary sight in Palestine is the way the ordinary Arabs and Jews get along.

They sit in buses together; they eat in the same cafes; they drink cocktails at the same tables in the cocktail bar of the King David Hotel; young Arab intellectuals take Jewish girls to dinner.

The majority of the Arabs are no more anti-Semitic than the majority of the Jews are antigentile. Almost every Arab spokesman I met in Egypt, Palestine, or Iraq made a point of telling me that the Arabs are cousins of the Jews, they belong to the "Sems" and have a common history and a common heritage.

The bitter truth about Palestine is that it is to the British Foreign Office's interest to sow the seeds of Arab-Jewish hatred. Britain wants to make the world believe that only an army of occupation can keep peace in the Holy Land.

DIVIDE AND RULE

These are familiar tactics with the British. They used the same tactics of "divide and rule" in Ireland. There were grave and historic differences between the Catholic south and the Protestant north, but without British intervention, the Irish might have worked out their domestic differences. To this day, almost every Irishman blames the British for aggravating the differences between the north and south, and for causing the partition of Ireland.

In Palestine, the British role is even crasser than it was in Ireland. History did not keep the Jews and Arabs irrevocably apart; but the British are trying their utmost to speed up history and exploit whatever differences there are between the two peoples.

The most flagrant official act of the Foreign Office in fomenting hostility between the Arabs and Jews was in bringing back to Palestine that leading Nazi fellow-traveler, Jamal Husseini, the cousin of the Grand Mufti and his chief henchman. Jamal's presence in Palestine, his leadership of the Arabs in their testimony before the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry, were a clear index of the Foreign Office's determination to give oomph and a semblance of unity to the Arab case.

ARABS ARE SUSPICIOUS, TOO

Yet the Arabs lose no love for the British, despite the help they have got from them. The Arabs are as suspicious of the Foreign Office as are the Jews. The British rule the Middle East, and everyone in the Middle East hates them. In Egypt I was told it would be safer not to wear a war correspondent's uniform, for fear the Egyptians would mistake me for an English soldier and make life unpleasant if not actually dangerous.

Friends of the English people—and I count myself among them—are appalled at the betrayal of English principles by the Foreign Office. They were suspicious when the British appointed a commission to act upon President Truman's request that 100,000 refugees be permitted to enter Palestine. Now, when the commission, after 4 months of study and investigation, recommends unanimously that the 100,000 be admitted, the British Foreign Office seems determined to scuttle the report.

Such tactics are not helping the British make friends and influence people. Not only is the Foreign Office doing almost nothing to end what it calls Arab-Jewish hostility but its officials are guilty of deliberate acts of incitement.

One of the neatest jobs of fomenting trouble that I have heard about concerned American GI's. During the war some of our soldiers were beaten up by Palestinian Jews for "chasing around" with Jewish girls. The men who did the beating up also dropped some leaflets saying they were members of an organization called the Sons of Phineas, B'nai Pinchas, and that they were avenging the sins against Jewish womanhood.

A BRITISH HOAX

Investigation showed that there was no such organization; the small group was made up of paid agents of the British. Apparently, some Colonial Office servant had been reading the Bible, found the Phineas story in Numbers, and decided to introduce a De Maupassant touch to the problems of the Holy Land. In the Bible, Phineas, the grandson of Aaron the priest, extirpates an Israelite who had sinned with a woman from foreign lands. Taking a javelin, Phineas "went after the man of Israel into the tent and thrust both of them through."

An example of how the British fight any effort at cooperation between the Arabs and Jews occurred in 1940, when a group of professors of the Hebrew University, some Arab intellectuals, and the Anglican bishop discussed establishing a society of British, Arabs, and Jews to promote better understanding. The Anglican bishop, after giving the group his blessings, invited some of his Arab friends to join the society. One of them was Dr. Ahmad Samih el-Khalidi, director of the Arab Teachers Training School in Jerusalem and Arab assistant to the director of education (an Englishman, of course) in Palestine.

Dr. Khalidi, enthusiastic about such a society, went to the Palestine Government to get permission, as a Government official, to participate. He was rebuked by the British director of education, who told him not to interfere in "politics" and the British-Arab-Jewish relations would be settled without societies.

MEET MR. CHATTLEY

In labor relations the mandatory government helped establish Arab trade-unions in cooperation with Arab employers who were delighted to limit the possibility of Jewish influence upon Arab laborers. Jewish influence might have resulted in demands by the Arab workers for high wages, better living, and better working conditions.

It is significant that one of the government people responsible for this kind of opposition to Arab-Jewish cooperation was a Mr. Chattley, member of the British Labor Party and formerly an official of one of the trade-unions in England.

Despite the efforts of the Palestine government, the Arab workers and the Jewish workers still go out on strike together.

There is a simple solution to the problem of the Arab versus the Jew. It is not to bring in more British or American troops now demanded by Attlee but to get the British out of Palestine. The Arabs and Jews will solve their problems and reach an understanding much sooner alone than they will with hostile troops and police around them.

Each committee sent by the British to solve the problem of Palestine creates new friction between the two groups. The Anglo-American committee helped sharpen that friction by forcing the two protagonists to develop their case like the two Biblical women carrying the baby to Solomon.

CIVIL WAR LOOMS

Certainly today, with the testimony still burning in the minds of the people of Palestine, there is tension, and on the part of the leaders like Jamal Husseini there is a determination to create some trouble.

But this trouble will be nothing compared to the civil war which may break out this summer if the British succeed in their obvious program to scuttle the report, make the members of the commission look like a group of monkeys, and leave President Truman, having asked Attlee for the 100,000 which the commission gave him, now holding the well-known British bag.

HOLY LAND A CONCENTRATION CAMP—BRITISH JUSTICE IS RULE BY GUN

(By Ruth Gruber)

Everybody has heard about British justice and fair play. But ask the people who live outside England under British rule. Ask the Hindus. Ask the Indonesians. Ask the Irish. Ask the Palestinians.

I've just come from Palestine. The people there don't think the British know what justice is. Palestine is a concentration camp to them. They live under a group of men who have never raised a blade of grass in Palestine, and who are the master race. They rule not by justice but by tanks and guns, some of which are said to be American lend-lease.

Ireland, after the last war was a prison, where human beings had few civil liberties, where people could break into your house and search for arms under any pretext, where you could be hauled into jail and tortured brutally.

Palestine now is the same kind of prison. It has strict curfew laws, so relentless that even Moshe Shertok, the highly efficient head of the political department of the Jewish Agency, in effect a foreign minister, was arrested like a common thief and kept locked up. He had committed the crime of driving into Jerusalem after the curfew in order to keep an early morning appointment with His Excellency, the British High Commissioner.

Emergency laws were inevitably passed in Palestine during the war. But instead of relaxing them, now that the war is over, the British have made them more rigid.

Anyone found harboring an illegal immigrant is subject to arrest.

Anyone found in possession of arms is subject to the death penalty.

A man may be given 3 years' imprisonment for harboring a criminal. But if he harbors his sister, who entered the country illegally, he is liable to imprisonment for 8 years.

If a man is a member of a club or welfare society, and some member of his club commits an offense against the laws of Palestine, every other member of the club is liable to the same punishment as the offender.

Any policeman and soldier can arrest you under suspicion of threatening law and order. And you can be deported.

Jews can purchase less than 5 percent of the land of Palestine. Jews are tortured in concentration camps in Palestine, and political prisoners are deported to Eritrea where they live under incredible conditions and until a few weeks ago were guarded by Sudanese.

Local censorship of newspapers is so rigid that each newspaper must send its galley proofs to the censor before it dares go to press.

In Ireland during the Irish-English conflict, almost everyone agreed that the Sinn Feiners included the best elements in the country. In Palestine almost everyone agrees that the people in the Haganah, the underground resistance movement, represent the most intelligent, idealistic, and unselfish people in the land. Sinn Fein and Haganah are parallel in the youth of their members.

An American woman in Palestine who had become a kind of mother to American and British servicemen during the war told me, "These young people who fight the police are the sons and daughters of our best families. You can't blame them. The British have driven them to despair."

A farmer in a kibbutz, a collective farm, told me proudly, "My 17-year-old son is one of the leaders."

During the testimony before the Palestine inquiry commission, Dr. Judah Magnes, president of the Hebrew University, cried "Some of the people who go out with bombs and guns are some of our most idealistic youth. They do it to save their people."

As in Ireland, so now in Palestine, the people deplore not the terrorism but the necessity for terrorism created by the British. In both countries, the British unified the people into a solid fighting anti-British force by penalizing every human being in the land.

REBEL FOR IMMIGRATION

The Irish rebelled for political freedom, the Jews are rebelling for immigration, to save the remnants of their people.

In their struggle for freedom and independence, the Irish then, as the Jews now, had the sympathy of the American people. This good will was a potent factor in gaining liberation from the British. The Jews hope that American generosity will not forsake them in their struggle for survival against a cynical British imperialism that has learned nothing and forgotten nothing.

The parallel between the two countries, black and tan Ireland and black and tan Palestine, has a note of hope.

The Irish ultimately won their independence.

Appointment of Resident Commissioner Piñero Praised by Press

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, earlier today I expressed my personal pleasure over the appointment by President Truman of Resident Commissioner JESÚS T. PIÑERO of Puerto Rico as Governor of his home island, consequently I am especially pleased to see the selection meet with general approval in the press of the United States.

Under leave to do so I herewith include an editorial which appeared in the Washington (D. C.) Post of this morning, voicing approval of Mr. PIÑERO's appointment. The article follows:

SOUND CHOICE

President Truman's selection of JESÚS T. PIÑERO to be Governor of Puerto Rico deserves as much commendation among Americans on the mainland as it is sure to receive from the people of the island to whom he will represent the majesty of the United States. Mr. PIÑERO is at the present time the resident commissioner of his people in Washington; he was elected to that office by overwhelming popular vote. His appointment to the governorship was urged upon the President almost unanimously by the Puerto Rican Legislature. Thus there is assurance that there will be harmony and cooperation between the legislative and executive branches of the island government; and this should be a real contribution toward solution of Puerto Rico's difficult economic problems.

To the rest of the world, and to the Western Hemisphere in particular, Mr. Truman's decision cannot fail to seem a practical application of the liberal colonial policies which this country has preached—and lately practiced. It is an extension of the democratic principle and of the idea for which we have always stood of fostering self-government among dependent peoples. It is a demonstration of good will which will bind Puerto Ricans to us more closely than ever. In making the choice, the President set aside political considerations for those of statesmanship. The decision is as wise as it is generous.

Last Chance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADAM C. POWELL, JR.
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Voice:

LAST CHANCE

(By Representative ADAM C. POWELL, Jr.)

America is not ready for the postwar world. It is true that it has the blueprints ready for reconversion to normal peacetime activity, but also it intends to reconvert to normal peacetime pseudo-democracy. On this basis America is doomed and with it Britain and the whole fabric of a so-called white man's world. The best thing that could happen would be the passing of this world. The white man's world has stood for nationalism, racism, militarism, oppression and barbarism toward whites as well. It has been a veneered world of material things—skyscrapers, dynamos, streamlined trains and flying ships but profoundly and basically it is now a decadent society.

In the early days of September 1944, as our troops were poised on the boundary of Germany, instructions were issued to the American forces of occupation. They provided that in breaking up of the Nazi organization there would be "no discrimination on account of race, creed or color." In the language of a great American, writing in the Chicago Sun, "How ironic when we are instituting in enemy countries customs we are not willing to follow at home. These democratic rules will have to be enforced by an army that has segregation and discrimination in its own ranks, many of whose officers have insisted that Americans be discriminated against on account of race and color in England and other friendly countries where troops are stationed. These democratic rules will be forced on Germany by a country that still has segregation by law in 17 of its states, and discrimination by practice in every State. It is fine that we are insisting on equality and decency in our relations with Germany. But does America regard democracy as only an export commodity? Is it too precious to use at home?"

Secretary Henry Wallace once remarked to me, "Neither God nor nature will stand very long man's inhumanity to man." The patience of God has been worn to the breaking point. Nature has been taxed to the limit of its endurance. The hour has finally arrived when no individual group, race, nation, or power can continue to exploit and subjugate any other part of humanity and remain unchallenged.

The John Foster Dulles Commission on a Just and Durable Peace appointed by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ of America stated as one of the fundamentals for the future world:

"We believe that that government which derives its just powers from the consent of the governed is the truest expression of the rights and dignity of man. This requires that we seek autonomy for all subject and colonial peoples. Until that shall be realized, the task of colonial government is no longer one of exclusive national concern. It must be recognized as a common responsibility of mankind, to be carried out in the interests of the colonial peoples by the most appropriate form of organization. This would, in many cases, make colonial government a task of international collaboration for the benefit of colonial peoples who would themselves have a voice in their government. As the agencies for the promotion of world-wide and economic security become effective, the moral, social, and material welfare of colonial populations can be more fully realized.

"We believe that the right of all men to pursue work of their own choosing and to enjoy security from want and oppression is not limited by race, color, or creed. The rights and liberties of racial and religious minorities in all lands should be recognized and safeguarded.

"The peace must proclaim the goal of autonomy for subject peoples, and it must establish international organization to assure and to supervise the realization of that end.

"There is a ferment among peoples who are now subject to alien rule. That will make durable peace unattainable unless such peoples are satisfied that they can achieve self-rule without passive or active resistance to the now constituted authorities. We realize that autonomy, in certain cases, is not now desired, and in other cases is presently impractical. But judgments as to this tend to be warped, and certainly are suspect, when made by the governing power itself. There must be international agencies, which embrace persons free from the self-interest which comes from identification with the particular governing power, and which are charged with the duty to see that pledges of ultimate autonomy are honored, and that, in the meanwhile, there is no exploitation for alien ends."

Pearl Buck, one of the great international minds and hearts of this day, openly declared:

"We must realize, we citizens of the United States, and this whether Britain realizes it or not, that a world based on former principles of empire and imperial behavior is now impossible. It cannot exist. We must make clear our determination for real democracy for all peoples with mutual responsibility demanded of all to fulfill its conditions. Nor can we postpone such decision for democracy by saying, 'Let's win this war first.' We cannot even win this war without convincing our colored allies—who are most of our allies—that we are not fighting for ourselves as continuing superior over colored peoples. The deep patience of colored peoples is at an end. Everywhere among them there is the same resolve for freedom and equality that white Americans and British have but it is a grimmer resolve, for it includes the determination to be rid of white rule and exploitation and white race prejudice, and nothing will weaken this will. We can of course utilize the force of this will if we have the wisdom. Nothing would so nerve our colored allies abroad to put forth their whole effort now as the conviction that white leaders mean what they say about democracy."

Addressing the jubilee meeting in 1944 of the Foreign Missions Conference of North America at Chicago, Dr. Channing Tobias said: "Any plan for the future peace of the world that does not include race relationship as a major consideration is not only lacking in realism, but is a failure from the beginning. * * * But I am absolutely certain there will be trouble down the road if the victorious nations, following this war, insist upon holding unbroken the ring of white dominance now encircling the darker peoples of the earth."

No one has summed up the problem and stated the choices so clearly as Edwin R. Embree in his address, Democracy and Race Relations, delivered at the National Conference of Social Work at Cleveland, Ohio, on May 26, 1944. Embree is the president of the Rosenwald Fund. By no stretch of the imagination is he a radical. He has at his finger tips millions of dollars and the best crew of trained sociologists, black and white, in the country. He knows more about race relations than any other white man, and for that matter, most Negroes. This address in days to come will be considered one of the most important speeches ever delivered. It received unusual publicity in the press of the Nation but because of its direct connection with the thesis of this book it is imperative that it be set down as fully as possible.

"Democracy in human relations is so simple and natural that it is amazing we do not practice it. It is as inefficient as it is absurd to hamper our intercourse and business by artificial rules of caste.

"If we tried to explain our racial and religious discriminations to a man from Mars, he would regard us as hopelessly mad. He would be baffled by the conflict between our principles of freedom and equality and our practice of restriction and caste, between our Sunday professions of brotherhood and our everyday habits of prejudice.

"A man from Mars might simply be amused or amazed at our queer behavior in normal times. But he would be appalled to see us carry the inefficiencies of caste into a life-and-death struggle, to see us carry antidemocratic practices into a war which we are waging to save democracy. And we, too, should be appalled.

"Our visitor from Mars—now wholly flummoxed—would have to conclude that these strange white Americans would sooner sacrifice their sons and brothers and husbands than sacrifice their prejudices.

"Negroes are the largest of our disadvantaged minorities—one-tenth of the entire Nation. They have suffered the cruelest hurts throughout our history and even today suffer peculiar discriminations. Our treatment of Negroes is the most glaring discrepancy between American practice and the American creed. Unless we can bolster democracy at this point, the whole structure will crumble.

"Fifty years ago, this was a lowly group scarcely able to take its place as a full partner in American life. That is no longer true. Restrictions and discriminations today are a cultural lag—a failure of our attitudes and actions to keep up with the changed conditions.

"The rise of the brown Americans is a part of the general upsurge of colored peoples the world over. For 300 years (a very brief period in the eons of human history), the white men of western Europe and North America ruled the earth.

"Having material power, it was natural for us to suppose we were superior to all people in every way. So we built up the pleasant illusion that white men were the natural rulers of civilization and that all colored peoples were by nature subordinates. The balance was radically shifted during the periods of the First and Second World Wars.

"We do not yet see the shift that is taking place. Again there is a cultural lag, a delay between changes and our adaptation to them. That lag is conspicuous—and may become tragic—in the attitudes that the white nations still hold toward the colored peoples.

"The United Nations that will win this war and control the new world include about 250,000,000 'western white men' of the United States and the British Commonwealth. They include also 450,000,000 yellow Chinese; 350,000,000 brown people of India; 150,000,000 dark peoples of south Asia, the East Indies, and the other Pacific islands; 120,000,000 Latin-Americans, many of whom are proud of their African and Indian ancestry as well as of their European blood; such millions from the Near East and Africa as can free themselves for the struggle; and 190,000,000 of Soviet Russians who are passionately committed not only to economic equality, but to equality of all racial and cultural groups. The white man of the Western World is offered his last chance for equal status in world society. If he accepts equality he can hold a self-respecting place—maybe a leading place—in the new order. And he may continue to contribute much in science, in industry, and in political maturity. But if the western white man persists in trying to run the show, in exploiting the whole earth, in treating the hundreds of millions of his neighbors as inferiors, then the fresh might of the billion and a half nonwhite, nonwestern people may, in a surging rebellion, smash him into nonentity."

This is the mood of the times. Farsighted world leaders have sensed it. The handwriting is on the wall. Western society came to power on the backs of the darker peoples of the earth, and it must now depend upon them not only for its cultural survival but for its individual survival.

What will the "white man's world" do? Continue on its suicidal way to end ingloriously in a form of mass harakiri? Try to stand outnumbered and ethically rotten against the fresh might of a billion and a half non-Western people? If it does, the white man is finished—that is, the old white man. A surging rebellion is on its way to which civil war II is only the prelude. The decision must be made by the American conscience. I place no faith in the present leadership, but I do in the common man. The white voice that will trumpet in the South and call the people from their shame and decay will not echo from the vaulted corridors of the capitol in Montgomery, Ala. Somewhere along a back road turning the wearily exhausted red clay with a broken plow, shoeless and in blue jeans, some white will catch a glimpse of the Glory Road that the blacks have gone up. He will sound the call, answering which, men will find a new world waiting for them. The trumpet call that will summon the new white man from the standards of "white man's civilization" may not be heard in gilded halls, but it will be heard across the fields and through the valleys, in sharecroppers' shacks, in mines and mills, on heaving seas wherever the common man precariously ekes out his meager existence.

The black man continues on his way. He plods wearily no longer—he is striding freedom road with the knowledge that if he hasn't got the world in a jug, at least he has the stopper in his hand. He wants to do his share to save the best that the world denied him. He is ready to throw himself into the struggle to make the dream of America become flesh and blood, bread and butter, freedom and equality. He walks conscious of the fact that he is no longer alone—no longer a minority. He is living in one world, tightly integrated, in which national boundaries have been dissolved by the magic influence of transportation. He wants civil war II to come to a close and soon. He does not want the day of victory to be obtained through violence and bloodshed. But of one thing he is positive. In the words of Sherwood Eddy, writing in his Pilgrimage of Ideas—"In the wrong way or in the right way, through violence or nonviolence, it will surely come." Glory Hallelujah!

Veterans' Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ED. V. IZAC

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, I feel that all veterans, both men and women, who have faithfully served our country during the time of war should have made available to them full information regarding benefits provided for them by the Congress, and therefore, at the end of my remarks I am inserting a digest of such benefits.

During my 10 years in Congress, I have sponsored and helped to push through Congress much of the major veterans' legislation which included the well-known GI bill of rights and my fleet reserve bill, which will be applicable to all men of the service; giving these veterans the highest retainer and retired-pay rates in history. This bill, if enacted, would serve to encourage young men to make a career of the naval and military service.

I was instrumental in the enactment of a measure, now a public law, which among other things provides for retired pay of naval personnel to be based upon the pay of the highest grade, permanent or temporary, held by them during World War II.

We have recently passed a pay raise bill which nearly doubles the pay of enlisted personnel in service.

Four recent veteran bills are now on the President's desk for his approval, which will undoubtedly become law before the Seventy-ninth Congress adjourns: First, a general 20-percent increase of all pensions for veterans of World Wars I and II; second, increases the Federal burial allowance from $100 to $150; third, amends the National Service Life Insurance Act for World War II veterans, permitting payment in lump sums and other additional benefits; fourth, a bill to allow a 20-percent increase to certain Spanish War veterans and increases the monthly rates of pensions to widows of Spanish War veterans, including widows of Philippine Insurrection and China Relief Expedition.

DIGEST OF VETERANS' BENEFITS

ELIGIBILITY

A veteran must have served in the active military or naval service on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to the termination of the present war. He must have been discharged or released under conditions other than dishonorable after active service of 90 days or more or because of an injury or disability incurred in line of duty.

MONEY

1. Mustering-out pay: Service personnel up through the rank of captain in the Army and Marine Corps and senior lieutenant in the Navy and Coast Guard are entitled to: (a) $300 mustering-out pay if they have performed active service for at least 60 days outside the United States; or (b) $200 mustering-out pay if they have performed active service for at least 60 days no part of which was served outside of the United States; or (c) $100 for any active service less than 60 days.

2. Bonus: Public Law 268 repeals that portion of the law, which provided that any financial benefits received under the act would be deducted from any future bonus authorized.

3. Retirement pay: Service personnel on active duty for more than 30 days and disabled from disease or injury received in the line of duty are entitled to receive the same retirement pay as now provided for regular personnel of the service.

4. Pensions: Discharge or release from service under conditions other than dishonorable is a prerequisite to veteran's benefits. Any veteran having a 10 percent or more disability resulting from disease or injury incurred in or aggravated by war service will, if his application is approved, receive the following amount:

Percent of disability:	Amount payable per month
10	$11.50
20	23.00
30	34.50
40	46.00
50	57.50
60	69.00
70	80.50
80	92.00
90	103.50
Total disability	115.00

Eligibility for pensions for non-service-connected disabilities requires honorable discharge and 90 days wartime service—or if period of service was less than 90 days, have been discharged for disability incurred in service in the line of duty. The disability must be permanently and totally disabling and not due to the veterans' own willful misconduct.

Any single veteran with an annual income of over $1,000, or any married veteran, or with dependent minor children, with an annual income over $2,500, is ineligible for non-service-connected disability pensions. This pension is $50 per month and is increased to $60 upon 10 years of continuous, permanent, total disability or upon reaching the age of 65.

5. Insurance: Service personnel are eligible for the cheapest and best life insurance attainable, the National Service Life Insurance. This is term insurance for 8 years, convertible into ordinary life, 20-payment life, or 30-payment life policies.

Insurance that has lapsed may be reinstated by the veteran, either within 6 months after the date of separation from active service, or within 3 months after date of lapse, whichever is larger, by payment of only 2 monthly premiums without interest.

6. Readjustment allowances: Unemployed veterans who register with an office of the United States Employment Service are entitled to a readjustment allowance of $20 per week while unemployed. An eligible veteran may receive such payments up to a maximum of 1 year, depending on length of service. Self-employed veterans with net earnings of less than $100 per month may receive an allowance amounting to the difference between net earnings and $100 in any month, up to a maximum of 1 year, also depending on length of service.

7. Loans: Veterans have up to 10 years after official end of the war in which to make application for guaranteed loan at no more than 4 percent interest. These loans are automatically guaranteed if made in accordance with the provisions of the act and if the amount does not exceed the appraisal made by an appraiser of the Veterans' Administration.

Any loan on real estate may be guaranteed up to a maximum guaranty of $4,000 of the loan, with the Government guaranteeing 50 percent of the total loan up to the maximum amount. The business loan guaranty limit remains at $2,000, or 50 percent. Real-estate loans may be amortized over a period up to 25 years, and farm realty loans up to 40 years. Maturity on non-real-estate loans may not exceed 10 years.

Proceeds of a loan may be used to purchase a lot in connection with home construction. Loans may be made for all ordinary farming purchases, and any normal business enterprise, and so that existing indebtedness in default may be refinanced in connection with all types of eligible loans.

8. Income-tax exemptions: Special provisions have been enacted by Congress for the tax benefit of veterans. These benefits include (a) $1,500 of active service pay is excluded from gross income for the taxable year 1943 and until the termination of the present war is proclaimed; (b) mustering-out pay is excluded from gross income for the taxable year of 1944 and later years.

JOBS

1. Employment placement and assistance: The United States Employment Service and the Veterans' Placement Service Board are directed to cooperate in seeing that all veterans, able and willing to work, obtain employment. This assistance includes employment counseling.

2. Employment preference: Preference in job referrals through the United States Employment Service is available to veterans under regulations adopted by the Veterans' Placement Service Board, carrying out the direction of the GI bill of rights that the veteran receive "the maximum job opportunity in the field of gainful employment."

3. Civil-service preferences: Veterans with service-connected disabilities or in receipt of pensions, disability retirement benefits, or compensation from the Federal Government, receive an additional 10 points on their civil-service examination ratings.

A 5-point preference is allowed to veterans not disabled.

These preferences will place veterans' names above all other names on the civil-service list except for professional or scientific positions paying over $3,000 a year.

4. Restoration to former Federal job: A veteran who held a permanent, probational, or probational-indefinite civil-service job when called to active service with the armed forces is entitled to mandatory reemployment in his former position, or one of like seniority, status, and pay, provided he has satisfactorily completed his period of service, is still qualified to perform the duties of his position, and applies for restoration within 90 days after separation from active service or discharge from the hospital.

5. Other civil-service benefits: The civil-service rule that not more than two members of a family, living in the same house, may hold a Federal civil-service position does not apply in case of a person entitled to veteran preference.

BUSINESS AND HOME AIDS

1. Small-business aids: Assistance is provided to veterans in establishing small businesses through (a) loans not connected with the GI bill of rights for worth-while manufacturing projects: (b) assistance in obtaining surplus war materials that will be helpful to the planned business venture; and (c) supplying of technical assistance.

2. Material priorities: Priorities for materials are granted by the Civilian Production Administration and the Office of Price Administration to veterans.

3. Purchase of surplus property: Veterans can purchase surplus property to set themselves up and help to maintain themselves in business without buying through regular dealer channels or paying a profit to anyone.

4. Housing priorities: Priorities for the construction or purchase of new houses have been established for veterans in obtaining homes under $10,000.

5. Legal assistance: The American Bar Association has adopted a program of legal assistance to veterans and members of their families.

EDUCATION AND TRAINING

1. Education: Any eligible veteran may receive 1 year of education or of training plus additional education (up to a maximum of 4 years), for total length of active service. There is no age limit nor is there any need to show that a veteran's education was interrupted by war service.

The time during which a course may be initiated is within 4 years after discharge or the end of the war, whichever is later, and the time limit for completion of the course is 9 years after the end of the war.

Short intensive courses may be undertaken and the additional cost prorated against the period of eligibility to which the veteran is entitled at the rate of $500 per school year. No such short course may cost more than $500. Veterans may apply to take a correspondence course but they are entitled to no subsistence allowance. One-fourth of the elapsed time used in pursuing such a course is charged against the veteran's period of eligibility. Total amount payable for correspondence courses for any veteran is limited to $500.

Monthly subsistence allowance, while in school or training, is $65 for veterans without dependents and $90 for veterans with dependents.

2. Vocational rehabilitation of disabled veterans: The purpose of vocational rehabilitation is to restore the employability which has been lost by virtue of a handicap due to a disability incurred in or aggravated by service.

Vocational training involving more than 4 years of training may be begun by disabled veterans, subject to approval of the Veterans' Administration. The time for completing such training is 9 years after the end of the war.

Disabled veterans in vocational rehabilitation training are entitled to receive monthly subsistence allowance of $65 (without dependents) or $90 (with dependents) plus whatever pension they are entitled to by law. The minimum total amount such veteran may receive is set at $100 per month (without dependents) and $115 (with a dependent), plus $10 for the first child, $7 for each additional child, and $15 for any dependent parent. If the veteran would otherwise receive less than these minimum amounts, his allowance is raised to equal the minimum during the period of training and for 2 months thereafter.

HOSPITALIZATION AND DOMICILIARY CARE

1. Hospitalization: The Veterans' Administration provides hospitalization for any veteran of any war who was discharged under conditions other than dishonorable. Veterans with service-connected disabilities are given preference. Veterans with non-service-connected disabilities are eligible if a hospital bed is available and the veteran makes a sworn statement that he is unable to defray expenses of treatment.

The Veterans' Administration has been authorized and directed to expedite additional hospital construction and to establish all necessary administrative offices to make veterans' benefits more readily available.

2. Artificial limbs and prosthetic appliances: Provision has been made to insure ample funds for the Veterans' Administration to purchase prosthetic appliances for veterans and instruct them in the use of such appliances, including payment of any expense involved in the veterans' traveling to and from the center where the appliance is fitted and training given in its use.

3. Guide or seeing-eye dogs: Guide or seeing-eye dogs may be provided for the aid of blind veterans who are entitled to disability compensation or pensions for a service-connected disability under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, including payment of any expense involved in the veterans' traveling to and from the center to become adjusted to the dogs.

Blind veterans are also entitled to mechanical or electronic equipment to aid them in overcoming the handicap of blindness.

4. Domiciliary care: A veteran who is so disabled as to be unable to earn a living, and is without adequate means of support, may be admitted for home care to a facility of Veterans' Administration providing such accommodations.

Liberia in the Family of Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I was honored by Hon. Earl Snell, Governor of Oregon, when he requested that I represent him at the conference on Liberia sponsored by the Liberian Centennial Commission and the Howard University Summer School, which is in progress today. I had the pleasure of attending the conference and extending the felicitations and good will of Governor Snell. This conference is being held on the ninety-ninth anniversary of the founding of the Republic of Liberia. In these postwar days, while the world is facing the uncertainties of the future and the inability of the nations of the world to agree upon a program which will insure stable relations and a peaceful world, it is important to recall that the nation of Liberia for almost 100 years has maintained its existence as one of the family of nations, and is one of the smaller nations which is entitled to the consideration and respect of all nations to the end that its honorable existence may be continued down through the years in the furtherance of tolerance and good will among all men. It is to be hoped that this conference now taking place will result in an enlightened program for world peace and international cooperation which will aid materially in attaining the objectives which we are all hoping will be achieved in the present peace negotiations following the end of World War II.

Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I include an article by Raymond W. Logan, entitled "Liberia in the Family of Nations," as follows:

LIBERIA IN THE FAMILY OF NATIONS

(By Rayford W. Logan)

"International cooperation on an enlightened and honorable basis is now in formative process as an instrument of world unity and progress. Liberia is sensitive to the role she should play in the cast of the family of nations.

"Cooperation for purposes here concerned might be briefly defined as sympathetic understanding, candor, and progressive, creative action. An early disposal of the awareness of 'skeletons in the closet' of every nation should focus attention not so much to the past but the present and future.

"The Liberian centennial-victory exposition to be held in Monrovia 1947–49 has for its theme "West Africa in the World at Peace." Dr. Logan's paper serves well not only to interpret the Liberian centennial-victory exposition program, as an American sees it, but also to focus attention upon the victory exposition of this small West African nation as an instrument for good." (Hilyard R. Robinson.)

The centennial of the declaration of independence of Liberia commemorates the establishment of a nation whose history is unique in many respects and unusual in many others.

Liberia is the only nation founded in modern times, at any rate, as a home for ex-slaves. It is still the only Republic in Africa in which Negroes control their own government. It is one of two independent nations in the world in which this is true. During World War II, Liberia, with the exception of Ceylon, India, furnished more crude rubber to the United Nations than any other country. As an air base through which there passed at one time as many as 17,000 bombers a month at the height of the fighting in north Africa, it contributed materially to the defeat of the Axis forces at what General Marshall has called one of the most crucial stages of the war and thereby helped to make possible the invasion of the so-called soft underbelly of Europe. Since Liberia is the closest spot for the trans-Atlantic flight to and from Brazil, it is destined to play an even greater role than Dakar in the defense of the Western Hemisphere.

Since Liberia was founded as a refuge for ex-slaves and freedmen from the United States, its early history was fraught with many difficulties. The Government of the United States provided an initial fund of $100,000 for the settlement of Negroes in Liberia, but thereafter gave very little financial aid to its ward. Not many Negroes left the United States to help build up the country. The American Colonization Society which for 25 years administered Liberia has since that time gradually faded into the background so that today it is difficult to determine the extent of its interest or its activities.

Inasmuch as slaveholders controlled the Government of the United States for most of the early period of Liberian history after its colonization by the black "pilgrim fathers," it was not until after the South had seceded that the United States recognized the independence of Liberia. Both France and England preceded the United States in this recognition. It is not amiss to point out that it was Abraham Lincoln who took the lead in the amende honorable on the part of the United States. On December 3, 1861, the Great Emancipator sent the following message to Congress: "If any good reason exists why we should persevere longer in withholding our recognition of the independence and sovereignty of Haiti and Liberia, I am unable to discern it." As a result of this suggestion to Congress, the necessary legislation permitted Lincoln to appoint commissioners to Haiti and Liberia on June 5, 1862. Thus 15 years had elapsed between the Liberian declaration of independence and recognition by the United States.

The period following the recognition by the United States is frequently referred to as "The golden age of Liberia." Her prosperity was in no way directly connected with that recognition. Rather it was due to the fact that Liberian coffee, in particular, commanded a high price abroad. But toward the close of the century Brazilian coffee began to supplant Liberian coffee since that time Liberia has suffered from the lack of an adequate export market. Thus, the failure of Liberia to develop a trade that would permit the Government to perform the necessary social services has been due primarily to changes in international commerce that have similarly militated against the progress of other nations. Brazil, for example, which replaced Liberia in the coffee trade, found her rubber trade taken over by the Dutch East Indies and the Malay Peninsula.

Moreover, Liberia found herself the victim of encroachments on her territory by the imperial powers that held the neighboring colonies. The United States found it necessary repeatedly to indicate its concern for the maintenance of Liberian sovereignty. "But," according to Samuel Flagg Bemis, perhaps the most distinguished authority on American foreign policy, "at no time would the United States acknowledge legitimate paternity of this foundling which it had left on Africa's doorstep." In fact, when the Government of the United States was disposed, shortly after the First World War, to grant a loan of $5,000,000 which would have permitted Liberia to undertake a program of economic development, a misguided fear that some bankers in Wall Street would profit thereby led to the rejection of the proposed loan. On the other hand, when Prime Minister Hertzog of the Union of South Africa proposed in 1933 that Germany be given a mandate over Liberia in order to evade Hitler's demands for the return of Germany's former colonies in Africa, the United States rather promptly recognized the new government of President Barclay—thereby perhaps warning Hitler that he was not to be appeased at the expense of the Negro Republic.

It is thus clear that both Liberia's economic progress and her survival as an independent nation have been intimately connected with international developments. Perhaps even more today than in the past, Liberia's development and survival as an independent nation will be closely connected with world events. One need offer no apology for this fact, since practically all small and indeed many large nations are similarly circumstanced. That Liberia is determined to maintain her independent existence is seen in the statement of the chairman of the Liberian delegation to the United Nations Conference at San Francisco on May 1, 1945. Mr. Simpson declared: "It is also the view of the Liberian delegation that whatever study eventually may be given to the economic, social, and other humanitarian problems relating to members of the United Nations, envisaged in paragraph 3, chapter 1, of the proposals, the principle should emerge and be made crystal clear that this should not imply that a nation or the General Assembly may either interfere or intervene in the internal affairs of another state upon the assumption or decision that certain social or economic needs or reforms are desirable for that state. The state itself must reserve the right to determine the necessity for any such action; otherwise it would be relegated to the status of a dependency." It would seem to this writer that these words might well be termed Liberia's second declaration of independence, that they merit the same high esteem by all lovers of liberty that has been bestowed upon the closing words of its declaration of independence in 1847. The appeal at that time stated: "In the name of humanity and virtue and religion—in the name of the Great God, our common Creator, and our common Judge, we appeal to the nations of Christendom, and earnestly and respectfully ask of them, that they will regard us with sympathy and friendly consideration to which the peculiarities of our condition entitle us, and to extend to us that comity which marks the friendly intercourse of civilized and independent communities."

Although this appeal did not result in the sympathetic cooperation that it invoked, Liberia has managed to survive throughout the machine-age period of its independence. Its second declaration of independence was proclaimed to the assembled statesmen of most of the nations of the world about 4 months before the world entered upon the atomic age. By one of those strange coincidences of history that have led some historians to believe that there exists a superhuman power which uses these coincidences to remind men of their opportunities and obligations, Liberia will be the first nation in the atomic age to celebrate the centennial of its independence. For the manner in which the powerful nations of the world will apply the high principles of the United Nations Charter to Liberia will be one of the acid tests of the sincerity of those pronouncements and of the possibility of the United Nations organization to save civilization in the race between the destructive powers of the atomic bomb and the curative powers of the recognition of the right of all nations and peoples to equality, "without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion."

On the one hand, it is indisputably evident that wars among or between the dominant nations of the world have aided Liberia. It took the secession of the Southern States and the American Civil War to bring the recognition by the United States of the independence of Liberia. The Second World War brought to Liberia the greatest prosperity that the Republic has known in modern times. But neither Liberia nor other small and weak nations desire their well-being to be a byproduct of the suffering of millions of other people. Liberia hopes that her future development will be founded upon peace and cooperation and not upon war and the destruction of material resources that could be used for the almost fabulous development of the most handicapped nations.

According to reliable estimates, this Second World War has cost us $1,000,000,000,000. The annual revenue of Liberia is a little more than a million dollars. It would seem to this writer it proclaims its intention, on the occasion of this centennial, to demonstrate to the world that black men can develop an independent nation which will destroy the legend that black men are inherently inferior. Does this suggestion lay us open to the accusation of being beggars for Liberia? Not at all. The United States owes much of its development in the nineteenth century to the capital of foreign nations and to the strong arms and the fertile brains of millions of immigrants. Liberia lacks many of the natural resources that have helped to make the United States the most powerful nation in the world today. But if the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations will formulate a sound program of international cooperation by which the more fortunate nations of the world will contribute to the upbuilding of their less fortunate neighbors, they will help Liberia to achieve a greater prosperity and a higher standard of living than it has known in time of war and will at the same time help to lay the foundations of a just and lasting peace for all peoples.

The airplane has made all nations neighbors. One can soon leave Monrovia in the morning and have a late lunch or an early dinner on the same day in Brazil. It takes less time today to go by plane from New York to Monrovia than in the days of George Washington it took to go from New York to Mount Vernon by stagecoach. But rich neighbors almost inevitably have a feeling of superiority toward their poor neighbors. It is precisely this feeling of superiority, as this last war has all too tragically demonstrated, that affords a pretext for war. If civilization is going to win the race against the atomic bomb, all nations of the world must cooperate in removing this as well as all other pretexts and excuses for war. That is why the centennial of Liberian independence at this particular time has a world-wide significance. It is, in a word, a dramatic challenge to the world to save itself from its own Frankenstein.

Since the United States is the most powerful nation in the world and since Liberia has been termed the "ward" or the "foundling" of the United States, the obligations devolving upon the Government and the people of the United States are commensurately greater than those of other nations. It is therefore highly appropriate that the establishment of Liberian diplomatic representation in the United States will coincide approximately with this centennial. It is further highly appropriate, therefore, that the initial foreign public presentation of the Liberian centennial-victory exposition program should be made in the capital of the United States to arouse the interest of the outside world in Liberia's centennial. The stated objectives of the centennial will surely command the allegiance of all nations and peoples who have on other occasions demonstrated their willingness to cooperate in the development of other nations and peoples who have a definite program of action and a sincere determination to execute that program. In the words of these stated objectives:

"This centennial is designed to show in a concrete way how the forces latent in the provinces of the country can be effectively harnessed, unified, and utilized to the best interest and progress of the nation; and, moreover, to coordinate and integrate the several activities presently carried on in the country so as to achieve that over-all prosperity so essential to its economic life.

"To achieve this end much realistic planning on a comprehensive scale will be necessary and the national government, mindful of that fact, is exerting every energy through its appointed agencies to collect and assemble a broad scope of significant facts requisite to the attainment of the designated objectives.

"Improved health conditions are a primary objective, with a view toward which, cooperation, on the part of the government and with the medical agencies of the United States now in the country, has been established and is in the process of development.

"Domestic and foreign trade are essential factors in the economic and social stability of any country. Conditions of climate and other circumstances natural to Liberia provide agricultural, mineral, and other resources of a type well adapted not only to meet many of the needs and desires of its own people but also to meet various demands of peoples outside of its borders."

In addition to these stated objectives the Liberian Government has recently given proof of its determination to begin its second hundred years of independence with evidence of its faith in the democratic processes of government. The second session of the fortieth legislature early in 1945 adopted by joint resolution a constitutional amendment revising the system of representation and extending the rights of universal suffrage to citizens of the provinces. Each of the hinterland's three provinces, when the amendment goes into effect, will have the right to send one representative to the national legislature. All citizens of these provinces 23 years of age and over who are the owners of a hut and pay the hut tax will have the right to vote. The amendment has been approved by the electorate, and it is momentarily expected that President Tubman will announce the date when the amendment will go into effect.

While this amendment does not go the whole way in providing for a democratic form of government, is it an augury for that consummation. As the French say, "C'est le premier pas qui coute"—It is the first step that costs or counts. As the educational and economic life of the country improves, it may confidently be expected that the suffrage will be correspondingly enlarged and the representation of the hinterland provinces increased. There is thus a definite connection between the cooperation of the more fortunate nations and the carefully devised educational, social, and economic program of Liberia on the one hand and the democratization of Liberia on the other. Long before the second centennial of Liberian independence shall be commemorated, Liberia should take her place among the truly democratic nations of the world. This first centennial is therefore not only a challenge to the good will of the world but also a pledge to the world that Liberia will be increasingly worthy of that good will.

But this pledge is also a challenge to the world. If Liberia demonstrates that "government of the people, by the people, and for the people" can work in Liberia, other nations should be encouraged to adopt similar measures. Just as the Liberian declaration of independence in 1847 was in effect a proclamation that black men could found an independent nation in Africa, just so this constitutional amendment on the eve of the centennial is in effect a pronouncement that a truly democratic government of black men in Africa can succeed.

While all Americans have a peculiar responsibility and obligation to cooperate in making this experiment succeed, American Negroes, have an inescapable responsibility and obligation. It was an American Negro, Paul Cuffee, of Massachusetts, who took the first boatload of American Negroes to Africa. The first president of Liberia, Joseph Jenkins Roberts, was, appropriately enough, from Virginia. American Negroes are engaged in many of the activities that are helping to build up Liberia and the technical director of the centennial exposition is an American Negro. But it is high time that a larger number of American Negro technicians participate on the spot in the rejuvenation of Liberia. At the close of the nineteenth century, Rudyard Kipling encouraged young white men to participate in the expansion of European civilization by appealing to them to "Take up the white man's burden." For to change slightly the words of Kipling, "By all ye will or whisper, by all ye leave or do, your black Liberian brothers will weigh your God and you."

There could be no more appropriate time than now for all of us, and most particularly Negro Americans, to pledge our determination to utilize in some way the skills and knowledge and wealth that we have gained in this country and advancing the cause of Liberia. By so doing, we will advance our own cause since, rightly or wrongly, many persons in this country and in other parts of the world evaluate our capacities in terms of the accomplishments of Negroes in other parts of the world. The Liberian centennial is therefore a milestone not only in the history of Liberia but a landmark on the long road from the degradation of slavery to the recognition of the brotherhood of all mankind.

Shall It Be Communism or Shall It Be a Free America?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to a statement made by George Mason, of Virginia, more than a century and a half ago which is timely right now. When writing the first bill of rights in this country, he placed at its head this sentiment:

No free government or the blessing of liberty can be preserved to any people but by * * * frequent recurrence to fundamental principles.

Benjamin Franklin in September 1776, in his bill of rights for Pennsylvania, emphasized that "a frequent recurrence of fundamental principles * * * is absolutely necessary to preserve the blessings of liberty and keep a government free."

John Adams in 1780, in the Massachusetts bill of rights, stressed the same thought in these words: "A frequent recurrence to the principles of the Constitution * * * is absolutely necessary to preserve the advantages of liberty and to maintain a free government. The people * * * have a right," said Mr. Adams, "to require of their lawgivers and magistrates an exact and constant observance of them."

I say, Mr. Speaker, there must be a return to fundamental principles in government otherwise this Republic will degenerate into a species of anarchy which can end only in a totalitarian state with a resulting loss of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness guaranteed to a free people under our constitutional government. Under leave to extend, I am inserting an editorial by Commander Wendell Phillips Dodge in the Marine News, July 1946, as follows:

The pirates of old knew what to do with those among them bent upon stirring up strife. The old custom of making them walk the plank over the side of the ship never was more needed than now. Our ship of state, otherwise the State Department of the United States of America, might well make use of the Soviet's "no, no" veto with resounding echoes reminiscent of the great Russian basso, Feodor Chaliapin. Volga Boatman pre-Soviet were far, far different from the present lot of international troublemakers. They were content with their lot, even if a hard one—happy in songs of a free Russia even under the czars in comparison with the land that became Lenin-and-Trotskyized for Stalin to take over and "no, no" the United States, Great Britain, and the rest of the world.

Yes, the United States of America, by holding back sending much-needed supplies, munitions, ships, and men to our real war against Japan for some two full years, diverting virtually everything to the Soviets to make it altogether possible for them to stem the Nazi tidal wave that engulfed in short order almost all there was strategically to Soviet Russia, made them strong. The Soviets didn't do it, couldn't do it, by themselves. So why all this cockiness on their part now?

Of course, they betray themselves and their known military weakness even as of today by their blustering bragging about possessing the mightiest army, the most powerful in the world. Bosh.

It is regrettable that so many of our own radio news commentators and newspaper correspondents, largely pinks not of the parlor but more of Greenwich Village nightery variety, should have swallowed the Soviet's sharply aimed propaganda and kept on telling the world how strong the mighty, unbeatable Russians were all through the war. The plain, simple truth is that they were badly beaten and rolled back virtually to the walls of the Kremlin itself, which most certainly would have fallen to Hitler's hordes but for the all-out aid provided by the United States of America which these same scheming Soviets aim to destroy in order to take over. Awaken, America—and before it is too late.

The maritime strike, following close after the steel strike and the railroad strike in the carefully planned Soviet pattern, now merely averted for a brief breathing spell, is by all odds the most serious strike of all to threaten the very foundations of freedom here and throughout the world.

The answer is to make Harry Bridges and Pal Joey walk the plank—and to pack the Commies in the maritime service, afloat and ashore, off to that bright spot of higher wages and shorter working hours, Soviet Russia.

Hark. Do we hear a roaring veto chorus shouting "No, No"? Rather.

SIGNIFICANCE OF GOVERNMENT-DICTATED TERMS TO OUR SHIP OPERATORS

Frank J. Taylor, president of the American Merchant Marine Institute, Inc., chairman of the negotiating committee for the general agents of WSA on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, states:

"The maritime strike has been avoided by the intervention of the Government. The War Shipping Administration has instructed the steamship companies, as its general agents, to put into effect on all Government-owned ships the terms which it has agreed to with the maritime unions. As the Government today owns 80 percent of the entire merchant fleet, it is obvious that the settlement by the Government cannot help but effect all privately owned ships. The companies have grave misgivings as to the future of the American merchant marine for the following reasons:

"The terms imposed by the Government bring the pay of seamen on United States flag ships to a level of approximately 135 percent above that in effect in January 1941. This compares with the total increases which have been granted in the other basic industries of approximately 50 percent.

"Under the new increases ordered by the Government, the wages of an able seaman will have advanced 137 percent since January 1941; for a messman 162 percent and a wiper 162 percent.

"The new increase amounts to about $51 per month for each seaman or an increase of approximately 35 percent over present wages.

"The wage bill on American ships, both Government-owned and privately owned, will now be approximately four times the average existing on comparable ships under the flags of the other principal maritime nations. Using the Liberty ship as an example, the monthly basic wage bill under various flags will now be as follows: British, $2,735; Norwegian, $2,463.75; Dutch, $3,417.85; Belgian, $2,389.50; Greek, $2,150; United States, $10,184 (estimated).

"The United States Treasury can doubtless bear this burden on Government-owned ships, but it remains to be seen for how long privately owned ships under the American flag can survive against competition under the staggering handicap now imposed upon them."

The new wage, overtime, and hour demands made by the National Maritime Union virtually torpedo and eliminate the American merchant marine as a factor in our world trade and national defense. Acceptance of the staggering wage increases along with reduced working hours designed solely to produce added overtime pay will place our merchant marine in an impossible competitive position and the American flag will soon disappear from the sea lanes of the world, stated Mr. Taylor. The increased cost of operation cannot be passed on to those who ordinarily use American ships as shippers, and travelers will naturally turn to foreign vessels which have in many instances 100-percent lower costs.

When negotiations began with the National Maritime Union, they wanted a 30-percent wage increase. Now they are seeking increases that average about 100 percent over present wages which were increased 45 percent as recently as last October.

The union wants a 40-hour week applied to ships at sea. There are fundamental differences between employment at sea and employment ashore, and application of shoreside standards to ship operations is not practicable. Application of a 40-hour week would necessitate approximately a 37.8-percent increase in the manning scale.

Again—and again, and again—it is urged to make the Sovietized United States Maritime Union leaders walk the plank—to bundle the whole commie cohoot aboard some Liberty ship sent over the Murmansk run to that haven of "liberty, equality"—and hell, instead of that heaven that exists by comparison in the U. S. A.

"No, no," shout the Red gang—naturally. "UNO" why.—Commander Wendell Phillips Dodge, editor.

Report to the Eighth Congressional District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, as the administration leaders prepare to bring to an end the present session of Congress, I think it appropriate to say a few words to the citizens who live in the Eighth Minnesota Congressional District.

ON THE JOB

My record for attendance during the present session of Congress is an almost perfect record. There have been 239 roll calls and the tally clerk advises me that his records show I failed to answer when my name was called only one time during the entire session. That was on April 3 when a quorum call was had and while I was present that day, for some unaccountable reason I was not listed in the Journal. I merely mention my record of attendance, Mr. Speaker, because the political buzzards very frequently circulate stories to the effect that a Member of Congress is "never there," and does not attend to business. That has been and will be said this fall when the campaign develops, because the CIO-PAC New York political leaders will have to have something to talk about.

RECENT CONGRESSIONAL WORK OF INTEREST TO EIGHTH DISTRICT—AIRPORTS

Without undertaking to enumerate only three or four major matters, I call attention to the fact that we have secured congressional legislation which has made possible the development of modern airports at Duluth, Hibbing, Eveleth, and International Falls, Minn. All of these projects originally started as WPA projects. They were discontinued and abandoned with the beginning of World War II. With the close of World War II, I succeeded in efforts to have Congress appropriate funds so that modern up-to-date airports were assured the village of Eveleth, the village of Hibbing, and the city of International Falls, and the airport at Duluth was completed with the assistance of the War Department.

VETERANS' HOSPITAL FOR NORTHERN MINNESOTA

One project which has claimed my attention for years has been the location of a veterans' hospital in northern Minnesota so that people in that area would not have to go to the veterans' hospital at Minneapolis for examination and treatment. It is now a matter of record that hospital facilities will be established at Duluth, Minn., and the program for which I fought has been crowned with success. A hospital which will cost over $2,000,000 is to be erected.

REBUILDING AGATE BAY HARBOR, TWO HARBORS, MINN.

Those familiar with shipping problems will tell you that the present harbor facilities at Two Harbors have to be enlarged and the demand is urgent. Harbor improvements were brought to a standstill when World War No. II started. Following its close, I renewed my efforts to secure proper legislation so that this needed harbor improvement at Two Harbors, Minn., could be undertaken. Just a few days ago the President signed an appropriations bill which carried an item of $1,000,000 for this improvement.

PAST PERFORMANCES INDICATE MY SUCCESSFUL RESULTS

The foregoing items are just a few of the many activities which have claimed my attention as a Member of Congress. Actions speak louder than words, and these developments are all accomplished facts and not mere promises.

FIRE CLAIMANTS' RELIEF

One matter which stands alone in legislative history was the passage of the Minnesota fire claimants bill on August 20, 1935. This measure required work over a period of several years. I secured its passage. It was of benefit to thousands of people not only in northern Minnesota, but elsewhere. It brought $11,500,000 to the people of my district at a time when we were in the midst of a depression and when these payments to claimants were badly needed.

DEFEATED MERGER OF GREAT NORTHERN AND NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROADS

Going back still further into my legislative record, as I recall it was in 1929 that a well-greased program was under way to have the Interstate Commerce Commission authorize a merger of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railroads. I had not been in Washington very long at that time, but I did not hesitate to take action. I received a telegram one Sunday morning from Emanuel A. Swanstrom, of Duluth. He asked me to oppose the merger and pointed out that over 500 railroad men who owned their homes and who lived in the western section of Duluth, Minn., would be affected by the merger. He pointed out that those men would have to sell their homes and move elsewhere if they were to continue in their employment with the railroads. On that Sunday morning I called one of the Commissioners of the Interstate Commerce Commission and I started the battle to prevent this catastrophe. We were successful.

In these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I cannot at this time enumerate the numerous other activities on my part in behalf of the people I represent in Congress. I just mention some of these matters at this time because I think it proper to give an account, at least in a brief way, of what I have done for the benefit of the people who have sent me to Congress.

FUTURE TASK—ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND POWER PROJECT

The people of my district have a right to feel that we have been betrayed in connection with constructive work to develop the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. The promotion of this enterprise has been one of the major parts of my activity at Washington. Powerful opposition is encountered at every turn. It is hoped that we may be able to get administration support for this vital development which means so much to the people of the Midwest and particularly to the State of Minnesota. I shall continue to champion this cause.

OUTSIDERS FROM NEW YORK WOULD TELL YOU HOW TO VOTE

I think the people of my district should realize fully that in the campaign which will terminate on November 5 that outsiders from New York will try to tell them how to vote. It was all planned for Sidney Hillman, Russian born, and a prominent New York figure in the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, to give intense attention to the people of northern Minnesota on the theory that they were too dumb to attend to their own affairs. Following Mr. Hillman's untimely death, Jack Kroll has been selected as his successor to direct the CIO-PAC political activities. These outside politicians have made no secret of the fact that they intended to capture—military language—the Eighth Minnesota Congressional District. They were active in the recent primary campaign and followed their usual technique which can be found in news items, speeches, political advertisements, hand bills, and radio smear programs. They boast that they do not tell the truth about a candidate they dislike if some other method can be devised. They have some brain-trusters in New York and in Washington and in other places who spend all of their time writing this material. All they have to do is to lift the story which has been written for a district in one State and change the name of the Congressman and transplant the story into another State. It is what we might call "canned" material. What the political opportunists say about a Congressman in one district, they are saying about other Congressmen in numerous other districts. We want to be kind to these people, and we therefore quote from some of their literature.

YOUR CONGRESSMAN VOTED FOR INFLATION

He voted to smash OPA price control.

He voted against housing legislation for veterans and other citizens in spite of the fact that thousands of us have no place to live.

He voted to wreck the full-employment bill that would have established the right of every man to a decent job.

He voted for antilabor legislation to shackle a worker to his job and cripple his right to strike for decent wages. He doesn't say what a worker is supposed to do when his pay check won't cover his cost of living.

The foregoing is a quotation from some of the literature which was circulated in my district during the recent primary campaign which terminated July 8. Lest someone might be confused, I hasten to say that the document was signed "Issued by Duluth CIO-Political Action Committee," and these folks were talking about WILLIAM A. PITTENGER.

They thought they were real clever, of course, because Congress has never voted on any bill which declared for or against inflation. This advertisement is poisonous because it is a deliberate falsehood. The voters will see a lot of this stuff when October 1946 rolls around.

This political advertisement claims that I voted against housing legislation for veterans, and so forth. That is another deliberate falsehood, and circulated for the purpose of misleading veterans of World War II. My record of support for all veterans' legislation cannot be successfully questioned. Those who attempt it do so because of the weakness of their own position and the lack of any qualifications to commend their program to the voters.

Then this yellow-bellied advertisement records me as voting to wreck the full-employment bill. The facts are that I voted for that legislation when it came from the committee to the floor of the House of Representatives for a vote. So, you see, this was just another CIO-PAC tissue of falsification, deceit, and slimy innuendo.

The same thing is true in the statement that I have voted for antilabor legislation. My record of friendship for the man who works for wages goes back many years, and if there ever was any ground to question it the occasion was furnished when President Truman demanded of Congress on May 25 the passage of legislation to meet a national crisis. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows only 13 votes against the President's emergency request.

The only possible semblance of truth in this typical CIO-PAC smear document is the statement I voted to smash OPA. We freely proclaim that distinction and that honor. Price control was a wartime emergency measure. Those who administered it have done a bad job. They established controls which led to failure of the farmers and industry to produce commodities and manufactured goods. OPA adopted the philosophy that it was a crime for the man in productive processes to make a profit. So our whole economic structure has been thrown into confusion. Those who produce building materials quit producing the lumber and the brick and other building articles. That was due to OPA. OPA is more responsible for our present housing shortage and inability to build homes than any other Government agency. It has been a first-class fraud, because the wrong people administered the law. OPA has caused inflation.

Yes; I voted against the last OPA price-control bill on July 1, 1946. It must have been a bad bill because the CIO issued a statement today to that effect.

Lest I be accused of inaccuracy, I quote from a newspaper item in the Times-Herald, of Washington, D. C., for July 26, 1946, which states that the National Association of Manufacturers and the Congress of Industrial Organizations both found fault with the bill which was signed by President Truman yesterday. A bill must be a corker when these two groups both agree that it is no good. The newspaper item reads as follows:

NAM AND CIO FLAY OPA BILL

NEW YORK, July 25.—The National Association of Manufacturers and the New York CIO found themselves in the same corner tonight as both issued statements blasting the new OPA extension bill signed today by President Truman.

"Legalized inflation," the CIO termed the amended price-control bill. Robert Wason, president of the NAM, called it legislation to substitute "the price judgment of a few superbureaucrats for the judgments of 40,000,000 American housewives."

The New York CIO council meeting at the Capitol Hotel, adopted a resolution labeling the compromise law "a sham and a delusion." President Truman was urged to hold Congress in session until a new law is drafted.

The CIO declared the extension "leaves the American people at the mercy of the monopolists and profiteers," and assailed New York's Governor Dewey for not fighting for OPA and Senator TAFT, Republican, of Ohio, for fighting against it.

Wason, in the NAM statement, declared that OPA in the new, as in the old, version obstructs free enterprise and restricts production.

It is a familiar practice of the OPA policy makers to brag about holding the line against what they call inflation or increases in prices. The falsehood of that claim has been repeatedly exploded but efforts will continue to mislead the people into the belief that a controlled economy under the guidance of an OPA set-up is needed. We welcome that issue. We believe in the law of supply and demand and in the law of competition. We believe that with the ending of the war there should be a return to economic freedom. This country got along for 155 years without the necessity of an OPA to produce a shortage of food, a shortage of clothing, and a shortage of everything with attendant high prices for inferior products. Our economic laws operated, and they will operate again. The quicker we get rid of wartime controls and wartime restrictions and return to our American system of free enterprise, just that much quicker will the country return to a normal prewar position.

These Inferior Federal Courts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, July 20 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able and learned article entitled "These Inferior Federal Courts," written by Judge Curtis L. Waller of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, and published in the Mississippi Law Journal for December, 1945. I am advised by an estimate from the Government Printing Office that the article will occupy in the RECORD one-fourth of a page more than the two pages allowed under the rule without an estimate of cost, which, in this case, is $135.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THESE INFERIOR FEDERAL COURTS

(By Curtis L. Waller, circuit judge, Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals)

No doubt you have often heard the remark that a Federal judge has more power than an oriental sultan. That statement may have been true once, but since Erie Railroad v. Tompkins[1] and Dobson v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue,[2] a Federal judge is inferior to nearly everything and everybody. The Federal judge would like to think that when the Constitution spoke of inferior Federal courts the term was used only in a relative sense or in the relation of those courts to the Supreme Court, but the realization is finally dawning that both Congress and the Supreme Court for some time have been according a literal interpretation to the term.

My discussion is not intended to be considered as authoritative, but only as suggestive, or provocative of thought, and I hope that what I say here will not be used against me. I realize that some phases of the subject which I shall advance for your consideration are contrary to pronouncements of judges of great name and learning, but notwithstanding the great names which might be cited as closing the door to judicial inquiry as to some of the thoughts to which I shall draw your attention, and notwithstanding the frequency with which some of their contrary views have been reiterated, article III is still in the Constitution and as long as it is, lawyers have the privilege of coming to their own conclusions as to whether or not it stands as a perpetual protest against a trend by Congress and the Supreme Court to take the judicial power away from the courts and give it to administrative boards and tribunals.

Sections 1 and 2 of article III of the Constitution provide:

"SECTION 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services, a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

"SEC. 2. The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; * * * to controversies between two or more States."

This, according to Justice Story, in Martin v. Hunter,[3] is the language creating and defining the judicial power of the United States. It is the voice of the people of the United States in establishing one of the three branches of their Government."[4] Its language, the decision held, was mandatory and Congress could not ignore or deviate from it. Emphasis was placed on the fact that the judicial power "shall be vested" and not "may be vested."

These words vest the whole judicial power of the United States "in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," whose judges should hold office during good behavior, and whose compensation could not be subject to a withholding tax during their continuance in office.

Since the same section of article III that vests the judicial power in these Federal courts provides for the tenure of their judges and the security of their compensation, does it or not seem to follow that all Federal tribunals that exercise judicial power, must have judges whose tenure and compensation are thus secured, and that any tribunal not having a judge appointed during good behavior is not a court that can be vested with this judicial power, regardless of its nomenclature? If so, would it also follow that a judge who has a tenure of office fixed in years can only discharge administrative duties? Although one may be called a judge of the Tax Court or the Court of Customs Appeals, can he constitutionally be vested with judicial power unless he is a judge as described in article III?

I like the definition of judicial power by the Supreme Court of Missouri in State v. Fry,[5] that:

"Judicial power can mean nothing more nor less than the power which administers justice to the people according to the prescribed forms of law—according to their rights as fixed by the law."

Another definition of judicial power is that "it is the power of a court to decide and pronounce judgment and to carry it into effect between parties who bring the case before it for decision."

In Todd v. United States,[6] it was said:

"A court is defined to be a place in which justice is judicially administered. It is the exercise of judicial power, by the proper officer or officers, at a time and place appointed by law."

There seems to be much confusion as to what is judicial power and what is administrative power. Congress does not seem to have kept the distinction very clearly in mind. The Constitution did not accord to the courts any of the powers of the legislative or executive departments of government, and definitely it was not the purpose of the people in the adoption of the Constitution to undertake to have the courts run or supervise the administrative branches of the Government in the discharge of their appropriate functions. But out of the multitudinous problems of an expanding governmental control it is sometimes difficult to discern the dividing line between judicial and administrative functions. We must all admit that it is necessary in carrying on the best business of the Federal Government that decisions be made and facts determined without having to resort to, and wait on a decision from, the courts.

The courts, like the mills of the gods, grind slowly, and many facts ought to be determined by governmental agencies such as the Interstate Commerce Commission, Federal Power Commission, Securities and Exchange Commission, the Tax Court, the National Labor Relations Board, and scores of others and their determinations involve the rights of citizens. In many of these administrative inquiries hearings in the form and substance of judicial proceedings are accorded, and I readily admit that many of them do a creditable job which the courts are ill equipped oftentimes to do. In this day of radio, atomic power, and jet propulsion, the people do not wait on surrebutters, and whenever these boards and commissions in approximately exercising quasi-judicial powers learn to do as the courts and make justice their guiding star instead of conceiving that their functions are the vigorous administration of certain acts, I, for one, will welcome them with open arms.

It seems not without significance that while the trend to collect governmental functions into the Federal Government has increased in its momentum, for better or for worse, the power of the Federal courts to review the acts of boards and commissions has been steadily reduced. I mention this, not for the purpose of decrying or protesting, for after all, Congress represents the people and is, doubtless, undertaking to meet a popular demand; but I mention it merely as illustrative of the diminution of the power of the courts.

Of course, the Congress may rightfully withhold from Federal courts jurisdiction of subjects not embraced in the category of those which by section 2 of article III of the Constitution were vested in the Federal courts, for they are courts of limited jurisdiction, having only such power as the Constitution and statutes of the United States have conferred upon them.

But to what extent may it withhold jurisdiction of the cases which section 2 of article III extended to all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States and treaties, and to all cases affecting ambassadors, public ministers, and consuls, and to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction?

The judicial power by section 2 of article III expressly extends only to cases and controversies. In Osborn v. United States Bank,[7] Chief Justice Marshall, speaking of article III, said:

"This clause enables the judicial department to receive jurisdiction to the full extent of the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States when any question respecting them shall assume such a form that the judicial power is capable of acting on it. That power is capable of acting only when the subject is submitted to it by a party who asserts his rights in the form prescribed by law. It then becomes a case, and the Constitution declares that the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States."[8]

In Smith v. Adams,[9] Mr. Justice Field stated that by the terms "cases" and "controversies" used in the judicial article of the Constitution defining the limits of the judicial power of the United States "was meant the claims or contentions of litigants brought before the courts for adjudication by regular proceedings established for the protection or enforcement of rights, or the prevention, redress, or punishment of wrongs. Whenever the claim or contention of a party takes such form that the judicial power is capable of acting upon it, then it has become a case or controversy."[10]

This perhaps means that the Federal judicial power extends only to court cases and controversies as distinguished from administrative controversies which have not reached the courts.

This conclusion permits the view that Congress may authorize boards and commissions to decide with finality, and without providing for court review, matters which do not come within the category of cases arising within the field committed to the courts by section 2 of article III. But may Congress constitutionally deny the citizen a right to bring a case in the Federal court for the determination of the rights between him and another citizen if they arise under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, or if they are of admiralty cognizance, or concern ambassadors, ministers, and consuls, in view of the provision that the judicial power extends to all such cases? I will let you answer the question. I am only asking it. It perhaps is not appropriate that I should in this forum undertake to make answer, but I will say that it has been done so often, at least in part, noticeably in NLRB cases involving rights between employer and employee, that I would be bumptious, indeed, to stand here and assert that Congress cannot do that.

I prefer to pass on to a discussion of the legal situation where Congress has provided for judicial review or a resort to the courts.

In Martin v. Hunter Judge Story said:[11]

"If then it is a duty of Congress to vest the judicial power of the United States, it is a duty to vest the whole judicial power. The language, if imperative as to one part, is imperative as to all."

Further he says:[12]

"It would seem, therefore, to follow, that Congress are bound to create some inferior courts, in which to vest all that jurisdiction which, under the Constitution, is exclusively vested in the United States, and of which the Supreme Court cannot take original cognizance. They might establish one or more inferior courts; they might parcel out the jurisdiction among such courts, from time to time, at their pleasure. But the whole judicial power of the United States should be, at all times, vested, either in an original or appellate form, in some courts created under its authority."

Justice Brewer, in Kansas v. Colorado, said:[13]

"Speaking generally, it may be observed that the judicial power of a nation extends to all controversies justiciable in their nature, the parties to which or the property involved in which may be reached by judicial process, and when the judicial power of the United States was vested in the Supreme and other courts all the judicial power which this Nation was capable of exercising was vested in those tribunals, and unless there be some limitations expressed in the Constitution it must be held to embrace all controversies of a justiciable nature arising within the territorial limits of the Nation, no matter who may be the parties thereto."

But Congress has not always observed this principle. There are some half hundred boards and commissions of the Government authorized to make findings of fact which are binding upon the courts in reviewing such action if there is any evidence to support the findings of such board or commission.

The findings of these boards and commissions are by statute generally made final and they cannot be set aside upon review by courts if such findings are supported by evidence—not if supported by the weight of the evidence. And in the matter of drawing inferences it has been held that the findings of the board must be sustained if the inferences drawn by the board or commission are reasonable. Even though the court might be thoroughly convinced that the factual findings of the board are the result of bias, prejudice, or even stultification, it cannot set the findings aside, except for errors of law, if there is any substantial evidence in the record to support the findings.

The concept that any part of the judicial power of the United States could be constitutionally vested in a tribunal that is within itself accuser, witness, judge, and jury, is rather disturbing; and the manner in which some of them have performed must shock some of those individuals who have plugged so consistently in support of the thesis of bureaucratic infallibility.

The Emergency Court of Appeals, operating in connection with price control, presents an interesting and ingenious set-up. I know of no other Federal statute that contains such a provision as the following:[14]

"Except as provided in this section, no court, Federal, State, or Territorial, shall have jurisdiction or power to consider the validity of any such regulation, order, or price schedule, or to stay, restrain, enjoin, or set aside, in whole or in part, any provision of this act authorizing the issuance of such regulations or orders, or making effective any such price schedule, or any provision of any such regulation, order, or price schedule, or to restrain or enjoin the enforcement of any such provision."

Provision is made, however, whereby a defendant may file a complaint in the Emergency Court of Appeals against the Administrator, and that court has jurisdiction to enjoin or set aside, in whole or in part, any provision of the regulation. The right of review of the decisions of the Emergency Court of Appeals is accorded the Supreme Court. One is obliged to wonder whether this Emergency Court of Appeals should be characterized as fish or fowl. I have mentioned the theory heretofore that a tribunal is not a court possessing Federal judicial power unless it is presided over by a judge appointed under the provosions of section 1 of article III of the Constitution. I have adverted to the theory, also, that the judicial power vested in these Federal courts must be called into play on cases and controversies. It would seem that complaint filed against the Administrator in the Emergency Court of Appeals is a case or a controversy, and that only judges appointed during good behavior and whose salaries could not be reduced could be judges of a court having jurisdiction of such matters. The OPA statute confirms these concepts, for it makes duly appointed regular Federal judges the judges of that court, thereby carefully adhering to the provisions of section 1 of article III.

The Emergency Court of Appeals is an inferior court, ordained and established by Congress, which tries cases and controversies and is presided over by judges appointed during good behavior, whose compensation cannot be diminished; but what about the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals or the Tax Court, or any other so-called court, wherein the judges are not appointed in accordance with section 1 of article III? Are they courts that have the right to exercise judicial power?

The name of the Board of Tax Appeals was recently changed to the Tax Court, but that is a misnomer, although it is a tribunal for which I have an exceedingly high regard.

The Tax Court statute provides for review of that court's decisions by the circuit courts of appeals and [15]

"Upon such review, such courts shall have the power to affirm, or, if the decision of the Board is not in accordance with law, to modify or to reverse the decision of the Board, with or without remanding the case for rehearing, as justice may require."

I am thankful that Congress still expects the circuit courts of appeals to act according to the principles of justice even in tax matters to which some say justice is a total stranger.

It will be noted that there is nothing in the act creating the Board of Tax Appeals, or Tax Court, providing that the findings of fact of such Board shall be conclusive if there is any evidence to sustain them. The circuit courts of appeals, instead, are required to affirm, or modify, or reverse, if the decision is not in accordance with law, all as justice may require. But it has long been held by the Supreme Court that findings of fact by the Board are conclusive on review, if supported by any evidence, and recently in Dobson v. Commissioner,[16] it was held that where there are no constitutional questions involved a determination of the Tax Court on mixed questions of law and fact is not reviewable unless the Court can separate the elements of decision so as to identify a clear-cut mistake of the law. The Court said that the judicial function "is exhausted when there is found to be a rational basis for the conclusions approved by the administrative body." [17]

The opinion pays high compliment to the experts on this Board and is a strong presentation in support of the theory of bureaucratic infallibility. The members of this Board are entitled to commendation. They do not deem themselves to be crusading enforcers of an act. The strongest boost, however, that has been made for administrative absolutism is a concurring opinion in the recent case of Bingham v. Commissioner,[18] decided June 4, 1945, in which it is said that in a review of a decision by the Tax Court the sole question before a circuit court of appeals is whether the decision by the Tax Court presents "a clear-cut mistake of law. There should be an end of the matter once it is admitted that the application made by the Tax Court was an allowable one." [19] A mere mistake of law is insufficient. It must be "clear-cut." This opinion further states that the intention of the Dobson case was to centralize responsibility in the Tax Court, to minimize isolated intrusions by the circuit courts of appeals into the technical complexities of tax determination except when the Tax Court has clearly transcended its specialized competence." [20]

Here seems to be a very frank confession that the Court in the Dobson case was intending to centralize responsibility in the Tax Court—a province which I always thought belonged to Congress, and which undiluted attribute Congress did not mention, but Congress said, in effect, to the circuit courts of appeals: "You reverse this thing if justice and law require it."

What is meant in the statute providing for review by the circuit courts of appeals in the use of the term "in accordance with law" and the term "as justice may require"? If I am correct in the assumption stated earlier in this discussion that judicial power means the power to administer justice to the people according to the prescribed forms of law, then the obligation to do justice called for by the Tax Court statute brings the judicial power of the circuit courts of appeals into full function. I submit that any court which cannot review either the law or the facts upon which a decision of the Tax Court is based is in a poor fix trying to do justice.

Give me the right to fix the facts and you may have the right to declare the law. If ascertaining the truth is not the first step in the administration of justice, then I confess that I have no conception of the process. The right to know the truth is an integral and essential attribute that belongs to a court of justice. If ascertainment of the truth is not an integral and necessary part of the exercise of judicial power, then why find the facts? Why not let the judge issue an ex parte fiat? If finding the facts is a part of the judicial power, and if the judicial power is vested in the courts in cases and controversies mentioned in section 2 of article III, or if the judicial power is the power to administer justice, and if in the administration of justice it is necessary first to know the truth, how can Congress or the Supreme Court withhold from the courts on review the right to be satisfied as to facts? For to withhold from them the right to know the truth is to withhold from them an essential and integral part of the judicial power, without which the demands of justice cannot be known, and the law cannot be properly applied.

In conclusion I wish to submit for your consideration this concept: That Congress may vest in nonjudicial boards and tribunals finality of decisions in all matters which do not come within the traditional concept of cases and controversies unless the decision of such boards and tribunals denies a citizen a right under the Constitution and laws of the United States. But in any instance in which Congress provides for a review in the courts of cases and controversies arising out of the subject matter mentioned in section 2 of article III, thereby calling into operation the judicial power—the power and the duty to do justice—it cannot take away from the courts any part of the judicial power to do justice.

The power, the right, the duty, to do justice are constitutional attributes of the Federal courts that cannot be whittled away in cases before them by denying to such courts the power to find the truth. The taking away from the courts the power to find the truth and to declare it though the heavens fall, is one way in which Congress has ordained and established that its courts shall be inferior courts, but it is not the way the makers of the Constitution intended that it should be done.

Preference for Veterans in Purchase of New Automobiles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, veterans of World War No. II have contacted me on numerous occasions about the purchase of new automobiles. Many of these veterans are either trying to reestablish themselves in some small business enterprise, or else they have a real need for motor vehicle transportation to and from their place of work. They want to purchase automobiles, but none of those necessities are available. Too many other people are in the market for this product. This results in a real hardship to many veterans throughout the country.

I introduced a bill on July 24, 1946, which in my opinion will correct the present conditions and make it possible for veterans of World War No. II who have been honorably discharged from service, to acquire a new automobile ahead of other people who want to purchase such a vehicle for pleasure purposes. This bill, H. R. 7127, reads as follows:

H. R. 7127

(In the House of Representatives, July 24, 1946, Mr. PITTENGER introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation)

A bill to provide a preference for veterans in the purchase of new automobiles

Be it enacted, etc., That the term "veteran" as used in this act means any person in the active military or naval service of the United States during the present war, or any person who served in the active military or naval service of the United States on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to the termination of the present war and who has been discharged or released therefrom under honorable conditions.

SEC. 2. Any dealer in automobiles having a new automobile for sale shall offer such automobile for sale to veterans for a period of 5 days prior to offering such automobile for sale to the general public. Veterans during such 5-day period shall have a preference over all other persons to purchase such automobile from the dealer for use primarily in business, professional, or agricultural enterprises.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this bill receives favorable consideration by the administration leaders and by the Members of the House of Representatives. It is in line with action that the House has heretofore taken in connection with the welfare of returned veterans. I have in mind the legislation which was passed some time ago giving veterans of World War II a preference in the purchase of surplus war commodities from the War Assets Administration. We also have enacted a law which gives veterans a preference in the purchase of building materials for the erection of dwellings. This bill is in line with this type of legislation and its enactment into law would be of tremendous help to our men who served us so well in the armed forces.

Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. B. W. (PAT) KEARNEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I earnestly urge a committee of this House to investigate all of the circumstances surrounding the recent railroad strike. It is probably too late in this session to set up a special committee with the power of subpena to summon witnesses before it and put them under oath, but such a study should head the list of the House agenda at the next session. It is right and proper that such an investigation be held. The public should be told the full story behind the hoax perpetrated on the American people by President Truman in connection with the strike.

It is obvious by this time that the President does not want the facts made public. Such disclosure would prove to be one of the most politically embarrassing episodes of our time. Mr. Truman's appeal to Congress for enslavement of the American worker was a cheap bid for the conservative vote. Unfortunately, Mr. Truman has not yet achieved the difficult art of carrying political water on both shoulders. He asked for drastic labor legislation—legislation which would have made slaves out of the American worker, and then later vetoed the Case bill. Just what does the President want anyhow?

When he appeared before the Congress on that historic afternoon of Saturday, May 25, President Truman knew full well that the surrender terms of the strikers had been agreed upon early that morning. But he had to have an issue and one which would be popular with the conservatives, so he opened fire on Mr. A. F. Whitney and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. It was the cheapest form of politics I have seen in a long time.

Such shabby tactics made the President a hero for the day. Now that the facts in the case are coming to light, the President's strategy has boomeranged. He has made Mr. Whitney the public target of his denunciation, stronger than ever with his own union and with the American people.

The Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen is a shining example of unionism at its best. The union has never indulged in wildcat strikes. It has a long and honorable record of service to the public. Under the capable leadership of President A. F. Whitney, the union has raised the living standards of its 195,000 membership. It is the type of union that should be protected both in the forum of public opinion and in the Congress. Such unions are the country's protection against communism and fascism. At any rate, Mr. Truman's vicious attack on Mr. Whitney was inexcusable.

I think that a congressional investigation of this strike, such as I strongly urge, would disclose the President's real reason for his attacks on Mr. Whitney. The public certainly is entitled to know the reasons for this attack.

Workers in this union do not make unreasonable demands on the railroads. They have a right to be heard, particularly in those demands which have been crying for adjustment for many years. Mr. Whitney, in giving life to these demands, is merely voicing the policies established by his national conventions. He is the official spokesman, and a very able one at that, of these thousands of workers who look to him for leadership. Public assaults on Mr. Whitney, particularly the type of abuse heaped on him by President Truman on May 25, are actually an attack on the union. Mr. Truman and his antilabor friends are not kidding anyone in their attempts to smear Mr. Whitney.

Some newspapers and radios have joined with Mr. Truman in the attacks on Mr. Whitney. Newspapers from coast to coast announced some time ago that Mr. Whitney would spend $47,000,000 in defeating Mr. Truman for reelection. This was a palpable falsehood. In the first place, $40,000,000 of the funds of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen are tied up in the union's insurance fund. This is, of course, money due the union policyholders and over which Mr. Whitney has no control. This is an example of the extent to which President Truman and his allies sought to discredit Mr. Whitney.

Only recently the Cleveland Plain Dealer, in an attack on Mr. Whitney, said that the union leader, who has devoted most of his life fighting for the interests of his membership, has more power over the country than any corporate trust ever did. That is sheer nonsense and can be construed only as a vicious attack on the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

The President is not completely to blame for the outrageous attacks on Mr. Whitney. The President has insulated himself against outside trends and facts by the Missouri gang around him. They tell him only what they want him to know, and in connection with the railroad strike they told him only one side of the story.

The President did not tell the American public about the thousands of railroad labor grievances against the companies, hundreds of which have been pending for more than 5 years. It was the accumulation of these grievances, plus the utter disregard of the brotherhood's rights in the negotiations, that resulted in the strike.

Mr. Truman in 5 minutes destroyed the 13-year-old myth that the New Deal party is the American worker's sanctuary. American labor had been sold a bill of goods during all that period.

We must give Mr. Truman credit for his honesty in asking Congress for authority to draft workers into labor battalions. At least the country and the voters now know where the Truman administration stands on the rights of American labor to act as freemen. If Mr. Truman had his way, these rights would be nullified overnight.

The Truman administration has a duty to make public all of the facts in this controversy. Only through such an investigation as I am now proposing can the record be set straight. The railroads' side of the story has been told. President Truman, playing fourth-rate politics, told his side of the story in an effort to hoodwink the American public and smother the real facts and issues. By making a whipping boy out of Mr. Whitney, President Truman tried to cover up the ineptitude of his own administration in handling difficult problems.

The truth is, of course, that Mr. Truman, ever since he went to the White House, has been attempting to reconcile the irreconcilable. That is about as possible as squaring a circle.

It is this bumbling by the President and his advisers that partially explains the social and economic chaos we face today.

The Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen does not have millions of dollars to present its side of the story to the public. All the union can do is to present the facts to a House investigating committee, where witnesses would be placed under oath. Then it would be revealed that Mr. Truman's dramatic move for the enslavement of American labor was a cruel hoax on the American people, a grave injury to the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen and a rank injustice to the good name and character of Mr. A. F. Whitney. Full disclosure of this fantastic attempt to discredit Mr. Whitney will unearth one of history's most notorious political frauds.

I am sure that every fair-minded American agrees with me that such an investigation should be made. Continued sniping at Mr. Whitney by the Truman administration does not reveal the facts to which the public is entitled. I think the President should make public his feelings on such an investigation. I here and publicly call on the President to make known to the public his attitude on my request for such an investigation.

S. 2177—Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret that an opportunity was not afforded Members of the House of Representatives to vote for the Legislative Reorganization Act with its provisions for an increase in the salary of Members of Congress and retirement pay deleted. I voted for the Buck amendment to strike section 601 dealing with increased compensation from the bill, and also voted for the Rizley amendment to strike section 602 dealing with retirement pay of Members of Congress. Both of these amendments failed of adoption, and for that reason I felt compelled to vote against the entire bill on final passage. Although I joined in the request for a roll-call vote on final passage not a sufficient number of Members arose to their feet to authorize a record vote.

I have continuously advocated a reorganization of Congress. We are operating under archaic rules of procedure today, and the bill in question contains many fine features relating to reorganization which have my hearty approval. On the other hand, I have consistently advocated and voted for retrenchment in Federal expenditures wherever such retrenchment was justified, and therefore could not see my way clear to vote for the increased salary for Members of Congress and retirement benefits at a time when the people of the country are looking to Congress to stop all needless expenditures of public money. I, at least, want to be consistent in my position on these matters, and am sorry that circumstances compelled me to vote against an otherwise fully meritorious bill.

How Can We Prevent World War III?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EDWARD J. GARDNER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I was privileged to attend a meeting on July 11 at Middletown, Ohio, where the citizens of this small community gathered 1,500 strong at the American Legion Home to consider the question, How can we prevent World War III? As a result of this meeting a resolution was adopted which endorsed the quota-force plan of international organization of armament facilities. This resolution has been adopted by 18 local organizations, a number of which have carried it to their State and national conventions, where it has also been adopted.

Mr. Speaker, the pebble which was tossed into the ocean of world public opinion on July 11 is rapidly extending its ripples throughout the United States of America, and for that reason I believe the attached statement of the chairman of the Middletown Town Meeting Committee, together with the resolution adopted by that group and the outline of the quota-force plan, should be given to the people of the United States for consideration, and therefore I offer it for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

On July 11, 1946, more than 1,500 citizens of Middletown, Ohio, gathered together at a town meeting to discuss How Can We Prevent World War III? The people of Middletown and surrounding communities came to this meeting on a hot July night because they were sincerely worried about what has happened to the peace. They fear another war. Middletown had decided at a prior town meeting that something should be done. The second town meeting was to decide what this something should be.

The attached resolution, unanimously carried, is their answer. This resolution was formed by 30 citizens of Middletown, and it represents their feelings as to the most effective, practical, and immediate road to peace.

The town meeting was opened by an address from the Honorable Frank J. Lausche, Governor of Ohio. Mr. Ely Culbertson, authority on the quota-force plan, was the principal speaker. To answer questions from the floor during the forum discussions there was a panel of four composed of Mr. Culbertson, the Honorable EDWARD J. GARDNER, Congressman from this district, Dr. Frank Hahne, president of Miami University, and Earl Emerson, world traveler and president of Armco International Corp. The Reverend Hughes Garvin, pastor of the Episcopal Church, was moderator for the entire meeting.

After an hour of questions and answers the resolution was explained and read by William Verity, World War II veteran, who then moved its adoption. By voice vote, and an enthusiastic one, the motion was carried unanimously.

This same resolution was not entirely new to the people of Middletown for it had already been endorsed by 16 organizations with national affiliations. Two more have since endorsed the resolution. These 18 organizations are listed below. Each has indicated a desire to carry this further in their organizations and already the American Legion Post, 218, the Rotary Club, and AFL have had their district conventions endorse this plan and arrangements are now being made to carry it to their State and National conventions.

We, in Middletown, believe the choice of war or peace in 1950 must be made now. It is not just enough to talk about it. Action must be taken. This resolution is Middletown's plan for world peace, while at the same time protecting and safeguarding our national interests.

Since we realize you, too, are interested above all else in keeping the peace, we are sending this resolution to you as evidence of the thoughts of one Midwestern community of 35,000 and its determination to take concrete action to bring about a lasting peace.

Sincerely,

GEORGE M. V. HOOK,
Chairman, Middletown Town Meeting Committee.

The 18 organizations who have endorsed this resolution are listed below:

1. American Legion Post, 218.
2. Blythe-Williams Legion Post (colored).
3. AHEPA (Greek organization).
4. Cooperative Club.
5. Industrial Council.

RESOLUTION

The citizens of Middletown, Ohio, feel that a third world war is inevitable unless positive action is taken at once. The United Nations organization is at present inadequate and the major powers of the world have not reached agreement on vital issues that could prevent another war. Recent scientific developments make another war too horrible to contemplate and may set back immeasurably the progress of the human race. If courageous and effective action is taken now to strengthen the United Nations organization, we believe that such a world-wide catastrophe can be prevented.

Be it therefore resolved by the citizens of Middletown, Ohio, assembled in a town meeting on July 11, 1946, that we urgently recommend the immediate strengthening of the United Nations organization by the adoption of three amendments to the United Nations Charter to provide for:

1. Reorganization of the United Nations Security Council and the World Court to give fair representation to all nations and to decide by majority vote all matters involving aggression or preparation for aggression. There must be no veto to protect aggressors.

2. Delegation to the Security Council of the powers to suppress aggression and control heavy and scientific weapons. The powers to be delegated should be strictly limited and well-defined and these powers must be interpreted by the World Court. Aggression should be defined as an attack with weapons of violence by a sovereign state or its citizens against the territory of another sovereign state, or the production of specified weapons of violence by any sovereign state beyond quotas set by the Security Council, or the refusal to permit inspection by duly authorized representatives of the Security Council.

3. Establishment of a strong international police force Such a force must be established to impartially support the powers of the Security Council.

The details of these amendments and the methods of procedure under them should be in accordance with the quota force plan as attached hereto; be it further

Resolved, That we urge the acceptance of the proposal of Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, acting in the name of the United States Government, for the creation of an international atomic development authority. We further urge the incorporation of that proposal into the quota force plan; be it further

Resolved, That we urgently recommend to the Administration and the Congress of the United States the adoption of the quota-force plan, which provides effective, immediate, and acceptable methods for elimination of aggressive war and for implementing the principles enunciated by Mr. Baruch, as an integral part of American foreign policy

Until such a time as the above measures, or similar ones, go into effect, we urge the maintenance of the armed forces of the United States at levels recommended by the Chief of Staff, United States Army and the Chief of Naval Operations, United States Navy; be it further

Resolved, That we pledge ourselves to work diligently to put these measures into effect and that copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretaries of State, War, and Navy; Senators ROBERT A. TAFT and JAMES W. HUFFMAN, Congressmen EDWARD J. GARDNER and GEORGE BENDER, all other Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the press.

QUOTA-FORCE PLAN

We have seen that the only way to avoid an eventual war with Russia is to establish, now, an international organization capable of controlling the atomic bomb and other scientific weapons—an organization with the necessary power to suppress any aggression.

There are three indispensable requirements for such an effective international organization:

1. The central authority must give fair representation to all nations, and it must act by majority vote in matters involving aggression or preparation for aggression.

2. Strictly limited, well-defined powers to control scientific weapons and suppress aggression must be delegated to the central authority by the member states, and these powers must be interpreted by a world court.

3. A strong, impartial international police force must be established to support the powers of the central authority.

The United Nations organization lacks all three of these indispensable requirements. But it is possible to amend the United Nations Charter in such a way that it will fulfill these prerequisites to peace and still be politically acceptable to its member states. The United Nations organization can be made a truly effective international organization. The United Nations Charter can be transformed from a timid, hypocritical document into a ringing challenge to all the war lords of the future. It can be accomplished by means of three indispensable amendments. Taken together, these three indispensable amendments constitute the basic principles of the quota-force plan. These, briefly, are the amendments.

First indispensable amendment: Reorganization of the Security Council and the Court.

In the present UN Security Council there are five "permanent" members which have all the power, and six "nonpermanent" members, which might as well not be there at all. In fact, of the Big Five, only the United States, Britain, and Russia make decisions. France and China merely concur after a decision has been reached by the Big Three. If we are going to abolish the veto power of the Big Five—and we must—then the vote of each member of the Security Council will have equal weight. To make this feasible, we must change the system of representation in the Security Council, as follows:

Instead of having six small states in rotation with no power, why not have all the small states represented all the time, with real power? This can be done by the device of collective representation. All the small states collectively shall have two representatives of the Security Council. These two collective representatives can be elected by the General Assembly or by any electoral college the small states choose to establish. Thus, although all lesser states shall enjoy the same sovereign rights and privileges as the major states, they will be treated for the purpose of representation as a collective unit, as if they were a single major power.

Again, instead of having France and China as poor relations of the Big Three, why not acknowledge the difference in power between them and the Big Three by means of a difference in representation? The United States, Britain, and Russia should each have two representatives on the Security Council instead of one each; and France and China could still have one each as they have now.

If we change the representation in this manner, the amended Security Council would comprise: Two members for the United States, two for Britain, and two for Russia; one member each for France and China; two members representing all the small member states collectively. Ten members in all.

In matters involving aggression and control of scientific weapons, the amended Security Council must act by a simple majority vote, with no strings attached. In all other matters, the present voting procedure could be retained.

Effectiveness? The changes in the structure of the Council give fair representation to all states and eliminate its complete domination by the Big Three. More important still, the disastrous veto power is eliminated.

Acceptability? The United States, Britain, and Russia—if in agreement—could still run the show, since they each have 2 votes, which together make 6 votes out of 10. That gives them the same power under majority vote that they now have under unanimous consent. But if the Big Three are not in blissful accord on a decision to be made or an action to be taken against an aggressor, then one or two of them can be outvoted by the remaining members. For instance, the United States, Britain, and France (five votes together) would need the support of one of the representatives of the smaller states to outvote Russia and China. Thus the smaller states will no longer be seen but not heard, as they are today. They will be able to make their two collective votes count on the scales of peace.

Side by side with a reorganized Security Council, we must establish a new World Court to interpret the powers of the Security Council. We can either take the present International Court of Justice and reorganize it; or we can leave it to its postage stamps and pirates and set up an entirely new court. In any event, the new World Court must also make decisions by majority vote. It should be composed in the same manner as the reorganized Security Council, except that its members should serve for life (with a retirement provision, of course). In this manner the members are less liable to be controlled by their governments and are more likely to be true custodians and interpreters of the two world laws we are going to establish.

These world laws are: No state or its citizens may commit aggressive war, no state or its citizens may produce scientific weapons beyond a certain quota.

But no law is of any value unless it can be enforced. We cannot enforce our world laws without amending the charter in another respect.

Second indispensable amendment: Delegation of powers to suppress aggression and control scientific weapons.

I have previously stated that no sovereign state will give up any of its traditional sovereign rights. There is one exception—the traditional right to wage aggressive war. It is implied in the present Charter that the member states give up this right, but it is not stated outright. Even if it were stated clearly, such a statement would be useless unless aggression were defined.

Aggression, therefore, must be clearly defined in the Charter, as follows: Aggression is an attack with weapons of violence by a sovereign state or its citizens against the territory of another sovereign state. The member states must specifically pledge themselves, in the Charter, not to commit aggression as therein defined. They must also specifically delegate to the Security Council the right to enforce this pledge—the right to suppress any aggression by any state at any time. Moreover, it must be the specific duty of the World Court to determine whether aggression has actually occurred or not.

The right to suppress aggression is the first power that must be delegated to the amended Security Council. But that is not enough. We must also deprive member states of the right to prepare for aggression by piling up mountains of fighting machines. This will be more complicated to achieve, but in our age of the atomic bomb and other scientific weapons it is just as necessary. We do not have to limit light weapons, like machine guns; indeed, it would probably be impossible to do so. But we must limit the modern means of making war—the scientific weapons.

Scientific weapons today are of two kinds: Atomic weapons and heavy weapons—warships, war planes, tanks, heavy guns, and other weapons of great destructive power.

The heavy weapons can be limited in the following manner:

The Security Council will fix a total quantity of heavy weapons to be produced annually by the entire world: so many tanks, so many long-range bombers, so many aircraft carriers, and so forth. Within this global total, each of the Big Five major powers will have an individual quota, beyond which it may not produce. These individual quotas shall be previously agreed upon and specified in the Charter. They should be roughly as follows: Allowing 100 percent for the whole world, the United States, Britain, and Russia should each produce no more than 20 percent, or one-fifth, of the amount determined by the Security Council. France and China should each produce no more than 10 percent, or one-tenth, of the world's total. Thus 80 percent of the world's heavy armament will be produced by the Big Five.

That leaves us 20 percent, and this remaining fifth of the world's total production of heavy weapons goes to the smaller nations. But the smaller states will not produce this 20 percent quota of heavy weapons individually. The Security Council will establish an Armament Trust, under its control. This Armament Trust, with a branch in every small state, will produce on a nonprofit basis the collective quota of heavy armament allotted to the smaller states. These smaller states will have no difficulty in producing collectively one-fifth of the world's heavy armament, especially if the world's total is fixed by the Security Council instead of being unlimited as it is today. There are the shipbuilding facilities of Norway and the Netherlands, the Skoda works of Czechoslovakia, the plane factories of Italy, for instance. What happens to the heavy armament produced by the armament trust in the smaller states will be explained in the third indispensable amendment.

Let us suppose that the Security Council, after this amendment is passed, meets in January 1947, and fixes a total quantity of heavy armament to be produced in the world during the year 1947. Instead of unregulated world production of, say, a million fighting machines, the total can be something like this: 1,000 heavy bombers, 10 aircraft carriers, 10,000 heavy tanks, 20,000 long-range guns, and so forth. Of this total, the United States can produce only one-fifth. This means that during 1947 the United States will produce no more than 200 heavy bombers, 2 aircraft carriers, 2,000 heavy tanks, and 4,000 long-range guns. Britain and Russia will do likewise. France and China will each produce 100 heavy bombers, 1 aircraft carrier, 1,000 heavy tanks, and 2,000 long-range guns. All the small nations will also produce collectively (through the armament trust) just as much as the United States does alone—200 heavy bombers, 2 aircraft carriers, 2,000 heavy tanks, and 4,000 long-range guns.

The quota limitation does not mean that the United States must repeat its error following the First World War, when she scrapped her own battleships, only to be confronted by intensive rearmament elsewhere. It will be noted that the quotas apply to the future yearly production of heavy armament in the world, leaving America's present superiority in sea and air power relatively intact. The rapid rate of obsolescence in modern armament, however, will make America's present equipment of little use in a few years, permitting the quota limitation to operate under conditions of future equality.

The quota limitation is, in effect, a colossal international cartel—a world monopoly of heavy armament. Like the rubber or tin cartels before this war, it has been made possible by the fact that the product (heavy armament) can be controlled on a world-wide scale. As with the usual cartels, the object is to create a scarcity of the product. This is done by assigning to each of the big "companies" (states) a quota of the total production, in proportion to its standing. This world armament cartel is unique. The product it seeks to limit is the merchandise of death. The scarcity it seeks to create is not for the benefit of the stockholders but for the benefit of mankind. And, unlike the usual cartel, it does not depend on secret agreements but on an open covenant establishing an international authority for the purpose of regulating and enforcing its provisions.

CONTROL OF ATOMIC WEAPONS

In the case of atomic weapons, the goal must be the total abolition of the use of atomic energy for purposes of destruction. If we act quickly this goal can be achieved. The United States is the only state that will have to give up the production of atomic bombs, because it is the only state now producing them. President Truman has already stated, in his joint declaration with Prime Ministers Attlee and King, that we are anxious to see the elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and all other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction. But if we cannot immediately outlaw the production of the atomic bomb, the least we can do is to apply to atomic-bomb production the same quota limitation as in the case of heavy weapons. The total to be produced, however, must be fixed by the Security Council at the lowest possible number, so as to prevent the possibility of irreparable destruction of the civilized centers of the world. In either event, the secrets and the processes of production of atomic energy shall be mutually exchangeable among member states.

ENFORCING THE QUOTA

The Security Council is not going to be so naive as to trust the member states to keep their pledges not to produce atomic bombs and to limit production of heavy weapons. The Council must maintain a large staff of inspectors to keep track of production of heavy weapons and atomic energy in every state. These inspectors must have access to every laboratory, factory, mine, and so forth, in every member state. No information regarding scientific weapons may be withheld by a member state. The inspectors will check with the greatest care every step in the production of atomic energy, from the mining of the ores to the finished product. If the atomic energy produced is unaccounted for in peaceful uses, they will suspect the secret production of atomic bombs and act accordingly. Furthermore, they will keep a thorough check on the production of all heavy weapons to see that each state produces no more than its allotted quota.

There will always be a time lag between the conversion of peace plants into war plants and the accumulation of enough heavy armament for extended aggression. The quota limitation would make it impossible for any would-be aggressor to take advantage of this decisive time lag.

In the matter of atomic arms, the recent war controls of the production of metals, particularly rare metals, have demonstrated that it is entirely possible to keep accounts of every particle of uranium or other fissionable elements produced in the world. It will probably be necessary for the Security Council to require the establishment of each country of a government monopoly of radioactive ores and their products, such as uranium or plutonium. A licensing system would permit private enterprise to purchase these products from the government for peaceful purposes.

With these rigid controls and inspection, it will be virtually impossible for any would-be aggressor to produce secretly enough atomic arms to start an aggression with any chance of success. It is true that an atomic bomb could be assembled secretly anywhere. In this connection it must be remembered that so far the only materials from which atomic energy can be obtained in quantity are uranium and thorium, rare elements that will have to be collected in large amounts from enormous quantities of mined ores. The size and location of these mines certainly could not be concealed for long from the inspectors and other means of detection at the disposal of the Security Council.

This is where "preparation for aggression" comes in: If the inspectors find that any state is producing atomic bombs; or that any state is producing more than its agreed quota of heavy weapons; or that any state refuses to submit to thoroughgoing inspection—then that state will be deemed guilty of preparation for aggression by the World Court. The World Court will have the power to move through local juries against any private citizen or member of any government accused of violating the production quotas of heavy armament or of producing atomic bombs. Individuals or groups who are found guilty of preparation for aggression will be subject to severe penalties. Governments that directly or indirectly support such violations will be removed from power; their members will be tried individually and punished accordingly.

THE TWO POWERS OF THE SECURITY COUNCIL

Thus, the second indispensable amendment is this: The member states shall delegate to the Security Council two powers, strictly defined and interpreted by the World Court. These two powers are: The power to suppress any aggression, and the power to prevent preparation for aggression, by enforcing the quota limitation of heavy weapons and the abolition of atomic bombs.

Effectiveness: The second indispensible amendment achieves all four of the goals for which the Atomic Energy Commission of UN was set up: It provides for the exchange of basic scientific information for peaceful ends; the control of atomic energy to the extent necessary to insure its use only for peaceful purposes; the elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and all other weapons adaptable to mass destruction; and effective safeguards by way of inspection and other means to protect complying states against the hazard of violations and evasions.

Moreover, this amendment drastically reduces the backbreaking load of heavy armament production from the shoulders of the world, and eliminates once and for all the ruinous and war-breeding armament race.

Finally, it makes it impossible for any would-be aggressor to rearm with impunity and, having rearmed, to attack a divided world with chances of success.

Acceptability: I have already pointed out the acceptability of the provisions of the second amendment regarding atomic bombs.

In the matter of heavy armament, even though the quota-force formula drastically limits the production of heavy weapons, it does not basically affect the relative power standing of the leading states today. The United States, Britain and Russia at present have a virtual monopoly on the production of heavy armament. By means of the quota limitation, Britain and Russia become equal partners with the United States in the production of heavy armament, which improves their relative standing. In exchange, the United States, whose present heavy armament will become largely obsolete in a few years) need not in the future endanger her economy by the necessity of producing tremendous quantities of fighting machines. She need no longer fear the future industrial growth of Russia or other nations.

The collective quota of heavy weapons to be produced by the smaller states under the Armament Trust gives them a chance collectively to become equal to a major power, instead of being satellites of the major powers, as they are today.

Most important from the standpoint of acceptability, all this can be achieved without requiring any sovereign state to give up any of its sovereign rights, except the rights to prepare for or to wage aggressive war—a right which the American people, at least, have been willing to give up for a long time.

Third indispensable amendment: A strong international police force.

By means of the second indispensable amendment, the member states of UN have agreed not to commit aggression, not to produce atomic bombs, and to limit their production of heavy armament. But, to quote Bertrand Russell: "No agreement will be observed by some powers, unless the penalties of infringing it are severe, obvious, and certain." To make the penalties severe, obvious, and certain, the Security Council must have adequate force at its immediate disposal. This means that we must establish a true international police force, independent of the whims of the governments of the member states.

A coalition of national armed forces, such as the present United Nations Charter vaguely refers to, will not be adequate. To rely on a promise of major powers to send armed forces when so requested is the height of optimism. A state that violates its agreement not to rearm or attack will as a rule be a great power, or combination of rebellious powers. This means that a number of states in the Security Council will be unwilling to risk a heavy sacrifice of their troops in a war which does not immediately concern them. A number of other states, even though willing, will be terrorized by the aggressor's ready and available power. Only the few nations whose territories are invaded or immediately threatened will, therefore, actually participate with their armed forces—which they would have to do anyway, without UN.

A union or a league of sovereign states without an international police force separate from the armed forces of the member states is an empty shell. It is a contract without a judge. It is a judge without a sheriff to enforce the law. Our Articles of Confederation, for instance, was such a league. At one time Washington's "army" numbered 28 men; and, although the States had solemnly promised to send their militia when needed to uphold the central authority (and the militia was needed), the States started instead to prepare for war against each other. This is one of the main reasons that Alexander Hamilton called the Articles of Confederation "an imbecility."

AN ANCIENT DILEMMA

An international police force must be powerful enough to overcome a strong aggressor state or even a combination of states; otherwise it would be a futile, token force. How can we establish a powerful international police force and yet guarantee the leading states against the dangers of such a force? How can we avoid creating an all-powerful Frankenstein monster?

Here we run up against a dilemma that has blocked all peace plans and peace planners for centuries. It is the contradiction between international government and national sovereignty.

You could not have an effective police force in a city if all citizens were allowed to carry arms and to keep machine guns in their front windows. Similarly, you cannot have an effective international police force if all states are allowed to arm without limit. The city police-force problem is solved simply by forbidding citizens to carry arms. But the problem of an international police force cannot be solved so easily, for no powerful sovereign state is going to agree to disarm. A state may give up the right to wage aggressive war, but it will not give up the right of self-defense with its own armament. To do so might mean disaster. If an international police force had all the arms in the world, the states would be completely at its mercy, and a world dictatorship could easily follow. There would be nothing to prevent a few generals in command of the international police force from using it to conquer the world. The people enslaved by the Nazi dictatorship were liberated by people from without. But with a world dictatorship there would be no hope of liberation for the people of the world, unless they were freed by men from Mars.

That is the dilemma of an international police force. It is impossible to have an adequate international police force unless the states are disarmed, but the states will not disarm and thus place themselves at the mercy of the international police force.

It is astonishing with what glib nonchalance some experts prattle about an international police force, without realizing its sinister implications if it is to be a real force or its hopeless futility if it is to be a token or a promised force. It is on the rocks of this unsolvable problem that all peace plans have heretofore foundered. It does not matter how perfect a plan may be in other respects; if it fails to provide an effective armed force and at the same time safeguard the sovereignty of individual states, lasting world peace is but a dangerous delusion.

THE SOLUTION

The solution of this dilemma is contained in the quota-force plan. The states will not be disarmed, but their armament will be limited. The international police force will also be limited; it will be big enough to enforce the powers of the Security Council, but it will be small enough so that it cannot threaten to become a world tyranny.

We have already seen how the heavy armament of the world is limited by giving specific individual quotas to the major powers and a collective quota to the smaller states.

It is this collective quota of heavy armament produced in the smaller states by the armament trust that goes to equip the international police force, or international contingent.

The international contingent (military, naval, and air forces) shall be made up exclusively of citizens of the smaller member states—highly trained, highly paid volunteers. Each smaller state shall contribute a certain number of regiments or squadrons, depending on its population except that, for reasons of balance, large states like Brazil or Italy shall be limited to a basis of 15,000,000 population in determining their participation in the international contingent.

This international contingent shall be stationed, not in the smaller states but in special strategic extraterritorial bases all over the world. Temporarily, it will also be stationed in Germany and Japan, where it will constitute the only troops of occupation. There the Security Council will replace the present chaotic, costly, and war-breeding rivalries of the Big Five.

The international contingent, furthermore, will be directly controlled, not by the governments of the smaller states but by the Security Council itself. It will be supported, not by the smaller member states but half by the smaller member states (in proportion to their national incomes) and half by the five major powers (in the same proportion).

The international contingent can be used by the Security Council for only two purposes: To enforce the quota limitation of heavy weapons and the abolition of atomic bombs, and to suppress actual aggression. In either case, the World Court must decide that aggression or preparation for aggression has occurred before the Security Council can move the international contingent against the guilty state.

The international contingent, as has already been stated, is equipped with the heavy armament produced by the armament trust in the smaller states. This gives it 20 percent, or one-fifth, of the world's total strength in heavy weapons. Thus the international contingent is just as strong as the United States, or Britain, or Russia; and it is twice as strong as France or China. It cannot become a world tyranny because it is not powerful enough and because it cannot be moved by the Security Council without the sanction of the World Court; and it can be moved only against a state which is guilty of aggression or preparation for aggression. There is another reason why the international contingent cannot rebel or exceed its powers, and this reason is psychological. It is composed, not like a homogeneous foreign legion but of definite units from all the smaller states. The only hope of survival for the smaller states lies in a strong international organization. Thus the members of the international contingent, by supporting the power of the Security Council, are insuring the survival of their own small countries.

The organization of the international contingent will begin immediately upon the incorporation of the three indispensable amendments in the United Nations Charter. Its original equipment could be purchased from the present war surplus of the United States.

Since the international contingent is as strong as any single major power, it alone can handle a rebellion by any single state. Because of the revolution in communications, it does not matter that the people of the smaller states are disseminated over the face of the earth. The international contingent could be concentrated and hurled against any aggressor in a matter of days.

But the international contingent alone is not strong enough to suppress aggression by a combination of major powers. Therefore, another provision must be made: If the Security Council needs additional forces to help the international contingent suppress aggression or preparation for aggression, then it may call upon the major powers to send their armed forces to serve as reserves to the international contingent.

Although the United States, Britain, Russia, France, and China retain their own armed forces as before, we have seen that the effective strength of each is automatically limited by its individual quota of production of heavy weapons. Any state may maintain additional forces equipped with light weapons, but the effective strength of any major power can never exceed its production quota of heavy weapons. These armed forces of the Big Five are called national contingents, and they back up the international contingent if needed. If necessary to make this provision more acceptable, it can be specified in the Charter that these national contingents can be used as reserves to the international contingent only with the consent of their governments. In the case of the United States, for instance, an act of Congress would then be necessary for the use of the American national contingent. It is evident, however, that if a powerful combination of aggressor states arises which threatens the destruction of the world and with which the international contingent cannot cope, there would be no difficulty in securing the necessary act of Congress.

HOW THE WORLD PEACE FORCE WORKS

The third indispensable amendment, therefore, can be summarized as follows: Let us call all the armed forces in the world equipped with heavy weapons the world peace force. The world peace force will consist of one international contingent and five national contingents. The international contingent, under direct command of the Security Council, will be made up of citizens of the smaller member states and will be equipped with the collective quota of heavy armament produced by the armament trust in these smaller states. The national contingents will consist of the national armed forces of the United States, Britain, Russia, France, and China; they will be under direct command of their respective Governments, stationed in their own territories and equipped with their respective individual quotas of heavy armament. The international contingent, composed of one-fifth of the world's effective military power, will be the active part of the world peace force, ready to be moved instantly against any state guilty of aggression or preparation for aggression. The national contingent will be the reserves of the world peace force, to be called up if necessary to support the international contingent.

When completed, the world peace force will represent the total effective force in the world equipped with heavy arms, as follows:

	Percent
International contingent (active force)	20
National contingents (reserves):
United States	20
Britain	20
Russia	20
France	10
China	10
Total world effective strength	100

Any lesser state, if an aggressor, will face the crushing weight of the international contingent. Any major state, if an aggressor, will face at least a 4-to-1 superiority of armed forces, led by the international contingent, with the national contingents of the remaining major powers as reserves.

The quota force method thus solves the dilemma of an international police force. It establishes an independent armed force capable of suppressing any aggression, and yet it retains for each major power the ability to defend itself with its own armament. In this manner we can have an adequate international police force without the danger of a world tyranny.

The third indispensable amendment, therefore, is effective because it makes successful wars of aggression virtually impossible. It creates a self-balancing system of national armed forces so designed that no aggressor or combination of aggressors can overcome the system. It organizes and integrates the collective power of the fifty-odd lesser states. Individually these states are impotent; collectively they become a single world power with a 400,000,000 population. Their international contingent, with one-fifth of the world's armed strength, will not only save the lesser states from absorption by the great states; it will serve also as a balance wheel among the major powers. The international contingent will be a perpetual ally of all nations that seek to survive and not to conquer.

The third indispensable amendment is acceptable because it does not jeopardize the independence of the major powers. The international police force cannot become a world tyranny, and each major state retains its own military capacity to defend itself.

RESULTS OF THE THREE INDISPENSABLE AMENDMENTS

To see just how UN would work after these amendments are adopted, let us return to the hypothetical examples we have previously considered and compare what would happen with UN as it is and with UN adequately amended.

Example 1: Yugoslavia versus Italy.

Before: Yugoslavia tells Italy she wants Trieste. Italy brings the matter before the Security Council. The Council hems and haws; Russia threatens to veto any proposal to make an investigation; nothing is done. Yugoslavia marches into Trieste. Every member of the Security Council except Russia and Poland wants to send troops to stop Yugoslavia. Russia vetoes the proposal. Nothing is done. Italy accuses Russia of sending planes to aid the Yugoslavs. Nothing is done. Italy sues for peace, and Yugoslavia gets Trieste.

After: Yugoslavia tells Italy she wants Trieste. Italy brings the matter before the Security Council. The Council votes on the matter. The vote is 7 out of 10 in favor of Italy (one representative of the smaller states and the two Russian delegates dissenting). Yugoslavia marches in anyway. Italy appeals to the Council. The Council asks the World Court to determine whether Yugoslavia is an aggressor, as defined in the Charter. The Court decides (immediately, not next week) by a vote of 7 out of 10 that Yugoslavia is an aggressor. The three justices dissenting are two Russians and one of the representatives of the smaller states, who happens to be a Yugoslav. The Council tells Yugoslavia to withdraw from Trieste immediately and concentrates the international contingent in its bases nearest to Yugoslavia. Yugoslavia withdraws. If she does not withdraw the international contingent invades Yugoslavia and deposes the government. The World Court tries its members and metes out punishment. Italy gets Trieste back.

Example 2. The Anglo-Americans versus Russia, and the atomic bomb.

Before: The Americans and British discover that Russia is making atomic bombs. They send over long-range bombers equipped with atomic bombs and completely obliterate the Russian atomic bomb plants. Russia complains vehemently to the Security Council. No vote is taken because the United States and Britain, plus their satellites Mexico, Brazil, the Netherlands, and Australia have a majority anyway, even without the vetoes of the United States and Britain. In short, nothing is done by the Security Council. But Russian agents get busy, and one fine day Oak Ridge and New York City go up in a cloud of radioactive dust, and 7,000,000 innocent people are destroyed, including half a million children under the age of 10. Both Russia and the United States mobilize their armies and prepare for war. The whole UN might as well not exist.

After: The Americans and British discover that Russia is making atomic bombs, in violation of the bomb-abolition agreement contained in the amended Charter. They bring the matter before the Security Council. The inspectors of the Security Council investigate and discover that such is the case. A thorough investigation is made, and the inspectors name certain persons in the Russian Government who are responsible. They are tried by the World Court and punished accordingly. Russia is forced to give up the illegal atomic bombs, and they are used by scientists who are investigating the possibility of destroying the polar icecap. The plants in which the bombs were made are destroyed. Russia cannot veto any of this procedure, and she cannot forcibly resist without calling the international contingent and the remaining national contingents into action against her.

Example 3. The Anglo-Americans attack Russia in 1950.

It was previously pointed out that a capitalistic coalition against Russia can occur only if the American and British people come to fear Russia enough to throw their weight on the side of the ever-present war-against-Russia party. But with the amended UN, all the Communist or anti-Communist propaganda in the world cannot make the American and British people attack Russia, since they know that if Russia keeps her agreements they need no longer fear her. The international machinery will be there to see that Russia does keep her agreements. The war-against-Russia party will dry up into a few disgruntled Red baiters. For this reason a capitalistic coalition against Communist Russia simply could not be formed.

The whole thesis of the war-against-Russia party is based on the fear of a war-against-Anglo-America around 1960. Let us see what will happen to this fear under the amended UN.

Example 4. In 1960 Russia leads Communist-dominated Europe and Asia into war against the Anglo-Americans.

Before: In chapter three it was stated that such a war is highly probable and that the Anglo-Americans would inevitably lose. The unamended UN by then would probably have shared the fate of the League of Nations. Even if it should still exist, it would be powerless in the face of the Russian or Chinese or even French vetoes. The Anglo-Americans would be powerless in the face of the manpower and the industrio-military might of Europe, Asia, and Africa.

After: The amended UN will constitute an adequate substitute for power politics. There will no longer be reason or opportunity for a struggle between the Anglo-Americans and Russia for hegemony of the world. Russia could no longer expand her power by the use or threat of use of force. Thus this war of 1960, like the war of 1950, could not occur under the amended UN.

However, let us suppose that there is a conspiracy of the Russian, Chinese, and French Governments. Let us throw in all of Germany, by then unoccupied, and all of Japan. Suppose they all get together to defy the UN and conquer the British Empire and the Western Hemisphere.

The fact is that they couldn't do it. The minute they throw out the inspectors in preparation for rapid rearmament, the Security Council acts. The United States, Britain, and the two collective representatives of the small nations that do not want to be swallowed up still have a majority both in the Council and the Court. If the conspirators started war, they would have only 40 percent of the world's heavy armament, 20 percent Russian, 10 percent Chinese, and 10 percent French. Against them would be the international contingent (20 percent), the United States national contingent (20 percent) and the British national contingent (20 percent). Before the rebels even got started they would be crushed.

These four examples should be enough to prove that the three indispensable amendments are indeed indispensable and that the amended UN could be truly effective in maintaining peace. The very fact that an organized world collective front against any aggressor existed under the Security Council, with delegated powers to act by majority vote, supported by an organized international contingent with national contingents in reserve, would place any potential aggressor in a hopeless inferiority and thus do away with dreams of conquest. The agreements of the member states would be observed because the penalties for infringement would be "severe, obvious, and certain."

These three amendments, embodied in the quota-force plan, solve the problems of wars of aggression by attacking the means of waging war, which are few, rather than the causes of war, which are many. Only a few months will be needed to organize the quota controls of scientific weapons and set up the international contingent. Decades, if not generations, will be needed to remove the economic causes of war. Centuries will not suffice unless we first remove the greatest social injustice of all—war of aggression. In the family of nations, as in any organized society, the judge and the policeman, though not the most important, are the most urgent. Only after the many are protected against the violence of the few is it possible to proceed to the removal of the deeper causes of war by higher economic standards, better social justice, and, above all, through education and religion. Today, when nations are feverishly and secretly engaged in the discovery and unrestricted production of atomic weapons that will blast our civilization, world law and the world policeman have become a matter of our very survival. This can be accomplished by the quota-force plan. No other plan can do it.

THE PROBLEMS OF GERMANY AND JAPAN

There is a tremendous range of plans for the disarmament of Germany, from the psychological to the economic. History teaches that the only effective way permanently to disarm a defeated country is by permanent military occupation. History also teaches that a military occupation by the troops of a victorious coalition has never been permanent.

Germany is now divided into four zones of occupation—British, French, American, and Russian. The national troops of each ally occupy their respective zones, subject only to the orders and control of their own governments. An advisory council without any power coordinates the four zones, but the final decisions on all matters pertaining to each zone remains with the allied power in charge of it.

It is on this incredibly flimsy structure that rests the solemn promise of the United Nations permanently to disarm Germany. The fatal weakness of this plan is that the disarmament of Germany will last exactly so long as the mutual confidence and postwar harmony of all four allies lasts. The moment any single one of the four powers decides that the threat from an ally is greater than the threat from defeated Germany just that moment can Germany begin rearming. Alone or in combination with other states, any one of the four allies can with impunity start rebuilding Germany's military might in its own zone of occupation.

After the First World War, Germany was prostrate and her rigid disarmament was sealed by the solemn promise of the Covenant of the League. But it was not long before Britain, jealous of France's domination of Europe, began to woo Germany; while Russia, fearful of both Britain and France, facilitated the building of German equipment on Russian soil. Later, the politicians of both Britain and France worked hard to rearm Germany against Russia, while our State Department approved heavy loans to rebuild German plants. Thus Germany was rearmed out of the rivalry of victors, confirming a rule of history that has no exception.

Solemn assurances notwithstanding, there is neither the mutual harmony nor the mutual confidence among the four great powers to insure the disarmament of Germany even for a few short years, let alone two or three decades. The four separate zones of occupation are the best proof of this utter lack of confidence. A desperate struggle for control, not disarmament, of Germany is going on even now. Who rules Germany will rule Europe.

The supreme interest of the United States in Germany is twofold: to keep Germany permanently disarmed and at the same time to block any power that might seek to turn Germany into the tool of its power politics or rapacity. This can be achieved only by means of the three indispensable amendments.

Under the amended UN, the international (small nations) contingent will occupy Germany for 24 years, or longer if necessary. After a short time not a single American or British or Russian soldier need remain on German soil. Inspectors will be permanently stationed throughout Germany with the right of access to plants and patents, and any German guilty of illegal rearmament will be severely punished. Germany will thus be permanently disarmed, her people will be saved from becoming pariahs, and the odium of hatreds will be removed from the United States and her allies.

Regarding the permanent disarmament of Japan, the same considerations apply as to Germany. The international contingent can replace the American troops after certain measures already determined by our Government have been successfully carried out. And the amended Security Council can replace the power politics of the Far Eastern Advisory Commission as the custodians of Japan's future.

When Germany and Japan are admitted to the family of nations, they can be given one delegate each on the Security Council.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF WORLD FEDERATION

There are many who feel that the ultimate hope of the world lies in a true world federation. Up to a few years ago such a world federation was regarded as an ideal, a utopia which probably could not be translated into reality for another hundred years or so. Today, however, the development of a world federation has become entirely possible. The United Nations organization, after its Charter is adequately amended, can develop logically into a world federation composed of several regional federations.

The world is still too large for a central government to attend to all its needs. Even when wars of aggression are eliminated by the amended UN, there are still numerous problems arising between the seventy-odd sovereign states which are too complex and too diversified to be regulated without serious friction by direct state-to-state relations. The majority of the leading states exercise a powerful economic influence over their smaller neighbors, and, in turn, depend upon the good will of these small states. In many ways their relations are of a regional character and cannot be regulated adequately by the UN. If the amended UN is to develop into a real world federation, it is therefore necessary to establish regional federations to deal on a regional level with those international problems which cannot be dealt with by the UN on a world level.

These regional federations, when established, will function as an intermediate mechanism between the seventy-odd sovereign states and the ultimate world federation government. For instance, when completed under the world federation, the amended Security Council will represent 11 regional federations instead of individual sovereign states. The regional federations will also function as an indispensable intermediate step toward the ideal of world citizenship.

The United Nations Charter already recognizes regional arrangements for collective defense. This should be expanded to recognize the establishment of regional federations as an integral part of what will eventually be the world federation. A regional federation is set up by means of a free association of two or more sovereign states of similar political or economic interests located in a defined region.

The structure of the regional federations should be patterned after the amended UN, or world federation.

The powers that could be delegated to a regional federation government are for example:

1. Supervision of treaties concluded between member-states and protection of agreements and rights of citizens in their interstate relations (through a regional equity court).

2. The making of treaties and agreements with the governments of member-states relative to economic, educational, and scientific cooperation within the region. For instance, the regional government, upon the agreement of its member-states, may issue regional passports, found a regional bank, establish a regional customs union, and set up regional educational and scientific research foundations.

3. The administration of intra-regional straits and waterways. All such straits and waterways between member-states should be internationalized and supervised by the regional government. Similarly, certain air bases should afford access and stop-over rights to all states of the region. This same principle could also be extended to the internationalization of straits and waterways between regions, to be supervised by the world federation government.

Another function for which the regional federation is ideally fitted is the administration of colonies belonging to member-states of the same region. If the member-states agree to do so, all colonies belonging to member-states of the same region should be pooled and administered directly by the regional government with equal access accorded to citizens of all member-states of the region. The education, improvement, and eventual liberation of the colonial peoples must be the objective.

A careful survey of the world today will show that there are actually several worlds, of regions. Each has its own historical, racial, cultural, or economic personality. Here are these regions, with the states which they logically include:

Pan-American: United States and the Latin-American Republics.

British: United Kingdom and the Dominions.

Latin-European: France, Italy, Spain, Belgium, Portugal.

Central European: Germany is its nucleus; the neighboring states, such as Denmark or Austria, though culturally and geographically in the same region, have (rightly) morally disowned her.

Polish-Danubian: Poland, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Hungary, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Albania, Greece.

Middle Eastern: Turkey, Iran, Iraq, Syria, Palestine, Arabia, Afghanistan, and Egypt.

Russian: U. S. S. R.

Chinese: China.

Japanese: Japan proper.

There are two additional natural regions in which none of the component states are today really sovereign: The Indo-Malaysian region (which includes the Philippines and Siam, the Netherland East Indies, and Indochina) and India. The principle of regional federation could also be applied to the problem of liberating these peoples in a manner acceptable to their present sovereign states.

If you glance again at the list of these regions, you will see that the Russian, the British, and the Chinese regions already are integrated by central governments. The pan-American region has started to become integrated, by means of the various pan-American congresses. The middle eastern region also is showing signs of political solidarity. A sovereign Jewish state of Palestine must be established within this middle eastern region. The German and the Japanese problems, however, must await the end of Allied occupation. That leaves only the Latin-European and the Polish-Danubian regions.

There are some who advocate a federation of all Europe from the Atlantic Ocean to the borders of Russia. Actually, there is not one Europe; there are at least three Europes—the Latin, the Teutonic, and the Slav. It would be much more logical, therefore, to establish three regional federations instead of one. But neither Russia nor Britain will permit the establishment of any European federation which it does not completely control, unless a strong international organization guarantees that such a European federation will not be a threat to either of them.

An exhaustive analysis of the possibilities of the 11 regional federations is not possible in this book. Those who are interested in the specific application of the regional principle to the problems of inter-American relations, of India, of the Pacific peoples, of Germany, and of Palestine, may refer to my book Total Peace.

By means of the three indispensable amendments we have eliminated the primary method by which nations have always settled disputes—the way of force. By outlawing aggressive war, we shall also eliminate much ideological and economic aggression, for in the last analysis what makes economic or even ideological aggression so telling is the threat of force behind it. Once the threat of force is removed, any sovereign state, however small, has in its own hands the remedies against other kinds of aggression.

That does not mean that we can eliminate disputes between nations. We must therefore set up machinery to handle the peaceful settlement of these disputes. This can be done by way of a world equity court as part of the world federation government.

The world equity court should be constituted in the same manner as the World Court previously described. Alternatively, it can be set up by means of representation directly from the regional federations.

The power of the world equity court should be to interpret, arbitrate, and cause to be enforced all treaties containing a justiciable clause.

A justiciable clause is a special clause inserted in any agreement, by which the parties to the agreement consent to and require arbitration of the agreement by the world equity court. An agreement containing a justiciable clause is enforceable by the world equity court for a period of 25 years only.

Any treaty or agreement between any two or more member states may contain a justiciable clause, if all parties to the agreement wish it, but it is inserted voluntarily. However, any treaty or agreement concluded by the government of a regional federation or by the government of the world federation with its member states must contain such a justiciable clause.

The world equity court cannot support its decisions by military force. But it can punish violators of its decisions by means of economic sanctions.

An economic sanction is herein defined as the establishment of a partial or complete blockade by the government of the world federation against a sovereign state or its citizens.

An economic sanction, however, can be applied only after a writ of economic sanctions has been issued by the world equity court, and only upon a majority vote of the Security Council.

This means that the government of the world federation has no enforceable power over two sovereign states in their treaty relations unless in each instance they previously and voluntarily consent to insert the justiciable clause. It also means that the governments of the regional federations and of the world federation can gradually acquire more authority voluntarily delegated by the member states, as they conclude treaties containing this justiciable clause.

This new method of a justiciable clause, which makes a treaty enforceable by economic sanctions, has all the advantages of compulsory arbitration advocated by many jurists, and at the same time is acceptable to all the sovereign states. And by limiting the time of enforceability of a treaty to 25 years, it obviates the danger of perpetuating indefinitely treaty injustices caused by changed conditions.

World federation some day? Just described are concrete steps, starting with the amended United Nations Charter, to make world federation a practical reality. All this can be achieved if we amend the United Nations Charter now. None of it can be achieved unless we do.

Having taken this excursion into the future, therefore, we must return to the present and consider just what concrete steps we can take, starting today, to arrive at the amended United Nations Charter.

Member of Marine Seamen's Union Opposes Coast Guard Jurisdiction Over Merchant Marine

---

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, some time ago I was actively engaged in efforts to defeat Reorganization Plan No. 3 which had for its purpose the conferring of permanent jurisdiction over the merchant marine in the United States Coast Guard. As a war measure, our shipping and our merchant marine which had heretofore been under the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce, was transferred to the United States Coast Guard. Everyone recognized that this was a temporary proposition.

Then, out of a clear sky on May 16, 1946, Reorganization Plan No. 3 was submitted by the administration which conferred permanent jurisdiction of our shipping and merchant marine in the United States Coast Guard. I introduced a House concurrent resolution for the purpose of disapproving Reorganization Plan No. 3. This resolution passed the House but failed of passage in the Senate, and reorganization plan No. 3 is now the law. It ought to be repealed. I am fortified in that conclusion by a letter that I received from Pfc Swen E. Saari, of my district, whose letter reads as follows:

HEADQUARTERS COMPANY, TC SCHOOL,
Fort Eustis, Va., July 25, 1946.
Hon. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Having been informed of your recent efforts to eliminate the United States Coast Guard jurisdiction over the merchant marine, I wish to take this means to thank you for your splendid action. I was especially pleased to read that you had quoted verbatim a speech by John Hawks, president of the Seamen's International Union.

Although I was never a member of the Seamen's International Union, I was and still am a member of two other seamen's unions — the Marine Firemen's Union (MFOW) and the Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association—although I am at present serving in the United States Army.

Your move has aided all members of the merchant marine regardless of union affiliation, and I am proud that the Congressman from my home district in northern Minnesota is a leader in the move to restore efficient peacetime operation of the United States merchant marine.

As a resident and voter of Chisholm, Minn., I wish to thank you again for your progressive spirit.

Respectfully yours,
Pfc SWEN E. SAARI.

In his letter Mr. Saari refers to John Hawks, president of the Seamen's International Union, with headquarters in New York City. Mr. Hawks appeared and testified in opposition to Reorganization Plan No. 3, both before the House and Senate committees which considered the plan. He made an excellent witness and pointed out the difficulties and objections to having permanent control of our shipping and merchant marine under the United States Coast Guard. Those Members of Congress who have not done so should read Mr. Hawks' testimony before the committees which held these hearings. It will become clear that our shipping and merchant marine jurisdiction should be returned to the Department of Commerce, where it properly belongs. For reasons not here discussed that step is desirable, and, in my opinion, a mistake was made when the other body in Congress voted to approve plan No. 3. I have a bill pending in the House now to repeal both reorganization plans No. 2 and No. 3, and I am sure that legislation will meet with the approval of the various groups referred to in this letter which Mr. Saari has written me.

OF
HON. CHARLES R. ROBERTSON
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. ROBERTSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a report from the Committee on Statements, Policies, and Principles of the North Central Association of Commissioners, Directors, and Secretaries of Agriculture, at the annual meeting of the association held at Mammoth Hot Springs, on July 11, 12, and 13.

REPORT FROM THE COMMITTEE ON STATEMENTS, POLICIES, AND PRINCIPLES OF THE NORTH CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF COMMISSIONERS, DIRECTORS, AND SECRETARIES OF AGRICULTURE AT THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE ASSOCIATION

NORTH CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF COMMISSIONERS, DIRECTORS AND SECRETARIES OF AGRICULTURE,
July 13, 1946.

To the Honorable CLINTON P. ANDERSON,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.:

The commissioners, directors, and secretaries of agriculture of the North Central Association recognize the outstanding achievement of the American farmer in producing the maximum quantity of food so essential to the winning of the glorious victory in World War II. They further recognize that this production was made in the face of many adverse conditions such as the shortage of labor and shortages of machinery, farm implements and equipment. The food production achievement of the American farmer stands as the most noteworthy accomplishment of the American people during the war period.

We now turn to the problems of a postwar America and a postwar world. We sense that the production of food is still the most important job in the immediate postwar years.

Given the tools and machinery, the American farmer will again produce the food supplies necessary to feed our own people, and to supply the needs of many of the war sticken areas of the world where starvation threatens as a world rebuilds after years of destruction. Every effort should be made to make available such tools and machinery at the earliest possible time.

We believe it to be all important that permanent policies be adopted by the Government in order that farm management may again plan farm production with confidence in a stable agricultural policy. Such confidence has been seriously impaired by day-to-day rules of Federal administrators. We believe that maximum agricultural production will do much to prevent further inflation, and will be a valuable contribution to the future American economy. American farmers must be assured by their Government that prices of farm products, based on production costs, will be maintained through a program of price support to prevent a recurrence of ruinous price periods. We ask that the Congress give consideration now toward such a permanent farm policy.

We oppose a policy of setting ceiling prices of food products, and commend the Congress for its efforts to end such price controls.

We believe that the Departments of Agriculture, National and State, working in cooperation with the agricultural colleges, should explore the possibilities, through research, of finding new uses for agricultural products, and to create new markets to sustain a prosperous American agriculture, and to encourage production of farm products now being imported that are adaptable to our soil and climate.

We believe that the States can play a very important part in the development of such new agricultural uses and markets, and we strongly urge that the Congress in dealing with the problem, leave the administrative functions in the hands of the departments of agriculture of the various States. As an example of the need for a return of such administrative functions to the States, we cite the inequalities that presently exist in the distribution to the States of high protein feeds.

We commend the work that has been done by the Federal Government, the various State governments, and the local communities in adopting soil conservation practices, and urge that such a program be extended and further developed.

All the members present wish to express their appreciation to Mr. Patterson for his contribution to the meeting and his presence.

We believe the food inspection service is a State responsibility, and we disapprove of the efforts of the United States Public Health Service to duplicate inspection services now given by the Departments of Agriculture in the various States. We urge that the States become even more active in providing sound and practical protection to consumers of agricultural products.

We appreciate the efforts of the United States Department of Agriculture in developing cooperative work in agricultural statistics with the States in order to provide adequately for the growing needs of agriculture and statistical service at local and State levels. We recommend that both the Federal and State agencies direct their efforts toward strengthening the State and county work in this field. Since the needs and problems in this field vary in the different States, we urge that the program of decentralizing this work and developing strong State statistical offices to meet the State and local needs of agriculture be further emphasized and expedited.

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, some of the provisions of the reorganization bill, S. 2177, are well worth while; namely, consolidating and streamlining of committees and the provision requiring registration of lobbyists, but I am unalterably opposed to increasing the salaries of Members of Congress and even more opposed to the provision for retirement benefits for Congressmen and elective officers in general. At the proper time I propose to ask for a record vote on the final passage of this bill so that the people of the country at large may know who is in favor of the salary and retirement provisions and who are opposed to these proposals.

Canada's Sunset Portal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. L. BARTLETT
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, during the war the port of Prince Rupert in British Columbia served as one of the great ports of embarkation in shipping to the north and played a role which is not generally understood. An excellent description of how important Prince Rupert was to the war effort is given in an article which appeared in the Vancouver Daily Province and was written by Richard L. Neuberger. During the war Mr. Neuberger served with the Northwest Service Command at Whitehorse, Yukon Territory, and by personal experience was able to evaluate what was done at Prince Rupert. The article follows:

CANADA'S SUNSET PORTAL

(By Richard L. Neuberger)

Within the railway yards and shipping piers of Prince Rupert was locked, until now, one of the most significant stories of World War II. And what happened in British Columbia's northernmost port after Pearl Harbor is also a story most significant for the future of the entire Pacific Northwest.

In the spring of 1942 the first invasion of North American soil in more than a century occurred. The Japanese occupied outposts in the Aleutians. Reinforcements were needed in Alaska. The next strike might be at the mainland.

In addition the joint chiefs of staff for Canadian-American defense had decided to construct a military highway and a chain or airports into the heart of Alaska.

Thousands of men and countless tons of supplies had to be shipped north, but shipping was short, Japanese submarines and bombers had taken a heavy toll, Australia was beleaguered. Heavy convoys were needed in the North Atlantic. Comparatively few vessels could be assigned to the defense of Alaska, and these must be made as effective as possible.

In Washington and Ottawa, men with stars and batons on their shoulders bent over maps, studied charts, sent for reports. Always they returned to one point on the map of the North Pacific—Prince Rupert.

It was 1,500 miles from Seattle to Anchorage, headquarters of Alaska Defense Command. But it was only 860 miles from Prince Rupert to Anchorage. What if Prince Rupert were made the embarkation point for Alaska? Would not each ship then be able to haul at least 50 percent more cargo because of the reduced distance?

Looking at the map, the joint chiefs of staff saw that the Canadian National Railway divided at Red Pass Junction in the Rockies. The main line twisted off down the Fraser River to Vancouver, but a branch curved through the Selkirk Range and down the mighty canyon of the Skeena to Prince Rupert. This branch would become the principal supply line to the men fighting to hold Alaska against the invader.

On April 5, 1942, Prince Rupert was officially designated a subport of the Seattle Port of Embarkation. Engineer troops and civilian construction workers poured into the town.

One of America's most scenic rail routes became a thoroughfare for war. An armored train was put into service behind a mammoth Diesel locomotive to protect the Prince Rupert line from possible aerial attack. It was fitted with searchlights, machine guns, and antiaircraft weapons. Canadian soldiers manned it. Bristling steel cars patrolled the mountain tracks which connected Prince Rupert with Red Pass Junction.

In Prince Rupert itself Army engineers went to work. Dockage along the waterfront was doubled. A huge warehouse was built. Office buildings were put up. Barracks and Quonset huts took shape overnight. Marine repair shops and drydocks were added; so was a cold-storage plant. Across Prince Rupert Harbor a military staging area was built at Port Edward to house men while en route to or from the Alaskan theater of war.

Huge freighters stood at the docks, taking on supplies for Anchorage, Seward, Nome, Dutch Harbor, and other key Alaskan points. Barges shipped equipment to Juneau and Skagway at the head of the Inside Passage. Bulldozers and steamshovels rolled through Prince Rupert every day—equipment for the construction of the 1,519-mile military road from Dawson Creek, British Columbia, to Fairbanks. Wher formerly a locomotive whistled three times a week in the gorge of the Skeena, the granite walls now resounded to the noise of innumerable trains.

The United States Army spent $17,100,000 converting Prince Rupert into a model, modern port. Canada spent an additional $1,796,775 for a naval base and harbor defenses.

Today, Prince Rupert, best equipped seaport north of Vancouver, is the only nothern port tied to the interior of the continent by rail. These facts vitally affect the future of trade and shipping in the North Pacific.

Railroad freight rates to Price Rupert and to Seattle and Vancouver have been equalized. This means that a tractor manufactured at Detroit can be put down on the dock at Prince Rupert for the same cost it is hauled to Vancouver or Seattle. Cigarettes produced in North Carolina can be transported to Price Rupert by rail as cheaply as they can be put down at Burrard Inlet. It costs no more to haul a radio set built in Chicago to Prince Rupert than it does to Tacoma.

HUGE CARGOES SHIPPED FROM NORTH PORT

It costs 97 cents to ship 100 pounds of flour from Seattle to Skagway; the cost from Prince Rupert is 48 cents. It costs $3.08 to ship 100 pounds of cigarettes from Seattle to Skagway; the cost from Prince Rupert is $1.42. A radio set weighing 100 pounds can be shipped from Seattle to Skagway for $3.72; the cost from Prince Rupert is $1.71. It costs $3.45 to ship a small aircraft tool set from Seattle to Skagway; the cost from Prince Rupert is $2.42.

Shipping tolls from Portland, Tacoma, and Vancouver are substantially the same as from Seattle. Thus it can be clearly seen why the development of Prince Rupert as a seaport challenges the entire routine and pattern of the Alaskan trade.

If a Ketchikan fisherman has a good salmon season and wants to buy an Oldsmobile or Chrysler sedan, he must pay $86.70 to have the car shipped north from Seattle. But if it is shipped from Prince Rupert the shipping costs will be $40.80.

Prince Rupert is a Canadian port, and vessels of foreign registry are forbidden by United States law to carry passengers and freight between Alaskan harbors. During the war the law was suspended, and Prince Rupert became the main military entrance to Alaska. Now many Alaskans are demanding suspension coastwise law be continued.

Tariff and customs regulations also interfere with the extended use of Prince Rupert as transportation gateway to Alaska. Yet this is certain to be a controversial issue all along the Pacific seaboard for years to come. The mountain rail line to Prince Rupert has been improved. The United States Government has spent $17,000,000 to raise the standard of Prince Rupert's port facilities. Alaskans are already insisting that they receive the benefit of these developments.

Last year the North Pacific planning project suggested that a pulp, plywood, and paper industry be built up in southeastern Alaska by using the Prince Rupert portal. The study proposed that railroad cars be loaded at the Alaskan mills and plants and then moved by car ferry through the smooth waters of the inside passage to Prince Rupert, whence the Canadian National Railways could roll them to any point in Canada or the United States. There is scarcely an item which cannot be shipped to Alaska more cheaply from Prince Rupert than any other seaport.

"Still another factor of considerable interest to Alaska," reveals the recently released North Pacific Planning report, "is the extension of the main north-south Columbia highway system to Prince Rupert. This opens up the possibility of motor-vehicle ferry service which would connect the communities of southeastern Alaska, not only with the highway system of British Columbia and the United States, but also through Haines and the newly expanded Alaska highway system of the Yukon territory and Alaska. If this highway transportation connection develops (and there is nothing to be seen at present which will prevent it), the economic relationships of Alaska communities with each other and Prince Rupert will become much stronger than they have been in the past. This will lend additional stimulus to the growth of Alaskan traffic through Prince Rupert.

"It is, of course, not to be implied," the report continues, "that Seattle and Vancouver will cease to serve as the principal supply bases of the north country. But the significance of Prince Rupert as a shipping point to Alaska cannot be dismissed."

In 1939 cargoes weighing 14,781,000 pounds had been unloaded from Canadian vessels at Prince Rupert; by 1943 the total had soared to 72,026,000 pounds.

The War Department reports that considerably more than 1,000,000 tons of cargo were shipped through Prince Rupert by the United States Army during the war.

Today Prince Rupert is the focal point of transportation controversy which may shake the northland. It is 640 miles nearer to Alaska than is Seattle, 820 miles nearer than is Portland. It is Vancouver's rival for trade with the Orient, with shorter mileage to Hong Kong and Shanghai.

Congressional Reorganization Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES W. TRIMBLE

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I find myself with quite mixed emotions on this bill. The undoubted need for reorganization and streamlining of the legislative processes impel me to favor the legislation; yet, on the other hand, the elements of increased pay and retirement benefits for Members in it constrain me to oppose the bill. I have voted against these provisions in other legislation in the House. Therefore, in view of that fact, I must oppose the legislation now pending.

It's Your Patriotic Duty To Register and Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM T. GRANAHAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, the results in primaries which have taken place so far this year show an alarming negligence on the part of hundreds of thousands of American citizens in their failure to go to the polls and vote. In this wonderful country of ours citizenship is a serious responsibility. If a government of the people, by the people, and for the people is to be maintained, our citizens must not be indifferent about taking part in elections. In neglecting to register and vote they are failing to take advantage of a great privilege—the privilege of helping to select the type of representatives who they feel would best protect their interests and fight for legislation that will benefit not only a few selfish interests but the people of our country as a whole.

The importance of the coming November election cannot be too strongly emphasized. Every citizen who has reached the age of 21 should register—and do it now. Do not put it off until tomorrow, because tomorrow never comes.

In the recent Pennsylvania primary only some 1,300,000 voted, as compared with three times that number—3,794,000—who voted in 1944. I want to appeal to the people of Pennsylvania, particularly those in the Second Congressional District, to come out and register and vote for United States Senator, Governor, congressional candidates, State senators, and members of the legislature, so that our State will have the right type of representation in the National Congress and the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. Our Philadelphia citizens can register at City Hall Annex every weekday from 9 a. m. to 4 p. m.; Saturdays, from 9 a. m. to 12 noon. You cannot vote unless you are registered. The registration commission of the city of Philadelphia will set only 1 day for you to register in your ward for the coming November election. The last day to register at City Hall Annex is September 18, 1946.

No American citizen should take the easy way and let others do the voting. The character of our Government is largely what the voters make it. Every voter is part of the Government and he should protect and cherish his right to participate in its elections. It took 50 years of untiring work before the nineteenth amendment to the Constitution was adopted, which gave women equal suffrage, but the effort has been more than justified by the deep interest which women have taken in elections since that time.

Ask any returned serviceman the value of each person contributing his share and doing his own part in an outlined program of action. A policy of indifference can no more win the peace than it could have won the war. The parents, wives, and sweethearts of veterans will remember that our servicemen fought for the freedom which we enjoy, and I hope that they will impress upon their friends and neighbors that the perpetuation of our democracy depends upon a wide-awake and vigilant electorate.

Every American citizen should take advantage of the opportunity to exercise his franchise. If you do this you will express your will by voting for the candidates who you think will represent you and not some selfish interest. It is your patriotic duty to register and vote.

Justice for Finland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. LEROY JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, on several occasions our country has expressed great friendship for little Finland. Unfortunately, during the war, she was ground between the millstones of two autocratic powers.

Finland is the one and only country that is paying her debt to the United States. Every installment of this debt has been paid by her at the time it became due, with interest.

Recently, there was a thought-provoking article in the Washington Post which I am including in my remarks, by virtue of the unanimous consent granted to me.

Let us hope and pray that our State Department, even with all of the duties it has, may be able to give a boost to Finland so she may receive the justice to which she is entitled.

The article referred to reads as follows:

FINNISH TERRITORY

By insisting on the Communist principle of unanimity, Soviet Russia has so far managed to have everything her own way about the coming peace. Our delegates to the Foreign Ministers' meeting in Paris have seen with their own eyes what a tough comrade Brother Stalin is to deal with.

Finland for the last 1,000 years, and more particularly for the last 6 years, has had to live with this same Russia as neighbor. Since 1939 Finland has twice been attacked by the Soviet Union.

Russia made a separate armistice with Finland, taking one-third of her territory, establishing at least one fortified position on Finnish soil, and making Finland pay a $300,000,000 war indemnity. The 3,000,000 Finns, true to their previous reputation, have already paid more than one-half of the $300,000,000, while the whole world made an open fuss for several months of precious Foreign Ministers' meeting time to object to 40,000,000 Italians paying $100,000,000.

So, even without invoking any principle of unanimity, by the time the general peace is signed Soviet Russia will almost have taken $300,000,000 in Finland's forestry products, ships, railroad rolling stock, and everything that a nation can be despoiled of.

As to the third of Finland's territory, it comprises most of Finland's forests which are vital to Finland supporting herself and dealing honorably with other nations as she always has. This one-third of Finland's territory is purely Finnish. There is not the slightest justification for allowing Soviet Russia to take it or to keep it. Russia has already endless wastes of land.

As the peace conference gets under way it is high time that every American raise his voice in protest against depriving Finland of one-third of her territory. At the Versailles Peace Conference we followed the principle of peace without annexations and war indemnities, which also was one of the slogans of the newborn Bolshevik Russia.

In the atomic age no nation should be permitted to use the silly pretext for land graft that the neighbors' land is needed for protecting one's own land. Modern weapons have deprived that awkward notion of all of its flimsy coherence. Mr. VANDENBERG says we shall not bargain in human rights and fundamental liberties anywhere in the world. The conscience of the Allied world must speak up now.

JOHN A. GRANLUND.

How Much Longer Are We To Abuse Our Ally, the Government of China?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by George E. Sokolsky, who lived in China many years and knows it intimately, from the Times-Herald, Washington, D. C., July 22, 1946:

China is the orphan of the war. Fighting longest and undoubtedly at the largest cost in life, China remains what she has been for half a century, a country in turmoil, in confusion, without genuine governmental authority.

Even the foreign ministers at Paris treated China contemptuously by rejecting her as a sponsor for the forthcoming Peace Conference. China simply does not count.

It might have been different had the United States recognized all of China's possibilities as an ally. And one does not look too closely at allies as long as they play the game, for if China has its Soongs, we have our Garssons. But the United States, in a manner, betrayed China. At the secret Singapore conference, prior to our entry into the war, the United States agreed that, in the event of a victory, Hong Kong was to be returned to Great Britain.

At the Yalta conference, Franklin D. Roosevelt agreed to give to Soviet Russia the railroads of Manchuria, Port Arthur, and Dairen, which practically means that Soviet Russia and not China succeeded to Japan's rights and claims in Manchuria, where Russia has not even the justification, small as it was, that Japan had. Yalta is one of the meanest, the most cynical betrayals in history.

To top that, instead of fully supporting the government that was our ally in war, that we had recognized and with which we have treaties, the United States has been parleying with communistic rebels, a fifth column of Soviet Russia, in that country.

When Gen. Pat Hurley was our Ambassador to China, he uncovered our chicanery and the fact that the State Department was pursuing intrigue rather than policy, trickery rather than principle. He was thrown to the wolves of left-wing propaganda.

Then General Marshall was sent to China as a sort of honest broker between a recognized government and the rebels against it, as though the rebels could have any status with us. And now, instead of appointing General Wedemeyer our Ambassador to China, as planned and rumored, Mr. Truman surprisingly appoints the aged and pollyannish Dr. Leighton Stuart, a missionary educator with an astonishing ability at fund raising and for agreeing with everybody.

Dr. Stuart knows Chinese personalities, but it is doubtful if by training and habit of mind he is capable of understanding China's role in world affairs.

General Wedemeyer has been in the thick of China at war; Dr. Stuart, in the nearly 3 decades that I have observed him in China, never adopted a positive stand on any issue requiring positiveness. Of course, he is popular with all factions as all are who have no positive position on anything. He is a nice man, if you know what I mean. At this moment the United States needs strength in China; it sends as Ambassador an excellent public relations counsel.

And so we move along, weakly, uncertainly, fearful to antagonize the Russians, insistent upon maintaining the British Empire, more worried by the corruptions of the Soongs than we are by the prospects of establishing a sufficiently strong government in China so that our policies and purposes and trade in China can be made to count for something in our interest. Or do we have an interest? By the look of it, one would imagine that American diplomacy has become a sort of game of parchesi.

There is this that Chiang Kai-shek probably thinks about from time to time: He could at any time between 1931 and 1945 have made a deal with the Japanese which would have given China generally and his government in particular a better deal than China has today.

I know this is so because in 1930–31, Baron Shidehara, then Japanese minister, discussed such terms with me and in every respect his terms were superior to China's estate today. Chiang Kai-shek could have betrayed us and aided the Japanese during the war. He remained true to his obligations to us and was betrayed by Mr. Roosevelt at Yalta.

Chiang must wonder what kind of people he is dealing with. We ought to wonder what will happen to the balance in Asia, if Chiang Kai-shek can take no more of it and quits.

S. 2177—Present Salary and Allowance of Congressmen Are Adequate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. LEROY JOHNSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote for the amendment of Mr. BUCK, of New York. We are now receiving a salary of $10,000 and $2,500 for expenses. In fact, the expense money is really an increase in salary. Looking at it that way, our salary has been increased 25 percent.

If I thought that the increase in salary proposed by the bill would bring better Congressmen, I would not hesitate one moment to vote for it. However, if we place the salary too high what we will get is not able and statesmanlike Congressmen, but politicians, whose prime interest in the office of Congressman is to make more money than they are able to make in private life or in some bureaucratic job. The result will be less statesmanship and more politics in Congress.

It is my considered conviction that men who go into public life, and particularly, Members of Congress, are not generally the type who have a money instinct. While it is true that they should receive a reasonable compensation in order to take care of themselves and their families in accordance with the station which they occupy, I believe that most of the men whom I have met in Congress are here primarily because they love the public service. The Congressman in this day and age has a chance to participate in some of the great things that are happening in the world. He has the opportunity to help lay the foundation for a more stable and peaceful world. He has the chance to lay the foundation for more social justice and greater opportunities for the people at home. To me the salary and allowances now obtained are adequate for a man to live appropriate to the station in life which his office entitles him to. The privilege of directly participating in the great events that are now being unfolded is, in itself, worth a great deal to an individual. It is for that and other reasons that I think any additional allowances at this time are unnecessary and perhaps even unwarranted.

Leib Launches Movement To Unite Numerous World War II Organizations Into One Group

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, every Member of Congress is anxious to see the 196 veteran organizations that have sprung up out of the recent war united under one banner. The veterans of this war are divided and it is important that they unite. It is obvious that they want their own organization. They are badly in need of one strong national voice rather than the many local voices that have and are coming up each day.

In this connection a movement to consolidate the numerous World War II organizations is now under way. The campaign is now spearheaded by youthful J. H. Leib, who has done yeoman work in behalf of the veterans. It was he who started the fight to clean up the Veterans' Administration which ultimately ended in the resignation of General Hines and the appointment of General Bradley as Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. Five months before the newspaper PM and the Cosmopolitan magazine took up the issue, Leib had hammered away in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and in the Nation's newspapers demanding a sweeping investigation of this neglected Government agency, as evinced by statements appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 91, part 2, page 1956; and in the Appendix, volume 90, part 10, page A3914; volume 90, part 11, pages A4377, A4422, A4569; volume 91, part 10, pages A9, A75, A369, A879; volume 91, part 12, A2909.

It was Leib who urged that the base pay of the soldiers be increased to $50 per month and today our fighting men are the highest paid in the world. Those who are familiar with the inside story of this campaign who know who did the work and who carried the banner. Source: CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 87, part 7, pages 7047–7062; and in the Appendix, volume 87, part 13, page A3937; volume 89, part 10, page A2280.

I would like at this time to list a few additional crusades undertaken by Leib in behalf of the veterans and servicemen as well as the Nation as a whole, as follows:

First. He led the campaign that brought about the investigation of the artificial limb industry. Source: Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 91, part 13, page A4743.

Second. Veterans' Administration adopted Leib's suggestion that veterans hospitalized in Government institutions be granted either correspondence courses or direct classroom instruction. Source: Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 92, page A102.

Third. Brought about the revision of the pauper oath requirement for admission to veterans' hospitals and forced the Veterans' Administration to reduce the hospital application form from 4 pages to less than a page and a half. Source: CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 91, part 3, page 3325.

Fourth. Was the first to demand that the World War II insurance policies be revised and to include the same benefits that were granted to veterans of the last war. Source: Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 91, part 13, page A5024.

Fifth. Played an important role in bringing about the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery within the Veterans' Administration. Source: Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 91, part 12, page A3833; volume 91, part 13, pages A5120, A5184.

Sixth. Caused the Navy Department to make test for conventional styles for new sailors' uniforms. Source: Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 92, page A11.

Seventh. Revealed that United States ships were gathering barnacles in far Pacific ports and induced the Government to use these vessels to bring the servicemen home. Source: Banner headline, Washington Daily News, January 1, 1946, and January 7, 1946; also Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 92, page A31.

Eighth. Brought about the investigation of the defective-airplane scandal through the Senate War Investigating Committee. Source: CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 89, part 3, page 3319; volume 91, part 1, page 193; volume 91, part 3, page 3475; and the Appendix, volume 88, part 10, page A3944; volume 89, part 10, pages A1618, A2280; volume 91, part 10, A823.

Leib has held the following offices in the veterans' organizations: Vice commander, service officer, chairman, serviceman hospitality committee, Costello Post, American Legion, Washington, D. C., one of the largest posts in the Nation.

Chairman, hospitalization and rehabilitation committee, national legislative director, national officer, Sad Sacks, one of the founders of the organization, Amvets, American Veterans of World War II. (This organization was founded by Elmo W. Keel.)

Member Disabled American Veterans.

At this point I would like to include a newspaper article that appeared in the Stars and Stripes, Washington, D. C., April 25, 1946, as follows:

AMVET LEGISLATIVE REPRESENTATIVE HAS WON COLORFUL WAY

Joseph H. Leib, legislator director of the Amvets, American veterans of World War II, became perhaps the most congressionally quoted American private citizen last week, having been mentioned from time to time by legislators from all 48 States. Representative HARRY L. TOWE, World War I veteran, of New Jersey, completed the national tally of States.

Leib's items or statements about him have appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on 509 different occasions.

During the past few years the Amvets' legislative leader, through his tireless work on Capitol Hill, has been credited in many circles with having initiated the campaign to raise the base pay of Army privates from $21 to $50; first suggesting the establishment of the Senate War Investigating Committee, and the war fraud section of the Department of Justice; leading the fight that brought about the recent indictment of the artificial limb industry; instigating the investigation of the aircraft industry by the Truman and Mead committees, and among other things, starting a campaign which led to the investigation of veterans' hospitals.

A long record of service to veterans marks his career. He has been credited in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as having saved the Nation more than $11,000,000,000 through passage of the renegotiation and war fraud bills.

Leib, who was sketched recently in the Washington Sunday Star by Howard Bluett as the legislator without portfolio, launched his career when as still a teen-ager he walked into Al Smith's national headquarters in New York and became a campaigner. Later, at a tender age, he started the first Roosevelt for President Club in the United States, became chief of correspondence of a large Federal agency, and then, leaving partisan politics after a break with the Roosevelt administration over the Supreme Court packing issue, he began his present occupation as a free lance writer.

Following his discharge from the Army in World War II, Leib aided in the formation of the Amvets, and today is the organization's "voice" on Capitol Hill.

OPA—Guardian of the People's Purse

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM T. GRANAHAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, the OPA is the average citizen's first line of defense against runaway inflation. Many thousands of people, including businessmen and industrialists who opposed its continuation, have rallied to the support of price legislation now that they have witnessed the catastrophic results since the exit of the OPA.

With few exceptions price increases have skyrocketed to heights rivaling those which followed 1919 and precipitated a postwar depression. Such a situation can and must be averted, and the only means of holding the price line throughout the Nation is by price control.

Buyers' strikes, sharp rises in the cost of foodstuffs, and rental profiteers, to cite but a few instances, give ample testimony to the nefarious practices which the country could have expected without the restoration of the OPA. I am proud of my votes in favor of a strong OPA. A vote against the OPA was a vote for legalized black-marketing.

Price controls exist only as an emergency measure, and that the threat of inflation is a very real emergency every housewife and shopper knows full well. During the interim that price regulations ceased to exist many hundreds of letters came to my office citing cases of shameless abuses. One instance which bears mentioning concerned a rental increase on a modest home from $35 per month to $60 a month. My attention was also called to commensurate increases in the costs of food products, meats, butter, and other essential commodities.

No one for a moment holds that the original OPA act was, or the new act is, the most perfect instrument to combat inflation. However, it is only by such legislation that we can retard the inflationary spiral and save our national economy. Unquestionably it will be necessary to amend prices from time to time, should surpluses accumulate in certain commodities and the demand thus fail to meet the available supply of price regulated goods. Moreover, as production meets demand competitive prices will find their own level and it will be possible to gradually abolish price control.

Until that time comes, the OPA remains our strongest weapon against the black market, which annually drains millions of dollars in hard-earned money from the pockets of working men and their families. According to one report reaching me, the week-long buyers' strike protesting the unwarranted rise in the costs of meats resulted in the black market losing more than $10,000,000.

Certainly we all want the radios, new automobiles, and other goods so long denied us during the war years. But we want them at just and fair prices, at prices we can afford without endangering our own security and welfare.

I am happy that the overwhelming majority of my constituents supported me in my appeals and votes for an effective OPA. Less than 5 percent opposed price control legislation, and I feel sure that the percentage has been cut considerably in view of what transpired during the weeks the country lacked an OPA.

The new Price Control Act is commonsense legislation, which recognizes the peril of inflation. Moreover, it represents a substantial improvement over the earlier OPA extension bill, which was quite properly vetoed by President Truman as a mockery. It was a spurious bill, which would not have served the purpose for which it was intended. Conversely, the OPA Act now in effect, while not foolproof, gives every indication of safeguarding the American public from the evils of inflation which have completely wrecked the economy of Poland and China, and which have played havoc with the economic structures of France and other countries of Europe.

We saw a sample of what inflation can do to the Nation when the OPA ceased to exist. Now that it has been restored let us resolve to keep it until the black markets are dead and it is no longer necessary. It is a big job but, with the cooperation of consumers, shopkeepers, manufacturers, landlords, and all concerned with the welfare of the Nation, we can achieve that goal.

The CIO-PAC and Its Objectives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the CIO-PAC, the one-worlders, and the Communists would overthrow our form of government. They have been at it for many years. They vilify everyone who refuses to wear their saddle, follow their lead.

They have been so abusive that many good men have refused to remain in Congress. Others who have made the campaign have, by their misrepresentations, been defeated.

The following is, first, from the column of George E. Sokolsky in the Washington Times-Herald of July 24, and refers to BURTON K. WHEELER. The second is by Frank C. Waldrop in the July 25 issue of the same paper, and refers to Martin Dies. The third is from a returned World War II veteran, who knows what the CIO-PAC is doing to him:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of July 24, 1946]

THESE DAYS

(By George E. Sokolsky)

Few men will be more missed in the United States Senate than Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, for his experience has been great, his integrity beyond question, and his understanding of national and international questions of the highest order. He has served with distinction and competence for nearly 24 years, and in a world distracted by vulgarity and cheapness in high places, he stands a monument to the finest American traditions.

WHEELER is opposed to war. The very radicals and liberals who have fought him this year used to regard him as a veritable Solomon of wisdom and an outstanding and pristine liberal whom they lauded with paeans of praise as they now besmirch his name with the ugliest of smears. Certainly history has already established the purposeless horrors of World War I. It was a futile, useless war which only served to pave the way for World War II.

It wrecked Europe, brought a fierce depression upon this country, and paved the way for fascism and communism. It destroyed many monarchies but did not really establish democracies. Instead, it made possible the careers of the three most evil men in history, Stalin, Hitler, and Mussolini, in the order named.

WHEELER was opposed to World War II. But he was no longer regarded as a liberal, for he had remained a believer in democracy, which is an offensive word to those who have succumbed to Communist propaganda in support of a totalitarian state.

He recognized the New Deal as a confused and embryonic American imitation of European totalitarianism. Always a true liberal, he supported the New Deal only as far as it conformed to democratic traditions.

He fought valiantly on the floor of the Senate for democracy and American idealism; therefore he was smeared by this bund of acid throwers and night-soil slingers as a Fascist and a reactionary. The fifth columnists of hate turned all their scorn upon him, forgetting his services to the best causes of mankind for more than a score of years.

Another element entered into this campaign. There is a group of men in New York, terrifyingly financed, fanatical in their zeal, utterly ruthless in their methods, un-American in their concepts, honest in their purposes but immoral in their tactics, who have made a god of Hitler as some of the peoples of Asia worship the devil. The focus of all their thinking is Hitler. They have no relations with their God, no worship, no faith, no beliefs—except that Hitler was the most potent creature on earth, therefore the greatest menace to them. They offer no positive idealism, only a prolongation of hatreds. They judge all questions, all issues, all men, by their relationship to Hitler. Anyone who opposed our entry into the war to make the world safe for Stalin is regarded as pro-Hitler, pro-Nazi, pro-Fascist.

These men are not Communists. Many of them are rich capitalists engaged in business. But they have gone completely mad on the Hitler issue; the defeat of Germany, the death of Hitler, the trial of his associates, the rise of Stalin, the peril of world communism, even the dangers to the United States means nothing to them.

They are out for revenge.

They seek to kill off in American political and public life every man who at any stage opposed the so-called "Roosevelt policies," and that, in spite of the enveloping evidence of his deceit and trickiness. They are political paranoiacs, with a ferocious persecution complex, to which some of them add a guilt complex for the years during which they betrayed their own kin and coreligionists.

They are surrounded by paid employees, job holders who receive munificent salaries to keep this pot of hate and revenge boiling. Their jobs depend upon keeping Hitler's memory alive, which they do.

They are now soliciting funds in New York for PAC on the grounds that PAC fights anti-Semitism, which it, of course, does not do. In fact, all this activity keeps Hitler alive in the United States, which is good fund-raising. It is important to bring all this into the open, and the WHEELER defeat in Montana does just that.

WHY DIES QUIT

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

LUFKIN, Tex., July 24.—Here in this wayside town with his feet on the desk and his hat down over his eyes, rests a Texan whose name went around the world.

He is Martin Dies, who for 16 years represented the Second Congressional District of Texas in the House of Representatives, and for 6 was chairman of a special House committee to investigate un-American activities.

That committee sat longer than any like group in the history of Congress and was granted more continuing funds. It has even become a part of the permanent organization of the present Congress.

But in 1944 when its work was at a climax of tension and struggle, Dies suddenly announced that he was through with Congress and would not try for reelection.

Why he quit has been a mystery in Washington ever since, so naturally, I had to come up here and ask him about it.

The answer is very simple. Dies just got sick and tired of it all.

"I had a sore spot on my larynx that a couple of doctors told me was cancer. I had been taking nothing but abuse from the Reds and the New Dealers for six straight years. When I came to Congress I was pretty well off, but by 1944 I wasn't. I lost ground financially every year.

"And then Roosevelt and his crowd had poured the money into my district to beat me. I just was sick and tired of the whole thing and I still am. I'll never run for the House of Representatives again."

Dies is as healthy today as he ever was. No cancer developed. He is practicing law with satisfaction, financially and otherwise. He is buying and trading as all Texans do who can, in timber, cattle, and ranch land.

More than that, he is planning to send his son, Martin Dies, Jr., back to the House of Representatives.

Young Dies was a lieutenant in the Navy during the war, and fought aboard a destroyer all up and down the Pacific wearing all the time his cowboy boots, nonregulation though they were. Now he is married and studying law at Southern Methodist University.

"In two years he'll be ready to run," says the old campaigner, "and he'll win. I know how to put him over."

Dies himself will run for the Senate, when next he has a shot at politics, he says.

The only other consideration that could draw him back to Washington would be that of special counsel to a congressional investigation of "the whole d—— New Deal from top to bottom."

That he would like and to get it he would toss overboard his reestablished law practice, though "I make more in 3 months now than I did in a year sitting around Washington taking that beating, day and night."

Dies has on the shelf behind his head a full set of the famous hearings he conducted, all bound in dark red leather with gold tooling. But he never looks at them any more.

"I don't regret it, even if it did only make me enemies and left me very few friends," he said with a jerk of his thumb at the 16 volumes.

"There it is, and history is proving me right. Only one thing I regret. We made one terrible blunder. We actually located the real, true, complete files of the Communist Party out in Arizona and before we could get them they were gone.

"Over the border to Mexico, I think. But anyhow, they got away. If we could have got those, we would have unwound those b—— for sure."

Judging by all appearances and all the record I have been able to piece together, Dies never was a very sick man. It was less fear of cancer and more sheer boredom that made him quit.

"I know what the fight is all about and the Communists know what it is all about. I understand them and they understand me.

"But I just got sick and tired of being shot at by the damn fools who had to wait until Stalin, Molotov, and Gromyko went to work on Jimmy Byrnes, before they could see what is going on in the world.

"Now I'm going to sit back and watch somebody else learn for a while.

"It's all in the record for which I'm thankful. We made plenty of mistakes. We were under pressure all the time from the White House to lay off and sometimes we had things planted on us. Sometimes we were just dumb. We had to learn as we went along. But there's the record. Now let them laugh it off.

"I haven't got anything to be sorry for, except that I didn't hit harder. As far as foreign policy goes, I voted with Roosevelt on every angle of it, much as I opposed him for letting the Communists loose in our Government.

"I was just as much against the Nazis as I was the Communists, and as I was against the Ku Klux Klan before I ever came to Congress.

"Now, by God, the Nazis are gone, the Klan is coming back, and all of a sudden even the New Dealers are beginning to get worried about the Communists.

"Me, I'm practicing country law, and if you'll stay over I'll give you a barbecue and take you down to my ranch. It's the prettiest thing in this end of the country."

And there, citizens, you have the country Congressman who was selected back in 1938 by then Vice President John Nance Garner, as the best man to head up a temporary committee intended to root out at least the worst un-American elements in the Government, and who rose literally to world renown by going to the mat with the President of the United States himself, when Roosevelt tried to make Dies pull his punches and play White House politics with communism.

Time has surely proved Dies was on the right side of the issue in that monumental battle within the Democratic Party as to whether the Communists could be used or had better be kicked out and nailed up before the world for the blood-lusting revolutionaries they are.

The Communists got their foothold in the Democratic Party in 1933, and now in 1946 they have split it wide open.

They have done that in America. And in Europe they are the controlling or in the least instance the pivotal power of politics in every country from the English Channel clear back beyond into Asia, and right down to the China Sea.

What is their aim? In their own literature they state it. "To rule the world, and to gain that rule by the bloody overthrow of every government standing against them."

The New Deal's most new dealish attorney general and open enemy of Martin Dies was Francis Biddle, of Philadelphia.

Yet Dies forced Biddle's hand to the point that even he had to acknowledge in a court of law that the Communist Party in the USA, from its origin down to the present, has advocated, aimed at, and worked for the overthrow of our constitutional government by force and violence.

Dies forced that all onto the public record. The country owes him acknowledgment of the truth that he faced the New Deal down and exposed its game of playing cozy with communism even though his action cost him the support of the most powerful faction within his own Democratic Party and in time drove him out of Congress.

When I was discharged from the Army I got a job through the Government employment agency, but I had to join the CIO. Is the Government employment agency working for CIO?

One month after going to work I was assessed for $5 to support OPA; the next month $5 for organization work in the South; then $2 for flowers for Hillman's funeral. If I don't pay, I am told I will be barred from work anywhere and my wife and child beg or starve. Is this a free country?

Bellamy Sees Dachau, Then Nuremberg—Finds War Trials "Diffuse"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the sixth in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called A Trip Through Hell, and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

It might be interesting to take a look at Dachau:

The cyanide chambers, where the miserable victims of Nazi liquidation policies were destroyed, are still maintained and will be kept as a public monument. It is said that 238,000 were "processed" there, including Jews, political prisoners, and renegade Nazis.

We saw a film at Nuremberg of Dachau as well as Belsen, another of the terrible concentration camps.

The heart turns sick at such incredible monstrosity.

When the avenging troops marched in, so many bodies of victims were lying around, and their carcasses were so corrupting the air, that in some cases it was necessary to bring out great bulldozers with steel blades in front of them which literally swept thousands of bodies into a common grave.

The sight was the most awful I have ever witnessed. Poor, miserable, emaciated corpses being hurtled by the behemoth bulldozer into their final resting place. Occasionally a leg would come off. Occasionally an arm would stick out in a most distorted manner, as the bodies rolled one on top of the other into oblivion.

That film should be shown to every German, as it has already been shown to the people in Munich.

NOT MANY REMORSEFUL

But I regret to say that there are not a great many remorseful Germans. The film showed photographs of Germans witnessing these sights. Some of the women dabbed at their handkerchiefs, but, by and large, both women and men said although they lived near Dachau they knew nothing of what was going on. Someone more naive than I will have to be found to give credence to this statement.

In Dachau, as I have said, there is a stockade with 20,000 German prisoners, mostly members of the SS and the SA storm troopers. There is also an office of the War Crimes Commission, headed by Dr. M. Dortheimer, a professor of international law at the University of Krakow, one of the oldest in Europe. He is the man who, with his staff, is screening these young criminals to determine those whose specific crimes are sufficient to justify their trial before military tribunals.

Contiguous to the stockade is a prison house with cells where the more dangerous criminals are kept, including some who have already been remanded for trial. We saw there, guards who had killed their thousands, women who had literally clubbed to death hundreds of their own sex, and both men and women who had committed bestial crimes against the dignity of man so awful as to be unprintable.

Now if anyone thinks he can make good little lambs out of those rattlesnakes by feeding them a bowl of warm milk, he and I have been living in different universes.

A DAY IN COURT

At Nuremberg we were privileged to spend a whole day in the courtroom of the international tribunal trying Goering and his associate criminals. This is the boiled-down sirup of the whole Nazi conspiracy against mankind.

Here, after many screenings were deposited, the ultimate criminals who hatched the whole thing, with exception of the master criminal himself, who died by his own hand.

I state this as a fact, because there seems to be no doubt about it in Europe, but if there be any doubt as to whether Hitler is dead, there is no doubt that his ideas are dead and that if he were to appear in the ruined square of Nuremberg, for example, he would immediately be seized and cast into jail like a common criminal. The illusion is gone. The dance of death is over. There has come a new day.

You are all familiar with the intricate telephone system by which the spectators at the trial are able to hear the proceedings in whatever languages, one of four they elect. I naturally chose English, and on placing the phones to my ears was able to get the testimony quite well through the voice of the English interpreter, although the trial was conducted mostly in French and German.

The defendant on the stand that day, testifying in his own defense, was Alfred Rosenberg, the "idea" man of the Nazis, and the great international art thief next to Hitler himself and Goering.

TRIAL THEORY EXPLAINED

It struck all of our party that the proceedings were pretty diffused and that the defendants were allowed to talk about almost anything they wanted to, including apple pie and the Great Dipper. But the whole theory of the trial was explained to us very well that night in Nuremberg, when we were the guests of Justice Robert Jackson, the American prosecutor.

Incidentally, after the morning session we had luncheon with several members of the court, including Francis Biddle, former Attorney General of the United States.

The afternoon session ended, we adjourned to our hotel, where that evening, as I have said, Jackson gave a dinner. It was attended also by Willis Smith of North Carolina, president of the American Bar Association, who had been delegated by that organization to study the Nuremberg trials. Jackson was asked about the long delay in reaching convictions. His explanation was, roughly, as follows:

The United States and its victorious allies are setting up a new principle of international law following this war, namely, the principle that the chief factors in bringing about an aggressive war, involving the violation of international treaties, are personally guilty. This present list may extend to a great many thousands and ultimately to 100,000 or more, if sustained. The larger number will come into the criminal class if the court rules that membership in the storm trooper organization and certain other extremely active Nazi organizations per se renders the member a criminal.

NO PREVIOUS ATTEMPT

As Jackson pointed out, nothing like this has been attempted after any other war in history.

In ancient times Roman conquerors were wont to drag their captured kings at the chariot wheel in the Coliseum, and occasionally they cut off the head of one. More recently a group of allies imprisoned Napoleon Bonaparte on St. Helena for the rest of his life.

But there has never been anything like the present attempt to convict a whole class of persons, amounting to many thousands, or war guilt. Therefore, Jackson said, we had to have a complete record to prove that this was the most monstrous conspiracy in history against humanity. Otherwise the precedent might be used following any ordinary war where the customary procedures of war were observed, where atrocities were not the order of the day and where the liquidation of persons and minorities was not the constant occupation of the ruling class.

I observe that it seemed to me this proved, among other things, that we must win all the rest of the wars, but he stuck to his story that a nation might lose a war in which it had not been the aggressor and still not lay itself open to the sanctions which the victorious allies in this conflict were employing with Germany. I objected that the interpretation as to whether one had acted aggressively in war would be up to the victor and that it was rather unncertain what the verdict might be, but he insisted that this was a different war from any other in history, arising out of a more monstrous conspiracy that ever existed before.

CAUGHT BY OWN RECORDS

Then he went on to say that the Germans had been hoist on their own petard on the matter of keeping records. They had made a virtue out of keeping records. They had made a virtue out of writing down most meticulously every idea that they had. Besides that, they kept complete lists of all members of the party.

At the end the Allies moved in so fast on the broken foe that they recovered almost complete records of all the facts.

Some they got in salt mines. Some they dug up in warehouses, some in private residences. But the net of it was that when they accused a man of being a Nazi they knew what they were talking about. In other words, it was the most completely documented case in history.

Jackson was of the opinion that although some of the dramatics had gone out of the trial by its long duration, and there was danger that when the final verdict came down some thoughtless persons might ask what the defendants were being convicted for, all that was outweighed by the fact that we should set up a perfect record for posterity to read, that we should prove the guilt of everyone who was convicted and establish for all time the awfulness of the Nazi conspiracy.

You have all seen the pictures of the trial and made up your minds as to the character of the men being tried. My own opinion was that they were all second-raters, and that they would not have succeeded in any business except that of tyranny, at which they proved themselves adept.

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL BROWN OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I oppose S. 2177, the congressional reorganization bill, especially the retirement benefit features. I take the position that Congressmen are in a different status from persons who are employees of the executive branch of the Government. We are elected by our constituents to make the laws by which our country is governed. The law fixes our salary and I do not feel that there is any obligation on the Federal Government to provide any system of pension for Members of Congress. There are millions of elderly people in this country who do not have such benefits.

Neither do I believe we should increase the salary of Congressmen during this emergency.

It is true there may be much saving in consolidation of the various committees in reducting the number from 48 to 19. The Banking and Currency Committee, of which I am a member, loses the Commodity Credit Corporation which deals in loans to producers of agriculture, and I certainly do not see why the jurisdiction of this agency should be transferred to the Committee on Agriculture. The Export-Import Bank and international financial agreements such as Bretton Woods, which have been handled solely by the Banking and Currency Committee (members of the committee are supposed to be throughly familiar with these agencies) are now transferred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I think it is a mistake not to leave the jurisdiction of these with the Banking and Currency Committee.

For these and other reasons I could not support this bill.

Pensions for Congressmen Unwise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. LEROY JOHNSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. RIZLEY] made a very powerful argument against the provision providing pensions for Congressmen. To me it seems unanswerable. Briefly, it is that since we are the elected policy-making officers of the National Government and since we have to pass on various types of public pension plans such as pensions for the Army and pensions for Government workers, and so forth, if we start voting ourselves pensions, we will lose the very independence that we need in passing upon that problem. Independence of any selfish motive or reward in the consideration of a public problem is what makes for good judgment, and good judgment in public life means statesmanship.

There is another aspect to this problem that I think we should face squarely. It has been repeatedly stated during this debate that the pension plan for Congress is a contributory plan—that is, that we match the money that the Government puts up. In my opinion, that is not strictly true. It is true that we do match the money that the Government puts up. But remember this, that the administration expenses of handling the plan are paid for out of general funds. But even though we match the Government's contribution why not face the situation and recognize that the half that the Government pays is paid for by the taxpayers?

The result is that a great segment of our population such as farmers, small businessmen, professional men, and the like are paying a large part of the cost for pension plans for Government workers and in the particular instance for Congressmen.

If the pension system is so essential to the welfare of the American people I believe it should be made universal. By making it universal everyone who pays would in return receive something and we would not have a big portion of the load carried by a portion of our people who obtain nothing.

The pension for judges is not identical in principle with the pension for elected offices. Judges are appointed for life. It has been thought fitting that if they devote their life to work on the bench that not only for their own good but for the good of the judicial service they should, when they are aged, receive a pension in order to encourage their retirement so that younger and more vigorous men may take their places. I trust that the pension provisions of this law will be rejected.

The PAC Takes Over

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS E. GRAHAM
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Cleveland Plain Dealer of July 19, 1946:

THE PAC TAKES OVER

During the fourth-term campaign for President Roosevelt in 1944 one of the issues was the extent to which the CIO Political Action Committee had seized control of the Democratic Party.

The dispute will no doubt be revived as a result of PAC activity in this year's congressional campaigns. But in one State at least there will be no disagreement about the facts, for in Pennsylvania the PAC has taken over the Democratic Party, lock, stock, and barrel.

This was recently disclosed when Senator JOSEPH F. GUFFEY and other candidates on the Pennsylvania State Democratic ticket authorized the Pennsylvania CIO Political Action Committee to receive and disburse funds in their behalf for the November campaign.

The authorizations were filed with the Pennsylvania elections bureau by the chairman of the State CIO Political Action Committee, in accordance with a State law.

Thus the PAC is undertaking the financing of the Democratic campaign in Pennsylvania. Since it is axiomatic that whoever controls the party purse controls the party, there can be no argument about the status of the Democratic Party in Pennsylvania. It has become an adjunct of the CIO.

What this may mean for the Democratic Party nationally must be interpreted in conjunction with a reorganization of the PAC, necessitated by the recent death of Sidney Hillman.

As head of the PAC, Hillman formulated its policies, but under the reorganization plan, policies will now be determined by a five-man executive board.

This board consists of Jack Kroll, of Cincinnati, who was named administrative head of the PAC, and the secretary-treasurers of four CIO unions—the steel, electrical, auto, and textile workers. The Communists claim to have considerable strength in all these unions, but whether the Communists will be able to dominate decisions of the PAC executive board remains to be seen. One thing is certain, however. Left-wing elements will have just as much if not more voice in determining the policies of the PAC as they did when Hillman was head of it.

Hillman was not a Communist, but he was highly regarded by the Communists and worked effectively with them, both in the PAC and the New York American Labor party.

Kroll is a vice president of the CIO Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union and was an assistant to Hillman. He was an Ohio delegate to the 1944 Democratic National Convention, where he held out to the last for the renomination of Henry Wallace as Vice President, although the Ohio delegation was announced as unanimous for Truman over his heated but unheeded protest.

Sooner or later the members of the Democratic Party must decide whether the party is to be taken over nationally by the PAC, as it has been in Pennsylvania. The CIO and the PAC have shown no disposition to throw the Communists out of their organizations. On the contrary, the Communists are constantly boring further into the labor-political movement.

If the Democrats are not alert, they may wake up someday to discover that their party has become a front for the Communists.

Notre Dame

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT A. GRANT
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, recently the Navy Department, through Secretary James Forrestal, awarded a special commendation to the University of Notre Dame "for effective cooperation with the United States in the training of officer candidates under the Navy V–12 program during World War II."

Just a few short weeks ago Fleet Admiral Chester W. Nimitz, Chief of Naval Operations, spoke at Notre Dame. In lauding her contribution in training Reserve officers for the Navy, he said:

Few institutions, not excepting the two great service academies, have contributed more than Notre Dame in preparing young men for the arduous and dangerous duty of driving a cunning and powerful enemy back across the sea. There are nearly 10,000 men who can speak proudly of having won their commissions in the Navy at this great university.

Father O'Donnell, you sent forth to me, as to other naval commands on every ocean and continent, men who had become imbued with more than the mechanical knowledge of warfare.

Somehow, in the crowded hours of their preparation for the grim business of war, they absorbed not only Notre Dame's traditional fighting spirit, but the spiritual strength, too, that this university imparts to all, regardless of creed who come under its influence.

The naval chapter in Notre Dame's history is closing. Statistically, 12,269 men attended midshipman school here, and 9,099 were commissioned in the Naval Reserve, 290 in the Marines. Some 9,200 graduated from your V–12 program. An appreciable number have decided to make the Navy their career. The beneficent influence of this university on the Navy will be felt far into the future.

Those of us who have been privileged to attend the University of Notre Dame take a special pride in the words of praise that have come to our Alma Mater.

Recently, a well known Notre Dame alumnus paid a visit at his Alma Mater. Paul Mallon, well-known columnist, returned to the campus where he delivered an address at the alumni banquet in connection with the celebration of Notre Dame's 104th anniversary. Following that visit Mr. Mallon wrote the following column:

MALLON: NOTRE DAME

(By Paul Mallon)

Out here where the football teams come from, I found the American counterpart of the playing fields of Eton from which the traditions have sprung which have held the British Empire together for centuries in the face of many enemies. The playing fields of Notre Dame have grown 102 years old with the fresh growing spirit of a new nation now stepping into world leadership. You may feel it within you, pulsing with potentialities of a new hundred years, springing like the tall shade trees from the green grass, the two lakes on the large flat prairie campus, the most beautiful as a whole which I have seen from coast to coast. Upon it you may see further than the buildings of learning to the modern brick stadium in which a football spectator may see a game better than any other, the sidelines of its theater are nearly in the stands, and the press box is glass-enclosed and steam heated. Or you may see the Rockne field house, or the large golf course adjoining the buildings.

While other large universities have grown in cities where the law of nature required them to skip a block or two for the next building, and thus sprawl through town, Notre Dame has acres yet unused, a compact compus, and as I say, probably our most beautiful naturally. Like Eton, its ratio of casualties during the war was highest and like Eton many a father now may reserve entry for his son in infancy.

Does this give you the inspiration of its influence, the joining of what is new with what is old in education to furnish the spirit which is common to all this Nation and its many campuses? In this atmosphere is not where you meet juvenile delinquency. It is the exception rather than the rule. Here you may see Budenz, editor of the Communist Daily Worker in New York who is finding the new way of life, the philosophers of America and those fled from Europe, educators. Also students now grown 2 years older in their graduation to their degrees and the Naval Reserve commissions, and alumni from my day when it was a small college and Rockne coached the team of farmers' and villagers' sons from this growing area in a barely-fenced field well enough to beat Army with such frequency as to bring their annual game to the Yankee Stadium.

My trip into these surroundings climaxed a 2 weeks' journey around the country in which I attended three commencements (receiving three honorary degrees of doctor of laws and letters) and saw the younger generation. There is nothing the matter with it, if you raise it right. Healthy, earnest, eager for peace and to work for it, this coming generation of higher learning (from which leadership comes), wore its battle and service stripes well. It looked good enough to me. Its problems are greater and somewhat confused. But principles do not grow larger or smaller.

Educators out around the country, not here because the school lives on a campus outside South Bend, told me of the usual difficulties of our age and a new one. Inside the youngsters, some authorities seemed to have detected the presence in varying degrees of what might be called an undefinable resentment. It was not personal, but you might say it was against society, perhaps against authority, even governments. It lacked a precise definition, but was plainly an outgrowth of our era in which the youth himself indulged in an idealistic revolution, a revolution of the mind and methods of thought. Stirred by the revolution in governing democracy, in business and elsewhere, it had a chip on its shoulder. It was sometimes an inward rebellion against work, including an assertion of equality or superiority by minors, although nothing is produced without work and minors are still minors.

At Holy Cross College in Worcester, Mass., this symptom was met in a way which might well be copied by colleges and universities throughout the country. A committee was created which was composed of both employers and employees from the State, and labor leaders and others were invited to appear before it for talks. Its primary duty, however, was to get a job for the the graduate, suited to his capabilities. In some cases, employers astonished after a few weeks of work by a young man who may have wanted to run the factory or the world, lost faith in the enterprise. But careful handling has maintained the success of the enterprise.

Out of it all, I could see this world is now getting its largest educated population, the largest in all its existence. In many ways it is also the best educated, although it has its share of deficiencies. But the point is if reason is to guide democracy wisely (and it must), we have a better chance of getting it than ever before. We are making traditions, fresh and imaginative traditions, which also are as sound as any which have ever been made.

Reorganization of the Foreign Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT B. CHIPERFIELD

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, at long last by the passage in the House of H. R. 6967 the Foreign Service of the United States is to be overhauled, completely freed of politics, and given salary scales commensurate with the responsibilities of its officers. Provision is also made for the continued training of these officers during their service by a Foreign Service Institute, and for their re-Americanization by sending them home at regular intervals.

These fundamental principles set forth in this bill seem to me to constitute the foundation for a sound and efficient service.

Just as a reminder that these reforms were long overdue can perhaps be best illustrated by the fact there has not been a pay increase for our ambassadors or ministers since 1855—almost 100 years ago.

For the first time a career officer in the Foreign Service is permitted to be appointed an ambassador or minister without forcing him to give up his career service. For the first time it provides sufficient salaries and a retirement system which should attract good men and not force them to make a sacrifice for their work abroad, many times in unhealthy and dangerous parts. For the first time there is spelled out in detail in this bill exact provisions telling just how this reorganization should take place without granting broad general power to the Secretary of State to do as he sees fit by regulations.

How did all this come about—that we had presented to us such a comprehensive bill which has the unanimous approval not only of the entire Foreign Affairs Committee but the approval of the State Department and the officers of the Foreign Service themselves.

It was brought about by setting up a subcommittee of the Foreign Affairs Committee headed by the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia, Judge KEE, Democrat, the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. RICHARDS, Democrat, and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Mr. VORYS, Republican. This bipartisan committee sat down with officials of the State Department and worked day after day with unsurpassed diligence. By thoroughgoing research and special attention to details, they brought forth a bill which is a model of its kind.

I cannot help but comment on the excellent work of the able representative of the minority on this subcommittee, Mr. VORYS. He worked most conscientiously to perfect this bill and of the approximately 100 changes made by the subcommittee some 40 of them were suggested by this hard-working legislator. He and the other members of the subcommittee deserve the commendation and thanks of this House.

It is my sincere hope the other body of Congress will give immediate consideration to this measure so it can be passed and signed by the President during this session of Congress.

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM MURRAY

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I was against the passage of the congressional reorganization bill and was one of the 61 Members of the House who voted against the bill on a standing vote yesterday. I was strongly in favor of a record or yea-and-nay vote on this legislation and was one of the 39 Members who stood up in favor of requesting a yea-and-nay vote upon the measure. I regret that there were not sufficient Members to stand up in favor of demanding a roll-call so as to permit a record vote.

I do not feel that now is the appropriate time for increasing the salaries of Members of Congress due to our huge Federal indebtedness, our unbalanced budget and present inflationary trend. Also I am of the opinion that elective Federal officials like the Members of Congress should not be placed under the retirement system. I think that in regard to this matter the Members of Congress are in a different position than civil-service employees of our Government.

John H. Tolan, Fine Citizen and Excellent Congressman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. LEROY JOHNSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, the other day when the railroad reorganization bill was being considered on the floor of the House, I intended to take a few minutes to say a few words about by friend and colleague JOHN H. TOLAN, of California, who is voluntarily retiring at the end of this term. However, I felt that I was not justified in view of the limited time for debate on the reorganization bill, to take any of the time which was allotted for debate on that bill and consequently, am making my remarks at this time.

At the last memorial services we had two very interesting speeches. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCGREGOR] in his address suggested that we not only say nice things about our colleagues after they have died but that we also say some pleasant things about them while they are still among us.

I had known about JOHN TOLAN for a number of years but never got to know him intimately until I came to Congress in 1943. It was my good fortune to become intimately acquainted with him and some of the members of his family, and the better I got to know them the better I liked them.

According to my standard, one of the tests of a successful man is whether or not he has made a success of his family life. Measured by this yardstick, JOHN TOLAN is an eminently successful individual. To begin with, he was lucky in his selection of a wife. Mrs. Tolan and JOHN TOLAN have been real partners in every sense of the word. They were blessed with five children all of whom are a credit to their parents and each of whom is or will be a successful citizen in his own right. The Tolan family has been a harmonious unit promoting the interests of the whole family. Mrs. Tolan frequently helped her husband in campaigns. She did not try to replace the Congressman or to dabble into the political affairs that sometimes go on in Congressional districts. But she was a helpmate in trying to get the people, in the district from which her husband came, to understand his record and understand him. She was a very successful and helpful individual in those campaigns.

Some years ago Mr. TOLAN was the chairman of a committee called the Tolan committee. The purpose of this committee was to study the problem of the migratory workers. During the depression thousands of poor people migrated to California. Many of them came into the State absolutely destitude. They had heard of the fabulous farming operations in California, of its glorious climate, and its wonderful opportunities. The result was that the State was filled with people seeking work and looking for a place to sleep and a place to eat. The migratory workers of California for years had moved up and down the State harvesting our varied crops but in practically all cases having inadequate housing and living facilities. JOHN TOLAN and his committee studied the problem thoroughly and sympathetically. They showed that there must be intervention on the part of the Federal Government as the problem was partly due to the migration of workers from outside the State of California. They made an intelligent and humane report making certain recommendations. That report reflects the character and the outlook of the chairman of the committee that wrote it. Mr. TOLAN is a man who understands the problems of an "underdog." All his life he has fought for reforms, advocated changes and readjustments that he thought would give the ordinary common man a better chance in life.

It is very significant that in every campaign in which he participated in California he never had the support of any general newspaper. Yet, he was elected to Congress six times. Why? Because the common people had faith in his integrity, his courage, and his intelligence. They had faith that he understood their problems and that he talked for the unlettered and the silent mass of voters who determine all our elections.

It is a pleasure to say a word about a colleague and friend like JOHN TOLAN, and we hope that he may have many, many more years of useful and happy life in his beloved California. He can indeed look back with pride on his service in the House of Representatives.

Sugar Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES DOMENGEAUX
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. DOMENGEAUX. Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity of discussing with Secretary of Agriculture Anderson the serious problems that confront the processors of raw sugar in Louisiana and of the absolute necessity to give relief to these people now in the form of an increased price in sugar. Processors of raw sugar in Louisiana have not been treated fairly. Many of them for the past two seasons have been forced to operate at a loss, and of course these conditions cannot continue. The reason which caused some of the processors to manufacture their raw sugars into molasses and sirups were due entirely to the economic fact that money was being lost in the production of raw sugar and therefore they made sirup and molasses to keep from losing money.

I have submitted to the Secretary of Agriculture the following statement which shows the necessity for an immediate price increase and subsequent price increase, depending upon increased cost of foods, a formula just agreed to by the Secretary of Agriculture in his negotiations with the Cuban Government for the purchase of the Cuban sugar crop:

The Louisiana sugar crop is harvested beginning late October. The industry feels that they are entitled to know a reasonable period before this time exactly what the Department of Agriculture proposes to do about price increase on Louisiana sugars, because obviously the operations of the industry depend to a great extent upon this determination by the Department of Agriculture.

The CPA bill which has just been adopted by Congress grants rather full powers to the Secretary of Agriculture over changes or adjustments in maximum prices of agricultural commodities. The definition of agricultural commodities apparently includes sugarcane, sugar beets, and sugar. It is the hope and expectation of domestic sugar producers that the Secretary of Agriculture will act promptly under these newly acquired powers. Immediate action appears justified in the case of raw sugar particularly for two principal reasons:

1. Domestic raw sugar producers have not been able to obtain consideration of their specific difficulties even though the matter has been before the OPA for 2 years; and

2. The contract covering the purchase of the 1946 and 1947 Cuban sugar crops has been signed with a basic minimum price f. o. b. Cuba of 3.675 cents; the basic minimum price c. i. f., New York, duty paid, delivered, being 4.775 cents.

Representations have been repeatedly made and figures submitted to OPA in substantiation showing that losses have been incurred in the 1944 and 1945 crop seasons. More significant from the standpoint of good business for the industry has been the fact admitted by Government officials of the inability of raw sugar producers to obtain anywhere near the margin of profit from raw sugar operations which the same processor could have obtained from the production of other types of products from sugarcane juices, including direct-consumption sugars, edible molasses, and sirups. Consequently, more and more, the business judgment of raw sugar producers has forced them to consider changing to the production of other types of sugarcane products.

The harvesting operations in Louisiana normally begin in the early part of October. With the acute labor shortage, the tendency will be to begin operations at the earliest practical date. Preparations must necessarily be made in August and September and in keeping with the final product or products intended to be produced in each individual case.

During the war years there has been moderate control over the production and distribution of edible molasses and sirups under WFO 51. The industry has been notified by officials of the Department of Agriculture that these regulations will be very strictly enforced in 1946 and that very definite limitations will be much more rigidly set on the distribution. Thus, the raw sugar producers, most of whom have lost money and all of whom have been deprived of a fair return in comparison with producers of other sugar cane and sugar beet products, are faced with the prospect of being deprived of converting their operations because the Department of Agriculture needs more raw sugar for the refiners and more refined sugar for the consumers.

The most remarkable feature of the situation which confronts the raw sugar producers of Louisiana is that Louisana has the best record of production and distributing during the war years, among all domestic areas. Louisiana's contribution has been outstanding, yet the regulations of Government have been most harshly applied against the domestic raw sugar producers. No other conclusion is possible, unless it should be that the OPA, by delay and inaction, has simply ignored this important element and its excellent war record.

The Secretary of Agriculture should be willing to take into consideration (1) the losses which have been incurred; (2) the regulations which have prevented the conversion of such losses into substantial profits such as have been enjoyed by other producers; and (3) that the only hope of being brought up to a standard of relative equality with other elements in the sugar industry would be an adjustment in the maximum price ceiling on raw sugar amounting to an increase of from seventy-five one-hundredths cent to 1 cent above the ceiling in effect under OPA June 30, 1946.

There was an increase in the raw sugar ceiling in February, but it came immediately after the Louisiana raw sugar crop had been marketed under Goverment regulation and requirement, so that Louisiana producers have not benefited so far. The purchase of the Cuban crops at a basic minimum delivered price of 4.775 cents indicates the preferential status of Cuban sugar as compared to the Louisiana 1946 crop sugar which, under present regulations, would sell at 4.205 cents. An increase of fifty-seven one-hundredths cent would be required to bring Louisiana sugar to the same market price, delivered at New York, which would be in accordance with the custom of the trade that existed previous to World War II.

The terms of the Cuban contract anticipate price increases above the basic minimum price named, which increases are to be in direct proportion to increases in the average cost of foods in the United States. Consequently, on the basis of published reports and the trends of food prices, as well as the prospects of further advances under the provisions of the amendments adopted to the Emergency Price Control Act, it is logical to anticipate that the price to be paid for foreign raw sugar under contract will mean an increase of at least fifty one-hundredths cents in the price of raw sugar, in addition to the increase above described.

Louisiana producers sincerely feel that they should not be deprived of the full benefit of these price increases which are being, and will be, enjoyed by foreign producers now and eventually. Therefore, Louisiana sugar producers request that in simple justice, the same adjustments in price which will be made in favor of producers under the contract for the purchase of Cuban sugar shall, by some Government procedure, be saved and guaranteed to such Louisiana sugar producers in direct and full participation as the Cuban contract contemplates will be available to Cuban producers.

The Louisiana 1946 raw sugar crop will be harvested this fall, and in order to place the Louisiana producers in a position of enjoying in full the price increases which can now be definitely anticipated, it is necessary that an announcement be made promptly on the adjustment of the domestic raw sugar price to the basic minimum price offered on foreign sugar delivered at New York.

Subsequently, some Government procedure can be worked out through which the contemplated increases in the price of Cuban sugar may become the market price for domestic sugar, or at least that the price increases anticipated under the Cuban contract and under the amendments to the Emergency Price Control Act shall apply in full measure to the production in Louisiana from the crop to be harvested in the fall of 1946.

Long Beach Minister Tells America What Memorial Day Really Means

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker and colleagues, thank you for your unanimous consent to have the Memorial Day sermon of my own beloved minister at my home city of Long Beach, Calif., inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Stuart LeRoy Anderson, D. D., is much beloved by his large flock and universally respected by all his listeners for his clear-cut exposition of the Gospel and for his emphatic contribution to the sound and inspirational living of his home-community listeners and to a rapidly increasing number of eager readers of his words.

The following sermon was preached from the pulpit of the First Congregational Church, Long Beach, Calif., on Sunday, May 26, 1946, and was printed in a neat booklet for wide distribution under the auspices of the men's association of said church:

WHAT MEMORIAL DAY REALLY MEANS

(Sermon by Stuart LeRoy Anderson, D. D., minister of the First Congregational Church, Long Beach, Calif.)

If the proverbial visitor from Mars were to pay a visit to our land, I think one of the things that would strike him as queerest among our customs would be the way we observe our holidays. It is evident in the way some of us use Sunday, supposedly a day for spiritual rest, refreshment, quietness, communion, but which some of us use for everything except that. It is especially evident in the way we use great days like Independence Day, Armistice Day, and Memorial Day. These should be days with the deepest meanings for our lives. We should observe them quietly, devoutly, reverently. Instead, we often use them as occasions for pompous demonstrations. We dedicate cannon to the memory of those who died by them. The baseball clubs always observe the days by playing double-headers. And amidst all our celebration and our special excursions and picnics, we all but miss the vital truths for which these days stand. This morning let us try to discover again what Memorial Day really means and how we best could observe it.

It was Edmund Burke who said, "Society is a contract between the dead, the living, and the great unborn." Man alone of all created things has the ability to bind together the three tenses of life—the past, the present and the future. Man alone has memories of the past which influence the present. And he alone has hopes for the future which grow out of today's experience. It is out of man's ability to bind time together that Memorial Day comes. It is a memory day for the past; it is a dedication day for the present and it is a day of hope for the future. This should be a day when we remember that others have labored and we have entered into their labors. It is also a day when we remember that we are debtors and our debt calls for payment in the present. Finally, it is a day when we should assume our rightful responsibility for building a better world for tomorrow's great unborn.

The aspect of Memorial Day which calls for memory of the past is a very important one. We would be less than human if we did not gratefully remember those who made great sacrifices in days gone by. Here worship is common to all peoples. The Greeks had custom of twining flowers on the memorials of those who had fallen in battle. The Romans erected triumphal arches to honor their war dead. And although their civilization has vanished, some of these memorial arches still remain. The writer of the book of Hebrews in the great eleventh chapter calls the roll of the great heroes and heroines of Israel. It is very fitting that Memorial Day be used first to remember the heroes of the past. They have given us a heritage of sacrifice and bravery for which we are eternally grateful.

But we must not, as we so often do, use this day only as a day for memory. The writer of the book of Hebrews, in remembering his national heroes, gave us a clue as to how we ought to remember ours. Having called the roll and thrilled his listeners with the glorious tales of Israel's past, he turned to them and says in conclusion, "These all died, not having received the promises. God having reserved some better thing for us that they without us might not be made perfect." I wish every Memorial Day celebration might contain that note. Although we honor our war heroes, God has reserved some better thing for us that they without us should not be made perfect.

We honor them not by pomp and ceremony and oratorical utterances, but by doing these better things which God has reserved for us. "The dead have failed," says the writer of Hebrews, "if we fail them." We are challenged by the unfulfilled promises and unfinished tasks of those who have gone before. Lincoln struck this same note, you remember, in his Gettysburg address. He recalled the deeds of the Civil War dead, and then added this plea: "Let us here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain." Let our generation be reminded on this Memorial Day that we have a tryst to keep with those who lie asleep.

What are the better things that God has reserved for us? The poet puts it better than I can:

> "For now you others who shall live,
> Must do a harder thing than dying is,
> For you must think
> And ghosts will drive you on."

Yes, we must think, and ghosts will drive us on. How clearly are we thinking about the issues this Memorial Day presents? Will you think for a few moments realistically about the situation that confronts us? There has never been another Memorial Day like this one. As we honor our war heroes this year, if we do not understand that, scientifically speaking, at least, a thousand years have gone by since last Memorial Day, then we are fools. When the first atomic bomb exploded on August 6, 1945, all the old arguments and thought patterns about national security in terms of military science were rendered obsolete. The conventional reliances of the past, a large Army and Navy and Air Force, were made obsolete. If you doubt that, listen to Hanson Baldwin, military expert of the New York Times. "The atomic bomb blasted not only the enemy but also many of our previously conceived military values. All of the armed forces as we now know them have become obsolete. Mass conscript armies, great navies, piloted planes, have perhaps become part of history." Scientists are telling us that in the future one IV–F's with proper equipment can stand off and defeat 100,000 excellent soldiers who have been trained for 20 years. And yet despite the fact that peacetime conscription is now a military absurdity and a step toward an armament race that might lead to another world war, the War Department and the State Department are trying to stampede Congress into fastening it upon the American people. Maybe Norman Cousins was right. Modern man himself, with all his ideas about national sovereignty, national defense, national security, has become obsolete.

Scientists agree that the major military implications of the atomic age are: First, no military or scientific defense can be expected. Second, atomic weapons might kill 20 percent of a nation's people in 1 hour. Third, there is no real secret about it. In a few years any nation will be able to make it. And fourth, outproducing the enemy is not much advantage. Ten thousand bombs would be no better than 5,000, because 5,000 could destroy all the important targets in a country. Therefore, a small, poor nation might defeat a large, rich nation. Think what such concepts do to our old thought patterns about defense and security. Yes; on this Memorial Day we must think, and ghosts will drive us on.

It's a paradox, is it not, that the nation which discovered atomic power loses the most from a military standpoint from its discovery? As the strongest, richest nation in the world, we have the most to lose if another war should come. The United States, by producing the atomic bomb, has surrendered her impregnable position and made herself vulnerable from every quarter of the globe. Listen to some prophetic words from a fellow Congregationalist of ours who is chancelor of the University of Chicago, Robert Maynard Hutchins: "Is the situation altogether hopeless? I think not. But the only hope is to increase the rate of moral progress tremendously, to increase it beyond anything we have ever dreamed of, to increase it to an extent which itself at first glance may seem hopeless. We know that we have a certain amount of time before the world is full of atomic bombs. We probably have not more than 5 years before some other country has them. We know that the next 5 years will be used to make more and more deadly atomic explosives. We must see to it, if we can, that our social cultural advances for once exceeded the advances in the technology of destruction. The survival of mankind demands a world community, a world government, and a world state." Yes, the poet was right. We who live must do a harder thing than dying is, for we must think, and ghosts will drive us on.

Now what can you and I do in these days to help prevent the catastrophe of a Third World War? I am sure there is a sense in which this is the only question of really fundamental importance today, because the issue is one of survival, and if we do not survive, it doesn't make much difference what we do about anything else. Kirby Page, who has so often spoken to us from this pulpit, has written a book entitled "Now Is the Time To Prevent a Third World War." Let me pass on to you some of the suggestions he makes as next steps for everybody.

First, we can begin to realize the tremendous urgency and vital importance of preventing another World War. We can take seriously the task of helping to avert the destruction of civilization. We can stop talking carelessly about the coming war with Russia as though we were talking about a picnic. We can say to ourselves day after day, "This is a matter of life and death for millions of people."

Second, we can earn the right to discuss world affairs by constant study and reflection. We can study history and the contemporary scene. We can engage in conversation about world problems, seeking to arouse our friends to a sense of urgency.

Third, we can assume responsibility as citizens of a democracy for the determination of the foreign policy of this Nation, by frequent letters to the President, to the Secretary of State, to the two Senators from California, and to our own Congressman. We can write letters that praise as well as letters that criticize.

Fourth, we can help to create the will to peace with all other nations, particularly with Soviet Russia. This is the most important requirement of world peace. If the United States and Soviet Russia can maintain friendly and cooperative relations, the peoples of the earth can be led into the ways of peace. And friendship must be founded on mutual understanding. There is not the slightest necessity for war between these two countries, yet war will come unless present policies of secrecy, evasion, deceit, suspicion, give way to a positive policy of frankness and friendship. Instead of blindly condemning Soviet Russia, we can seek in every way to understand her history and the dynamics of her policy.

Fifth, we can talk incessantly about the need for world government. We can help our friends see that the greatest obsolescence of all in an atomic age is national sovereignty, that the time has come to proclaim the end of the world of nationalism and the necessity for giving our national loyalty to one world state. You and I can become citizens of the world. It is true that the great masses of people are not ready to think in terms of world government, and yet atomic energy can be controlled by nothing less. So we are called to think 100 years ahead of our time. We can help foster the idea of a world state, a world community, realizing that there must be one world, or none.

And then, finally, we can be faithful members of the church of our choice. I mention this last because the church is the only institution in society that specializes in the moral progress that is now so essential if civilization is to be saved. The church is the only institution that through its world missionary program has planted the seeds for a world community. The church, through its ecumenical movement, through the World Council of Churches, is already at work trying to do the only thing that can avert disaster. Anyone who is concerned about preventing world catastrophe, and yet is withholding allegiance and support from the church of Jesus Christ, it seems to me is failing at the very place he ought to begin.

On this Memorial Sunday let us remind ourselves then of our responsibility to build for peace. Not a day of celebration, but a day of dedication. A day of memory, yes, and also of courageous facing forward. It is easy to dedicate to our war heroes a cannon or a tree or a flagpole or a plot of ground. We need to dedicate to them a much harder thing. We need to dedicate ourselves. Only by such self-dedication do we keep faith with those who gave their lives and with tomorrow's great unborn.

Let us pray: "Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, Who art above all nations and all peoples, save us from the sins that divide us; from class bitterness and race hatred; from forgetfulness of Thee and indifference to our fellowmen; from war and preparation for new wars; that we may know and love Thy truth, walk humbly in obedience to Thy holy law, fulfilling the commandments of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

Our Unfinished Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMILY TAFT DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am distressed by the fact that we seem to be adjourning without taking action on the Wagner-Ellender-Taft housing bill. Millions of veterans have come back to find they have no homes. They are not able to enjoy family life. We owe them a debt which we can never repay and which thus far we have not honored. The only way we can take care of them is by the large-scale building of homes for those with low incomes such as is provided in the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill.

The Senate has already passed this bill and it is up to us to act. I believe that if we can only bring this bill to the floor of the House, that many of those who would like to smother it secretly, will not wish to oppose it publicly and that the bill can be passed. Let us postpone our adjournment until we so act.

Strikes Not Always Beneficial

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, from the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Herald of July 22 comes the following thought-provoking editorial:

LABOR'S LATEST MOVE

Philip Murray and other labor leaders already are urging that labor and industry get together to prepare for the coming demands for still further increases in wages.

This probably means that next winter and spring the country will once more be torn with strikes. The folly of that lies in numerous directions. As has been pointed out frequently, the way to bring down costs of living is more production. Strikes stop production and so prevent the balancing of supply and demand.

Strikes will aid the inflationary spiral and increased wages will still further accomplish the same, since costs of production will go up and higher prices will be tacked on all necessities and conveniences of life.

Still another angle should be observed. The strikes of this last winter and spring failed utterly to win anything for the workers. Although their wages were increased, so were the costs of what they buy.

Moreover, they have not yet won back through increased wages what they lost during their idleness.

Prof. Sumner H. Slichter, Harvard University economist, has compiled some figures showing what the strikers in numerous industries actually lost. Here are a few of them:

"Not until 1948," he says, "will General Motors workers be as well off as they would have been had they not struck and had they worked steadily without any increase in wages. And not until 1953 will they be as well off as they would have been had they accepted the company's offer of 13 and one-half cents.

"Two and one-half years will be required before the employees of General Electric are as well off as they would have been had they accepted the company's offer of 10 cents.

"The employees of United States Steel will require more than 2 years before they will have made up for their refusal of the company's compromise offer of 15 cents."

And all this is assuming that the workers will work steadily, without days off for any reason, illness, strike, shut-down for lack of materials or other cause.

Since in each of these instances much time already has been lost by most of the workers, the time must be extended beyond Professor Slichter's figures before they possibly can make good what they lost through their strikes. More strikes will further add to the time so that it is unlikely that many of the striking workers of last spring ever will catch up with what they lost through their idleness.

OF

HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, today I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues the importance of the coal industry in our national economy and the contribution of my native State, West Virginia, to the industry and to the national welfare.

Time will not permit a thorough discussion of all the problems and ramifications of this great industry, and the many obstacles overcome to make the man-hour production the greatest in all the world and far beyond the dreams of anyone a few short years ago.

I respectfully request the membership to join with me in paying tribute to the hundreds of thousands of men and women employed in this industry in management and in labor who, under tremendous handicaps, managed to increase production and meet the enormous requirements of war industry.

In a report released by the War Production Board, an agency of government which, by the way, did a very good overall job throughout the war period, there were several pages devoted to the accomplishments of the steel industry during the war. In this report on wartime industrial activities and achievements, practically no reference was made to the tremendous performance of the bituminous coal industry of this Nation. No one would take from the steel industry any of the glory for the job it did. It does seem, however, that in reviewing the accomplishments of industry, the bituminous coal-mining industry might have received more recognition. In fact, the only reference to the industry was to the fact that it, along with many other industries, was desperately short of men during the war period.

As an illustration of the importance of coal to the war and to the Nation, it is pointed out that it is a basic industry. Coal is a fundamental in the conduct of war or peace. Effort will be made to prove this statement. West Virginia is proud of the contribution that it was able to make to the war effort and next to her offering of brave and devoted men to the armed forces, West Virginia's greatest contribution to World War II was her record-breaking supply of coal to provide supplies and equipment to our fighting men.

West Virginia's underground army supplied in excess of 25 percent of our entire coal requirements for war, which was more than that supplied by any other State. The production in 1945 in West Virginia was 152,200,000 tons; in 1944, 163,845,000 tons; in 1943, 158,804,000 tons; in 1942, 155,882,000 tons. Coal went to war on the armed front. From a lump of coal came the TNT bombs that wrecked Berlin and Tokyo. It made violent explosives that blasted the natural and artificial obstacles which stood in the path of our armed forces. It was woven into the parachutes that landed our men behind enemy lines and saved thousands of lives of airmen who were shot out of the skies. It was used in dozens of ways to bring about victory. Pyridine from a lump of coal was the base employed in making fabrics water repellant for the protection of our men throughout the war areas.

Coal is a $1,000,000,000 industry in West Virginia. Last year its receipts from sales approximated $500,000,000. The cost of labor alone for the production of last year's tonnage exceeded $300,000,000. For supplies and equipment the industry expended 40 cents per ton. It paid out huge sums in taxes. It made whatever sacrifices were necessary to promote the war effort, which is proven by the fact that the producers received an average profit of only 4 cents per ton, while many of them made no profit. Coal's economic sphere, however, is not confined to its own business. It produced for the great railroad systems that served the industry as a whole $935,415,862 during 1944 and $873,882,623 during 1945.

Coal is the largest consumer of electric power in West Virginia. The industry spends millions of dollars annually for the supplies from wholesale houses and industrial stores and collected more than a million dollars for the State in the form of consumers' sales taxes. It is West Virginia's largest taxpayer, its largest employer of labor, and its largest wage payer. This is a triple distinction which makes it so important to the entire State. The place of coal in West Virginia as a wage payer is plainly revealed by the pay-roll reports of employers to the State workmen's compensation fund. For the year ending June 30, 1945, all employers reported $762,470,015 paid in wages, and the average number of employees for the entire State of all industries was 345,431, excepting interstate railroads, casual labor, and those workers engaged in agriculture or domestic service. Coal led all other industries in wages paid and labor employed. Of the total wages reported, coal paid $301,002,677, or 39.5 percent, while the industry employed 105,761 persons, or 31 percent of the total employees protected under the State compensation fund. Competition is keen. The industry is progressive.

In brief, these are some of the things that the bituminous coal industry means to the State of West Virginia. It means even more to the Nation. In 1944, the bituminous coal industry of the United States reached its all time record when 620,000,000 tons were produced. As some indication of the job accomplished, attention is called to the fact that in 1939 the production was 394,855,000 tons; in 1940, 460,772,000 tons; in 1941, 514,149,000 tons; in 1942, 582,693,000 tons; and in 1943, 590,177,000 tons; and this record is unsurpassed in the industrial history of our country, in that this industry was prepared when called upon by the Nation to meet its fuel requirements. The capacity to produce was available. The know-how was there. It responded nobly to the demands of our country.

Some specific uses to which coal was put may not be out of order when we consider that it required 18 tons of coal for the steel to make one 4-ton Army truck. It required 25 tons of coal for the steel to make one 3-inch anti-aircraft gun. It required 32 tons of coal in the making of one light tank and 50 tons to make a medium-sized tank. To make a modern superdreadnaught, 32,000 tons of coal were required in the process. To produce 1 pound of aluminum it required about 14 pounds of coal. To produce 1 pound of iron it required about 2½ pounds of coal. To produce 1 pound of zinc it required about 2 pounds of coal, and to produce 1 pound of copper it required from 1.3 to 2 pounds of coal. Four out of every seven homes in this country are heated with coal.

The industry has made tremendous strides in efficiency in the use of coal, because it is producing better coal and cleaner coal all the time. In 1920, 1 ton of coal produced 590 kilowatt-hours of electricity. In 1941 it produced 1,492 kilowatt-hours of electrical energy. There was no part of our activities during war, nor is there any part of our activities during peace, in which coal is not a vital factor. It took 1 ton of coal to produce a 2,000-pound aerial bomb. Coal powers 94 percent of all the United States railroad locomotives. For every $100 worth of coal mined in the United States, there is $18.18 worth of gold produced; $4.55 of silver; $14.29 worth of copper; and the same figure for iron.

Sixty cents out of every dollar taken in by coal mines goes direct to labor. Some slight comparison may be gathered in connection with the volume of coal produced if it is compared with the tonnage of some of our crops. For instance, in 1943 when 590,000,000 tons of bituminous coal were produced, there were 86,000,000 tons of corn, 25,000,000 tons of wheat, 11,000,000 tons of fruits, 3,000,000 tons of cotton produced.

Who uses coal in the United States? The answer is, everyone, either directly or indirectly. The railroads consume about 22 percent; the iron, steel, and coke industries, 20 percent; the electrical power industry, 13 percent; general industries, 25 percent; and for household use, about 20 percent. Of all railway freight cars in the United States, 49 percent are coal cars, which gives some further indication of the value of this commodity as a traffic item.

What of the future for bituminous coal? More than 1,000,000,000 tons of coal, representing an excavation project four times the size of the digging of the entire Panama Canal, will be needed during the coming 3 years of the reconversion period to furnish the raw chemicals, basic ingredients, and power for all industries in the United States.

The millions of new automobiles, refrigerators, washing machines, and numerous other commodities for which there is a large backlog of consumer demand are dependent primarily upon bituminous coal for their ultimate fabrication. This is true mainly because coal is essential in the making of 100 percent of the Nation's steel and iron. Hundreds of new chemically derived products, ranging from costume jewelry to home furnishing accessories, will come from coal, which furnished the base of 85 percent of all the plastics used during the war. It is estimated that the automobile industry alone will require 11,250,000 tons of coal to manufacture 15,000,000 cars that are estimated to be desired today. Coal is truly the keystone of America's reconversion program. Almost every other industry is in some way dependent upon it. The industry has proven its ability to produce over 600,000,000 tons of coal in 1 year. When called upon to do so, it lengthened its workweek and it lengthened the hours of work per day. It increased the pay of its men approximately 100 percent as compared with prewar earnings. It faces the future confidently, though it needs the sympathetic understanding of all citizens. Space will not permit an enumeration of the products made from coal, of which there are over 200,000. Nylon, ammonia, benzol, phenol, paint brushes, pipestems, bottle caps, book ends, dies, plastics, soaps, roofing tar, phonograph records, shower curtains, hosiery, draperies, and so forth.

When thinking of industrial America, think of coal and the part it plays in our every-day life. It is not just a lump of black substance. It has within it great power. Let us use it wisely. Let us encourage this great industry to move forward and serve the Nation in peace as it served it in war. It is truly a fundamental in our civilization.

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of streamlining Congress, and appreciate the good work done by the men who drafted this legislation. Congress should be streamlined, and its procedure should be put on a modern basis. However, unless the retirement and salary provisions are removed from the bill, I shall be compelled to vote against it, although I favor the reform and streamlining features of the bill. I agree with my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL] in this respect, and concur in the statement made by him today which sets forth the reasons for my decision.

I therefore now want to state that I shall vote "no" on final passage of this bill if the salary and retirement features remain in the bill.

Truth About the Cavalry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. REES
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I believe the membership of the House, as well as the people of this country, will be interested in reading a statement by Maj. Gen. John K. Herr, late Chief of Cavalry, United States Army, retired, on the subject Truth About the Cavalry. This statement appeared in the magazine the Rider and Driver, in the issue of May–June 1946.

I am particularly interested in this subject matter for the reason that the oldest and largest cavalry post in the United States is located in my district at Junction City, Kans. I commend the reading of this article to the membership of the House.

TRUTH ABOUT THE CAVALRY

(By Maj. Gen. John K. Herr, late Chief of Cavalry, U. S. Army, retired)

Although the campaigns of the Soviet-German war had proved to the satisfaction of the Russians the vital need for cavalry in modern war, our military leaders brushed this aside. When one of our General Staff officers in the Pentagon was asked how this could be, the reply was, "We have nothing to learn from the Russians." This obsession of our General Staff—that cavalry was useless in modern war—may be difficult for a civilian to understand; nevertheless, it was actually true. Soon after I became Chief of Cavalry, I realized this hostility and mentioned it to the Chief of Staff. I asked him not to be influenced by it. It existed largely because the key positions in the General Staff were held by noncavalrymen who knew little about cavalry and were swayed by prejudice and illusion. So in the early phases of this war they proceeded to wreck our cavalry by converting it to other units. The Secretary of War now proposes to prevent the resurrection of the cavalry by asking Congress to pass legislation eliminating cavalry forever from our Army, except for minor detachments to be used in mountains, erasing it as a separate arm of the service.

Is this a wise decision that will serve to strengthen our fighting power, or is it a blunder perpetuating a mistake, which will weaken our armed might? That is the sole issue to be considered—purely on the evidence and unobscured by any sentiment.

I give to you the hard cold facts and leave to you the evaluation of them and the inevitable conclusions based on the evidence.

I will first narrate the circumstances germane to the premature wrecking of our fine Cavalry. When I retired as Chief of Cavalry at the close of my 4 years assignments as such, in February 1942, our modest Cavalry forces comprised in the Regular Army two Divisions, two separate regiments (horse) and two horse-mechanized regiments; in the National Guard, the Fifty-sixth Brigade of Texas, and seven horse-mechanized regiments. I had been successful up to that time in resisting the efforts of the motor-mad enthusiasts to convert Cavalry into armored units, maintaining that the animal was supplementary to the motor and the Cavalry was supplementary to armor. This doctrine was sound then and it is still sound. Wars flow over all manner of terrain and in all kinds of weather Fire power is transported on horses to important points and areas, faster than can be done by men on foot, and where often no vehicles can go. It is as simple as this; draw a course direct across country almost anywhere and start a horseman, a jeep, a truck, and a tank to follow it and see what happens.

Simultaneous with my retirement, the Army was reorganized so as to do away with chiefs of fighting ground arms (Infantry, Cavalry, and Artillery). Immediately the War Department began to wreck the Cavalry by reconverting regiments to completely mechanized units. There was no chief to fight for the Cavalry (note the successful effort by the Chief of Marine Corps to save it).

Although retired since February, I was so concerned about the wrecking of our cavalry that in June I wrote a letter of expostulation to the Secretary of War, Henry L. Stimson, whom I had known well in World War I, protesting bitterly against the break-up of our crack cavalry units splendidly trained and of fine esprit, pointing out that once wrecked, they could not be effectively reconstituted during the emergency; that we would surely need them in the war. I transmitted as an enclosure an account of the Russian cavalry in extensive campaigns, which I assured him were authentic, and which proved the value of cavalry in modern war.

I stated that none of the key men in the War Department knew anything about cavalry. I asked that the wrecking of the cavalry be stopped forthwith. I received in July a kindly letter of sympathy, condoling with me that the remorseless motor age was crowding the horse out of war, and stating that there seemed to be only a remote chance of cavalry being used in the war. Of course he was only reflecting the attitude of his general staff, that cavalry was useless in modern war. My advice was disregarded and the War Department moved swiftly to dismount all the cavalry and to sell its wonderfully trained mounts.

Did the War Department err? Remember that it is the duty of the higher echelons to plan wars and campaigns so that the troops best adapted to those particular theaters, are furnished in adequate numbers and at the proper time. Remember also that the physical configuration, the mountains, the streams, the roads or lack thereof in all theaters of operation was well known to our War Department through the complete prepared studies made by the G2 Division of Information, over a long period of time.

I give you the testimony of the warrior generals and others who gleaned it on the fields of battle, and not sitting behind desks in the Pentagon. I know of no better evidence. What about Patton? Would you consider that he knows whereof he speaks? At the conclusion of the Sicilian campaign he summed up his conclusions as follows:

"In countries such as Sicily, it is almost necessary to have pack animals.

"In almost any conceivable theater of operations, situations arise where the presence of horse cavalry, in the ratio of a division to an army will be of vital moment.

"It is the considered opinion, not only of myself, but of many other general officers, who took their origin from the infantry and artillery, that had we possessed an American cavalry division with pack artillery in Tunisia and in Sicily, not a German would have escaped, because horse cavalry possesses the additional gear ratio, which permits it to attain sufficient speed through mountainous country, to get behind and hold the enemy, until the more powerful infantry and tanks can come up and destroy him."

Why did not our planners of the great general staff have there our First Cavalry Division instead of sending it to fight dismounted in the isles of the Pacific?

Maj. P. D. Eldred, Seventh Army headquarters, says: "It was not long after the Americans hit the beaches, before everybody from the commanding general on down realized that Sicily's tortuous terrain was a natural for pack trains and cavalry. Without them supply was a back-breaking problem; reconnaissance was made difficult. Heavy weapons sometimes lagged behind the infantry, and pursuit of the retreating Germans was never quite fast enough to accomplish their destruction. As a result some of the German forces eventually escaped across the Strait of Messina and lived to fight another day against the Allied troops in Italy. Every piece of motorized or mechanized equipment that conceivably could be used was provided. Because pack transport and horse cavalry were not available, they were not included in the operational planning.

What does Lt. Gen. Lucian K. Truscott, then commander of the Third Division, say?

"Personally I am of the opinion that had our First Cavalry Division been available in the Seventh Army when we began the advance from the Licata bridgehead we could have prevented the escape of the German forces from Messina, which our lack of mobility prevented us from doing." Again he says: "I am firmly convinced that if one horse squadron of cavalry and one pack train of 200 mules had been available to me at San Stefano on August 1, they would have enabled me to cut off and capture the entire German force opposing me along the North Coast Road and would have permitted my entry into Messina at least 48 hours earlier."

Maj. Gen. John P. Lucas, commander of the Sixth Corps in the invasion of southern Italy, during the fall and winter of 1943–44, says: "The terrain, after crossing the Volturno, was mountainous and difficult. The Infantry accomplished wonders, and I am convinced that no other foot soldiers in the world can equal the stamina of the American doughboy. However, their progress was necessarily slow, the work was tedious, and it soon became obvious that, unless a highly mobile force could encircle the withdrawing enemy forces, it would be impossible to kill him in any really decisive numbers. During these operations, I made strenuous efforts to get at least a regiment of horse cavalry. There was a desperate need for some type of unit that could penetrate cross country and get through the difficult mountains at a decidedly faster rate than the Infantry. Motors were tied to the roads by the inaccessible terrain. Horses and men on foot were the only things that could move. I am convinced that if I could have gotten some type of troops behind the Germans, to work on their line of communications, in order to execute demolitions in their rear, the results in southern Italy might have been decisive. Mounted units, schooled in the American cavalry doctrine, would have been the perfect solution. Hardened and well-trained horsemen possessing mobility and fire power could have infiltrated through the German lines, encircled the delaying detachments, and would have captured or destroyed these elements. This would have permitted the maintenance of pressure on the retreating enemy forces by our Infantry divisions in their direct pursuit and would not have given the Germans sufficient time to prepare strong defensive positions to the north. As it was, there was no cavalry available."

The same General Truscott who deplored the lack of cavalry in Sicily, and who was and is a foremost cavalryman and poloist, and whose opinion with respect to the employment of cavalry exceeds in value that of any other general officer, in my estimation, says:

"I am of the opinion that had a well-trained regiment of American cavalry been available to me, when the Third Division began its advance north from Battapaglia, or even after we crossed the Volturno, the Battle of Cassino would never have taken place, Anzio would have been unnecessary, and the Italian campaign might have terminated months before it actually did."

Following is the testimony of a brilliant officer who was in the midst of the Italian campaign, a leader on the field of battle: "Perhaps you will be interested in my opinion on the possibilities of cavalry in the pursuit phase of this campaign (Italy) from the attack in May through the so-called Adolf Hitler line and the German forces containing the Anzio beachhead, up to the long pause at the Arno River. This is not a lately formed idea, but the one that impressed itself forcibly upon me at the time of fighting, and reflection since that time has done nothing but reinforce my opinion. The attacks in May seriously damaged the German forces. The enemy lost heavily in men and equipment. They gave every indication of confusion and disruption.

"They gave up all pretense of security. We captured small groups with written instructions: 'Get back to Florence in any manner possible.' All these details add up to a picture of a beaten army on the verge of disaster, but disaster never overtook it. It is my opinion that a corps of two cavalry divisions would have utterly destroyed the German Fourteenth Army. We could have marched administratively, practically all the way to the Brenner Pass."

Does this evidence add up to the conclusion that the War Department is not erring in wrecking our cavalry or rather in seeking to obtain legislative sanction to make this wrecking permanent? To me any such conclusion is unthinkable.

In addition to the foregoing there remains the overwhelming evidence of the Soviet-German campaigns, which I will amplify in a subsequent installment. Suffice it to say now, that tested in this great laboratory of battles and campaigns overshadowing our own in time, magnitude of numbers, and diversity of terrain and weather, the Russians have found that cavalry is of vital use in modern war. I quote just a passage or two, from the statements of the inspector general of Russian Cavalry. "During the first days of the Russian-German war it became clear how correct Stalin was in assigning to the cavalry an important role in modern warfare and how wrong were those who from the heights of their tank turrets, looked down disdainfully on the cavalry units." From Colonel Pronin of the Red Army:

"Not a single big-scale operation has been undertaken on the Soviet-German front without the active participation of cavalry. The experiences of this war prove that despite various new weapons of warfare, Soviet cavalry is a powerful force for developing a successful offensive, and is highly effective in defense."

Apparently our military inner circle, almost all infantry officers, declines to give any weight to the Russian conclusions, minimizes the evidence of the Pattons, and Lucases, and the Truscotts, and pins its faith on the opinion of the generals who fought with more or less glory on the specialized theater of western Europe with the best network of roads in the world, and mistakenly seek to generalize their conclusions, absorbed there to all other theaters of war, none of which are similar to the one in which they fought. Their gaze is focused with absolute intensity on this particular theater. They can imagine no other. Even in this theater I believe they have misinterpreted the significance of what happened. Remember that they were not opposed by any large groups of cavalry, and that they were engaged for the most part in a vehicular war where the overwhelming power of the air could disrupt the road movements of the foe. More about this theater later on.

Making America Safe for Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADAM C. POWELL, JR.
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me July 21, 1946, at the Golden Gate Auditorium, in New York City, at a program held under the auspices of the Bessye Beardon Achievement Club, an affiliate of the National Council of Negro Women:

We stand today in one of the most critical periods known to modern man. We see all around us, in our national life, evidences of the complete collapse of American institutions. The tragic suddenness with which this has come upon us so soon after the conclusion of a war to make the world safe for democracy has shocked us to our very core. Within the past few days we have seen injustice climb to a new height, when a Negro soldier discharged from the Army only a matter of a few minutes had both of his eyes gouged out by a representative of the law, a policeman in South Carolina. We have seen the popular will of the people thwarted as one of the most vicious exponents of American Hitlerism has come back into office as Governor of Georgia despite the popular vote against him. The War Department has already made a mockery of its loudly stated goal of nonsegregation in the armed forces by completely suspending the enlistment and reenlistment of Negroes in the Army of the United States. As a Nation we have officially placed our stamp of approval on colonialism, imperialism, hypocrisy, and broken pledges—by passing the loan to Britain. As I said on the floor of Congress on Saturday, July 13, there is no way to divorce British imperialism from the loan. Advocates of the British loan said that the only way to stop the peoples of the world from looking toward Moscow was to pass the British loan. I asked in Congress—and I ask today—if the American Government honestly thinks that the peoples of the world would look less toward Moscow and more toward London and Washington—peoples such as the massacred Greeks, the slaughtered Indonesians, the ravaged Italians, the raped Ethiopians, the starving South Africans, the plundered Chinese in Hongkong and Singapore, the tragically frustrated Jews of the earth and Palestine in particular, and the repressed peoples of the West Indies?

Yes, these are dark days. But in the midst of our congressional deliberations of last week one ray of light did permeate the darkness. That was the unanimous passage of a law which would strike five million half-dollar pieces in the United States Mint bearing the likeness of Booker T. Washington. This is the first time in the history of coins and weights and measures that any such action has been taken. Booker T. Washington takes his place, not only in the Hall of Fame in New York University, but among the immortals of this Nation. He came from nothing. He surmounted all obstacles. Though there are many aspects of his beliefs, principles, and practices that we of today disagree with, we are nevertheless proud that he as a Negro came up from slavery to the heights of American recognition.

Today you have gathered together as a group of women to urge the commemoration of another great Negro—George Washington Carver. A day was temporarily set aside this year as George Washington Carver Day, but I intend, upon my return to Washington this week, to introduce a bill setting aside permanently one day of the year in memory of George Washington Carver. It is altogether fitting and proper that this should be done. Booker T. Washington made his contribution in education and George Washington Carver made his in the field of science. This man who was once sold for a horse revolutonized the agricultural chemistry of the South.

But I want to say something else to you as we are gathered here today. I want to tell you that this is an hour in which women must not stay in the background; an hour in which women must stand together in the forefront of the fight to live. You must remember that you were the backbone of the American mass during the war period. Almost 12,000,000 American men were decivilianized. You took your places on the homefront side by side with men. You were in the majority. It is vitally important that you maintain a progressive position now.

Our world is collapsing—I mean our immediate world—right here in America—right here in New York City. The dissolution of the OPA and the dissolution of the FEPC bring home to us the tragic problem that bread and jobs are no longer available to people according to their need, but from now on they'll actually be denied the people who need them most. It is therefore imperative that we pledge ourselves, our families that we love, our country that we are proud of, and our God whom we worship—that we will not purchase any item, food or clothing, unless we are sure that that item is sold at a rock-bottom price. A buyers' boycott of everything with a high-price tag will bring the prices down far more effectively than ever the OPA could.

It is further important that tenants stand together as never before. The housing situation in Harlem has degenerated to the point where not even the minimum standards of health are being observed. I am afraid that an epidemic could break out and sweep this community in the twinkling of an eye. Petty government officials, both State and Federal as well as local, shut their eyes to health and decency. I offer my services to you and every tenant in Harlem to bring unyielding pressure on every department chief of our city life until we change the indifference of owners so that the garbage can which Harlem has become is cleaned up. More than that, we must put unyielding pressure on the powers-that-be that every service the tenants originally enjoyed shall be maintained. It is not enough for rent not to go up, but in addition standards of maintenance must be maintained. If they are not it is equivalent to raising our rent because we won't be getting as much for a dollar as we contracted for.

I have purposely steered clear of the New York State FEPC, waiting for it to get its bearings and get under way. It has now passed its first anniversary and I think it is time for the people to start making it work in every way. I place before you all of my staff and lawyers to serve you free. Wherever there is any discrimination in employment, any discrimination in public utilities, or any discrimination in any trade union I will personally present the case before the New York State Fair Employment Practice Commission.

Finally, I want to inform you that we have already set in motion the machinery to wipe out Jim Crow on interstate transportation on trains. We have found an airtight test case of a mother and daughter who bought tickets in Pennsylvania Station in a reserved-seat coach and who were forced to move when that train hit Virginia. This happened after the Supreme Court decision was handed down. My lawyers are working on this case now and we intend to take this on up to the Supreme Court, if need be, to not only have an order wiping out Jim Crow on interstate transportation where buses are involved, but also on railroad trains. The Supreme Court of the United States cannot logically do otherwise, according to its recent decision, in the matter of the Greyhound Bus Co.

This is your native land. It does not belong to any white-supremacy advocates. It does not belong to the Ku Klux Klan. It does not belong to the lynch-murderer of Freeport, nor the mob-cowards of Columbia, Tenn. It belongs to the founding fathers and all of their descendants, whether they came across in first-class palatial accommodations or in the steerage of slave ships. There isn't a rat born who is going to be able to swerve us from this purpose of making America safe for democracy. The only way we are going to make America safe for democracy is for the people in this community to stand together. I appeal for unbreakable unity—whether we are Protestants or Catholics, Jew or Gentile, black or white, Republican or Democrat—let us stand together in an unbreakable phalanx and we will win.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT HALE
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

AUBURN, MAINE, July 24, 1946.
Representative ROBERT HALE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR BOB: This letter will require no reply. I'm just trying to keep you posted on things as I find them throughout the State. In connection with my work in speaking to service clubs all over the State and my visits to the various hotels and camps, I contact a great many Maine people, as well as people from other sections of the country.

Of course, for the past few months, the chief topic of conversation has been OPA. I haven't found anybody in this State that is in favor of continuing OPA. There has been a great deal of disappointment on the revamped bill, which now probably will be passed by the Senate and sent on to the President to approve. Everybody has felt that, if there must be an OPA, there should be no controls on foods. The last twenty-four days have established the fact that this is absolutely correct.

As I understand it, the controls will remain off certain food items for one month longer. A decontrol board will be appointed by the President and at the end of this time, they have the power to reestablish price controls on these food items. Everybody knows the Board he will appoint will most certainly reestablish these price controls. When that happens, meat, butter and other essential items will again go off the market. Then the black market begins to operate and no one but the wealthy people will be able to see any meat or butter, as was the case prior to July 1.

We have been without price controls now for 24 days and for 10 days things have been getting down to normal—plenty of meat on the market and at very reasonable prices. I can go out here this morning into the supermarkets and other grocery stores and buy porterhouse steak for 69 cents. This is double A grade. This price is not far different from before the war. The markets are full of butter at only 78 cents a pound. This probably is the biggest surprise of all, because we all expected that it would be a dollar a pound. The price of whole milk would lead one to believe that butter would be a dollar a pound, but nobody is kicking at 78 cents. The food lines have disappeared from the grocery stores and everybody, rich and poor, is now able to get meats and butter.

When price controls go back onto these items the last of August, we will have the same conditions that we had up to June 30. We will have high prices and scarcities so long as OPA exists.

Very truly yours,
EVERETT F. GREATON.

Fixing the Responsibility

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK A. MATHEWS, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. MATHEWS. Mr. Speaker, the administration of OPA under Chester A. Bowles, the progress of the legislation to continue OPA, and the general effect of retardation and uncertainty in the economy of our country is the most confused mess that has occurred in a long time.

When I came to Congress OPA was a going concern, but going in the wrong direction. The problem which faced me and the rest of the Members of the House was what to do about its continuance. So far as I could see, the objectives to be accomplished were, first, to avoid injury, especially to persons of low incomes, from the depredation of greedy gougers; second, to so administer the act as to increase production and avoid diversion of food and other materials into the black market; and, third, to remove all controls as fast as production justified that action.

From the many complaints from my constituents as to the administration of OPA, most of which were justified, it was obvious that OPA was doing little toward the first objective. While the Administrator claimed that price control increased production, neverthless more and more food was going into the black market, and, although the Administrator avowed that he wanted to remove controls as fast as production justified such action, the actual policy pursued appeared to be quite the contrary.

As to the legislation, an act extending OPA was reported out of the Committee on Banking and Currency, amendments were added in the House, further amendments were added in the other body and after the adoption of the conference report, the President vetoed the act, thus putting OPA out of business and practically removing even rent controls.

Then a resolution was adopted by the House purporting to continue OPA for 20 days by amendment to laws which did not exist.

This resolution was adopted and went to the other body of Congress where it had attached a complete new OPA Extension Act. It then went to conference, and the conference report was adopted. This time the President signed the bill, saying that it was better than the previous act submitted to him, about which statement there is certainly a great diversity of opinion.

At the time the original resolution was before us I called the attention of this House to the fact that it was then, as it still is, an attempt to amend two acts which had gone out of existence, instead of being a reenactment of those acts with changes.—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 1, 1946, page 8072.

In the President's message expressing his reluctance in signing this last resolution he said that he might call Congress back into special session not only to strengthen price-control laws but, "to enact such fiscal and monetary legislation as we needed to save us from the threat of economic disaster."

Furthermore, at the time the President sent a message to us with regard to certain labor legislation he said:

> I believe that the time has come to adopt a comprehensive labor policy which will tend to reduce the number of stoppages of work and other acts which injure labor, capital, and the whole population.

Now all this time, and since 1933, the New Deal-Democratic Party has been in control of the situation, with substantial majorities in both Houses and its own President in the White House. So, it is perfectly obvious that the need for overhauling labor-management legislation, for the enactment of fiscal and monetary legislation to save the country from economic disaster and the terrific confusion surrounding the OPA legislation are all the result of the New Deal-Democratic control. Nobody has emphasized that more conclusively than the President, himself, by the statements referred to, his refusal to sign the first OPA Extension Act, his criticism of it, and his expression of reluctance in signing the second act.

As I read the present OPA Extension Act, it provides that on certain items, including poultry, eggs, food, and feed products processed or manufactured therefrom, controls will remain off until August 20, 1946, and can only be reestablished under certain circumstances, and with respect to livestock, milk, food or feed products processed or manufactured therefrom, the controls shall remain off until August 21, 1946, but will come back on that date unless the Price Decontrol Board determines that they should not.

The Decontrol Board will consist of men appointed by the President. The Secretary of Agriculture and the Price Administrator are also his appointees. If these appointees attempt to put controls back upon the articles above named in such a way that the poultry and egg producers and dairy farmers in my district are unable, with a fair and reasonable profit to themselves, to supply the rest of my constituents with their products, if foods are again forced into the black market, and if people are thereby deprived of these articles and their producers driven out of business, or made to suffer financial loss, the responsibility will be that of the President. The producers, the farmers, and the consumers in my district have been patriotic and patient. We are now on our way to recovery and the American people want nothing to interfere with that progress. This Nation belongs to the people, not to the President and the New Deal.

All of which proves that this country must have a complete change in administration by the election of a Republican House and Senate and of a Republican President.

The Case Bill Veto

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. ROBERTSON
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. ROBERTSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the great farm areas of the Mississippi Valley and those sections lying to the west known as the Plateau Country or the Missouri Valley Country, from which come such vast volumes of our wheat and other important foodstuffs, is again the beneficiary of another bountiful crop. This is a remarkable event in the history of these regions, because it marks the sixth consecutive crop, something quite out of the ordinary in a land that is occasionally beset by drought.

Mr. Speaker, I must remind you that during this period of time the farmers of these regions have not been on strike; they have suffered the handicaps of the loss of their sons, and the replacement of their sons with hired help has been impossible. Yet these great citizens, with their great farms, have produced bountifully, they have given to the world a great service.

It should be obvious that during this war period they could obtain little in the way of new machinery. To produce as they have has taxed their old machinery to the utmost. It is reasonable to assume that this machinery is now nearly worn out. Confronted as they are with the harvesting of another crop with this old machinery, it is understandable why they write me in vast numbers asking for help in order that they may obtain essential repairs.

It is impossible to obtain new machinery which they are willing to buy. They must of necessity then have the parts to repair their old machinery if they are to carry on and harvest these crops. Neither the new machinery nor parts for their old machinery is available.

Many factories in their region making farm machinery have been on strike for many months and they are on strike because there is no law compelling the strikers to bargain collectively. There is a one-sided law which compels the management or ownership to bargain. This brings us face to face with one of great mistakes in our Nation's history. This Congress in its wisdom passed the Case bill. That was a milestone in the affairs of the Nation. It offered the solution of this old-age controversy between employers and employees. And yet the President of the United States, coming from a farm region, has seen fit to veto this important legislation.

I should like to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the President in an address to this Congress proposed to have a joint committee of the House and the Senate lay plans for the long haul on labor and management legislation. As of this date little if anything has been accomplished and still the problem goes on, a problem that grows more extreme each succeeding day.

Can it be possible that this Congress, representing all of the people of the United States, can longer neglect to place upon the President's desk legislation paralleling the Case bill in order that we may bring to a final conclusion these distressing conditions. We cannot go on asking the American farmers in the Wheat Belt to produce and produce again, and deny them the machines with which to do the producing.

Not only are we asking them to produce, and by reason of the lack of proper legislation to end strikes are we preventing them from obtaining the essential implements to carry on their work, but at the same time we are shipping to Europe great quantities of machinery for the purpose of rehabilitating the agricultural areas of Europe at a time when we ourselves need it so badly here.

It is altogether important that we assist Europe in her rehabilitation, and her rehabilitation will be accelerated by the aid of our American machinery. We have the factories and the capacity to produce farm machinery for Europe and at the same time supply the reasonable needs of our own farm people. The thing we are lacking is a courageous government that will deal firmly and immediately with the underlying question that is holding up production in all lines of American industry. We must end the labor strife. The Case bill was the answer to that disturbing question.

American Military Aid to Chinese Communist Armies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the recent appointment of Dr. John Leighton Stuart as United States Ambassador to China has inspired hope among many American friends of the Chinese people that this distinguished educator and missionary may be able, through his great knowledge of Chinese thoughts and habits, to hasten the return of peace in the lands which have been so ravaged by war and internecine banditry.

However, Dr. Stuart's task will not be made any easier and may be rendered impossible of achievement if our policy toward our Chinese ally continues to blow hot and cold, varying with every different whim of Washington bureaucracy.

In this connection the following two statements by a group of Americans conversant with Chinese affairs warrants careful examination by Members of Congress and the American public. For this purpose I include in the RECORD a letter to Secretary of State James F. Byrnes, delivered yesterday and signed by 38 distinguished citizens of our country, as well as a brief statement signed by 18 of them in reply to Mme. Sun Yat-sen's recent appeal favoring what is in effect an abandonment of China to the Communists:

NEW YORK, N. Y. July 24, 1946.

Hon. JAMES F. BYRNES,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The undersigned, having read reports of a statement by Under Secretary Dean Acheson before the House Foreign Affairs Committee on June 19 promising American training and supplies to Chinese Communist armies prior to their incorporation in the National Army of China, respectfully submit the following as their reasons for opposing such a policy as unwise and contrary to America's best interests:

In the first place we realize that this American policy of training a certain proportion of Chinese Communist troops, as well as a larger number of Nationalist troops, may seem to be implied in the President's declaration of December, 1945, which embodied his instructions to General Marshall, hence our criticism of this policy implies no reflection on General Marshall. In his December statement President Truman declared it to be America's intention to continue to help the recognized Government of China, but at the same time, he indicated that such help would be dependent on establishing unity in China. Unfortunately, this statement implied that the Chinese Government was expected to achieve unity at any cost. It was therefore an invitation for the Communists to blackmail the Central Government, for it appeared to give them a virtual veto power by which they could prevent any American aid to China unless the Communist terms were accepted.

As a result, the Communists obtained tremendous concessions from the Chinese Government in the January 10 truce and a great deal more in the political agreement of January 31. The agreement to have American officers train Communist troops was one of them. Yet even these concessions were not enough, for the Communists have violated in Manchuria the very agreements which were so favorable to them, as we shall show.

We, therefore, believe that the time has come to clarify the American Government's China policy which, in the name of unity, has really encouraged further disunity in China. The press interview by Under Secretary Dean Acheson on June 29 was not enough, for although he promised continuance of American aid to China for the present, he did not promise to end the policy of pressuring the Chinese Government into making further concessions to the Chinese Communists.

The basis of Communist strength in China was first laid down in a joint statement issued by Dr. Sun Yat-sen and A. Joffe, Ambassador of the Soviet Union to China, at Shanghai, January 26, 1923. A Chinese Communist Party had been organized in Shanghai in 1921 by Russian agents and with Russian funds. Sun Yat-sen was to accept Chinese Communists into his Kuomintang (or Nationalist Party), and was to receive Russian military and propaganda advisers, arms, and funds. The joint statement of January 1923 formulated the basis of agreement upon which this was done and assured the Chinese people that Russia was acting as a friend and without imperialistic intentions. The joint statement of Dr. Sun and Ambassador Joffe read, in part, as follows:

Item 1: "Dr. Sun Yat-sen holds that the Communist order or even the Soviet system cannot actually be introduced into China because there do not exist here the conditions for the successful establishment of either communism or sovietism. This view is entirely shared by Mr. Joffe, who is further of the opinion that China's paramount and most pressing problem is to achieve national unification and attain full national independence, and regarding this great task, he has assured Dr. Sun Yat-sen that China has the warmest sympathy of the Russian people and can count on the support of Russia."

Item 2: Reaffirmed the Russian note of September 27, 1920, in which Russia gave up all the czarist claims in Manchuria (which claims she demanded and received again from President Roosevelt at Yalta).

Item 3: Provided for negotiations as to the Chinese Eastern Railway.

Item 4: Mr. Joffe categorically declared that Russia did not wish to separate Outer Mongolia from China. (This separation was also arranged for by President Roosevelt at Yalta.)

Ever since this agreement, and in open violation of it, both Russian agents and the Chinese Communists have worked unremittingly to make China a satellite of the Soviet Union.

The following year, 1924, the Soviet Union signed an agreement with the Chinese Government at Peiping (the government which Sun Yat Sen and his Kuomintang were endeavoring to overthrow and which his successor, Chiang Kai-shek, did overthrow in 1928. This agreement, dated May 31, 1924, signed by Karakhan and V. K. Wellington Koo (new Chinese Ambassador to Washington) reads, in part, as follows:

"ART. VI. The governments of the two contracting parties mutually pledge themselves not to permit within their respective territories the existence and (or) activities of any organizations, or groups, whose aim is to struggle by acts of violence against the governments of either contracting party.

"The governments of the two contracting parties further pledge themselves not to engage in propaganda directed against the political and social systems of either contracting party."

This agreement is in flat contradiction to the one in the previous year promising aid to Sun Yat-sen. Nevertheless that aid was continuously delivered until 1927. In fact, both these agreements were being violated by Russia before the ink on them was dry.

When Chiang Kai-shek advanced in 1926 and 1927 to the conquest of all China, his armies were accompanied by Russian and Russian-trained Chinese Communists, who had been accepted in the Kuomintang by Sun Yat-sen as individuals. In violation of the promises quoted above, the Chinese Communists, under the orders of the Russian Borodin, seized the revolutionary government, then located at Hankow. This compelled Chiang Kai-shek to halt the advance of the Nationalist revolution while he gathered loyal forces and overthrew the Communists.

The Communists meantime had formed their own Soviet government with their own armies and for the ensuing 6 years, subsidized by Russia, held out against Chiang's government in south central China, particularly in the Provinces of Hunan and Kiangsi. Finally in 1933 they were driven out, and retreated to the far northwest, where they established themselves toward 1935 at Yenan (in Shensi) with an army of 5,000 to 10,000 troops.

Just at this time, as a counter thrust to the Anti-Comintern pact of Germany, Italy, and Japan, Russia ordered its Communist Parties everywhere to agitate for a united front against the Axis. Following receipt of these instructions, the Chinese Communists proposed a united anti-Japanese front to the Kuomintang. Their proposals as laid in written form before the February 1937 meeting of the Kuomintang were summarized as follows by the Chinese Year Book (issue of 1938–39):

"1. The Chinese Soviet Government shall henceforth be known as the Government of the Special Area of the Republic of China, which shall be under the control of the National Government and of the National Military Council.

"2. In the territory of the Government of the Special Area a democratic system of government shall obtain.

"3. All activities designed to overthrow the National Government shall cease throughout the country.

"4. The policy of land confiscation shall be discontinued."

These proposals were accepted by the central executive committee of the Kuomintang. But the Communists did not place their government under the control of the National Government; they consistently disobeyed the orders of the National Military Council; they maintained a one-party dictatorship in their areas, and a state-controlled press and radio; they continued to attack the National Government; and they continued, with slight modification, their policy of land confiscation.

In a booklet of instructions to party workers, issued later in 1937, under the title "Present Strategy and Tactics of the Chinese Communist Party—Very Confidential," they explained in part as follows their apparent abandonment of communism in the above agreement:

"To establish a democratic republic is the present strategy of the Chinese Communist Party, and its tactics is to cease civil wars and to cooperate with the Kuomintang * * * for the present circumstances require a temporary compromise with the Kuomintang. * * * In the minds of the Communist members, there should be no doubt as to the wisdom of this policy which has the following bases:

"1. It is politic to give up a dead-end policy for a passable road which will enable us to reach proletariat dictatorship.

* * * * *

"4. Our present tactics is for the very purpose of protecting the growth of our secret programs, and of coordinating the secret with the open work in order to win the support of the masses for the future overthrow of capitalism.

* * * * *

"7. Due to weariness and exhaustion, it is necessary to recuperate in order to preserve and restore the revolutionary strength. To give up temporarily the revolutionary regime is merely a change of name and in reality it is a preparation for a greater victory in the future" (pp. 49–51).

* * * * *

"4. Our present compromise is designed to weaken the Kuomintang and to overthrow the National Government under the Kuomintang dictatorship by utilizing the name of a democratic republic. * * * Furthermore, the success of the democratic republic will mark the beginning of the second proletarian revolution and the realization of proletarian dictatorship" (pp. 63–66).

* * * * *

"3. For the sake of strategy and during the initial stage of the United Front, the Red Army can change its insignia and accept a united command. However, in reality, the Red Army should maintain its independent entity so that it can act as a model army and become the center and reliable force of the Communist movement in China."

* * * * *

"12. For the present, the organization of the Communist Party should still be kept secret while the members of the party should openly participate in all patriotic organizations, forming a nucleus in them. It is important to assign certain Communist Party members to work as representatives of the party, but they should be under the direction of the secret organs of the Communist Party in that place" (pp. 77–82).

In the course of the Sino-Japanese War, which began in July 1937, the Chinese Communists acted with a measure of loyalty until late 1939 (after Russia's alliance with Germany). Then they adopted a policy opposed to the National Government. They denounced Britain and France, and also the United States of America, as imperialists, and welcomed the Russo-Japanese treaty of 1941 which recognized as inviolate the boundaries of the Japanese puppet state of Manchukuo.

When Hitler attacked Russia, June 22, 1941, the Chinese Communists again hailed Britain as an ally and temporarily ceased attacks on the National Government of China. However, in the summer of 1943, when the Russian press resumed its attacks on the Chinese Government, the Chinese Communists also stepped up their attacks on it.

In the fall of 1944 Gen. Patrick J. Hurley went to China as President Roosevelt's personal representative and, later, Ambassador. In order to strengthen China's war effort, he tried to arrange a compromise between the National Government and the Communists. The Communists had presented a set of demands, including certain positions in the Government, and he finally induced Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek to accept them. He then flew to Yenan to report that all was agreed to, only to have the Communists increase their demands. He returned to Chungking and obtained the Generalissimo's acceptance of the increased demands, only, once again, to have the Communists increase them. At this point the negotiations reached a stalemate which continued until after the end of the war in the Pacific.

During this period Chiang Kai-shek again and again invited Mao Tse-tung to come to Chungking to confer but the invitations were rejected with vile abuse and Chiang himself was branded as lunatic. Yet President Chiang Kai-shek persisted in his invitation and refused to retaliate, and finally Mao graciously agreed to come.

Meantime, the National Government of China signed the Sino-Soviet part of August 1945, extending to Russia the special rights in Manchuria secretly granted earlier in the some year by Churchill and Roosevelt at Yalta. In this Sino-Soviet pact, Russia promised "to render China moral support and assistance with military equipment and other material resources, this support and assistance to be given fully to the National Government as the Central Government of China." This promise of support to the National Government only was violated in Manchuria where the Russians looted the country and turned Japanese arms over to the Communists.

Following the end of the war, the clashes between the Communists and the forces of the Government increased until the truce of January 10, 1946, was arranged by Gen. George C. Marshall. This provided in part as follows:

"(A) All hostilities will cease immediately.

"(B) Except in certain specific cases, all movements of forces in China will cease. * * *

"(C) Destruction of, and interference with, all lines of communication will cease and you will clear at once obstructions placed against or interfering with such lines of communication.

"(D) 1. The cessation-of-hostilities order does not prejudice military movements south of the Yangtze River for the continued execution of the plan of military reorganization of the National Government.

2. The cessation-of-hostilities order does not prejudice military movements of forces of the National Army into or within Manchuria which are for the purpose of restoring Chinese sovereignty."

In violation of this truce, the Chinese Communists moved their troops into Manchuria, and they were assisted by the Russians who kept the troops of the National Government on the outskirts of Harbin for 4 months, while arming the Communists.

These Chinese Communists have been a section of the Communist International since the formation of the Chinese Party in 1921. As such, they are and have been a disciplined organ of Moscow. The head of the Chinese Communist Party, Comrade Mao Tse-tung, was for many years a member of the executive committee of the Communist International. He says in China's New Democracy (1944 edition):

"The world now depends on Communism as its star of salvation and so does China" (p. 38).

"The contest between the Socialist Soviet Union and imperialist England and America is being sharpened step by step. If China does not stand on one side, she will have to stand on the other" (p. 42).

As recently as July 7, 1946, the Chinese Communist Party's central committee in Yenan issued a statement which reads in part:

"The only difference between American and Japanese imperialism is that American imperialism is stronger and its aggressive methods appear civilized and legal on the surface." (The New York Times, July 8, 1946.)

When the Chinese Party joined the Communist International in 1921, it signed 21 pledges promising, in great detail, obedience to every order from Moscow. Pledges 16 and 17 read as follows:

"16. All the resolutions of the Congresses of the Communist International, as well as the resolutions of the executive committee, are binding for all parties joining the Communist International.

"17. Each party desirous of joining the Communist International should bear the following name, Communist Party of such and such a country, section of the Third Communist International. The question of a renaming of a party is not only a formal one, but is a political question of importance. It is indispensable that every rank-and-file worker should be able clearly to distinguish between the Communist parties and the old official 'Social Democratic' or 'Socialist' Parties, which have betrayed the cause of the working class."

On September 1, 1928, Stalin's new program for the conquest of the world was adopted unanimously by the Sixth Congress of the Communist International. The Chinese Communist Party was officially represented and voted for its adoption. The program is too lengthy to summarize, except to say that with respect to China and India it pledges military aid from the Soviet Union to the Communist revolution in those two countries at the moment when "successful socialist construction will be possible."

Among the "Rules of the Communist International" adopted the same day some of the most pertinent read as follows:

"1. The Communist International * * * fights for the establishment of the world dictatorship of the proletariat, for the establishment of a world union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

* * * * * *

"6. In all nonparty worker's and peasants' mass organizations (trade unions, cooperative societies, exservicemen's organizations) and also on municipal elective bodies and in parliament, even if there are only two party members in such organizations and bodies, Communist fractions must be formed for the purpose of strengthening the party's influence and for carrying out its policy in these organizations and bodies.

* * * * * *

"10. The World Congress elects the Executive Committee of the Communist International (ECCI) and International Control Commission (ICC).

* * * * * *

"13. The decisions of the ECCI are obligatory for all sections of the Communist International and must be promptly carried out.

* * * * * *

"15. The ECCI has the right to expel from the Communist International entire sections, groups, and individual members who violate the program and constitution of the Communist International or the decisions of the World Congress or of the ECCI."

The Chinese Communist Party was a section of the Communist International from 1921 until the ostensible dissolution of the latter body in 1943, and hence evidently obeyed all orders from Moscow to the satisfaction of the ECCI.

The entire record of the Chinese Communists is one of broken pledges and consistent bad faith to China and the world, but of consistent loyalty and obedience to Moscow. This bad faith which became so apparent to Ambassador Hurley, and on numerous occasions to General Wedemeyer ought now to be apparent to General Marshall. For the Communists have violated almost every clause of the truce agreement of January 10, 1946, particularly in Manchuria, which the terms of that truce reserved exclusively to the National Government.

We believe that the United States is bound both by its pledges to China and its own interests to help China to unify its territories under the National Government, and to restore to the Chinese Republic full sovereignty in Manchuria as pledged by Russia, England, and ourselves. We believe that we should give no further aid or support to the Chinese Communists and make no further compromises with them. We consider it improper to exert American pressure on the Government of China to make terms with the Chinese Communists. We fear that the present American policy of pressure for a coalition government, if successful, will result (as did our pressure for a coalition government in Poland and Yugoslavia) in making China a satellite of Russia. We will have exchanged the open door for an iron curtain. In this case, the United States will face, across the ever-narrowing Pacific, a military empire of 950,000,000 inhabitants directed by the dictator in the Kremlin.

STATEMENT RE MME. SUN YAT-SEN'S APPEAL

Mme. Sun Yat-sen's statement of July 22, 1946, and letter of protest to Secretary Byrnes are a frank admission that the Chinese Communists are the spearhead of Soviet Russia. Her threat of war between Russia and the United States (if we aid our ally the National Government of China) amounts to a charge that Russia's agreements with President Roosevelt at Yalta, with President Truman at Potsdam and the agreements with China formalized in the Sino-Soviet pact of August 1945, are all mere scraps of paper. Russia pledged to fully observe Chinese territorial integrity, not to interfere in Chinese internal affairs, to maintain the status quo in Outer Mongolia, and also to render moral support and assistance with military equipment and other material resources to the National Government only.

Madam Sun now warns us that if we give military and material aid only to the National Government of China (exactly what Russia promised to do), we will have war with Russia. Is Madam Sun, who fled to Russia as a fugitive in 1927, after her part in the unsuccessful Communist putsch in China, and who remained there as a student of communism, speaking on behalf of Moscow where her connections are undoubtedly of the highest? If this is the case, then President Truman is confronted with the dilemma that faced President Roosevelt prior to Pearl Harbor. At that time President Roosevelt could either recognize Japanese control of China through puppet governments they had set up, or stand firmly for the long established American policies of the "open-door" and independence and territorial integrity of China. He chose to uphold American aims and policy even at the risk of war. The dilemma confronting President Truman is the same except that the aggressor demanding control of China by its puppets (if Madam Sun is correct) is Russia now, in place of Japan then.

It is unthinkable that threats by the puppets of Russia will cause our Government to abandon its peace aims in the Far East as clearly set forth by President Roosevelt in the declaration of Cairo.

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. P. W. GRIFFITHS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Mr. Speaker, I favor the general principles of this bill and in particular the provision for cutting down the number of committees, but I cannot go along on the increasing of congressional salaries at this time, nor the retirement feature even though under the bill Members of Congress will pay into the retirement fund more than others who are covered by the present retirement system.

A Decade of Progress for Pennsylvania Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, July 27 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of the remarks made by me recently to a group of farmers in the State of Pennsylvania on the subject A Decade of Progress for Pennsylvania Farmers.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A DECADE OF PROGRESS FOR PENNSYLVANIA FARMERS

The new 19-cent price for milk to the city consumer increases the cost of living in Pennsylvania by $63,875,000 annually but the farmer gets only $38,325,000 of it. The very generous Milk Control Commission and General Martin give the distributors $25,500,000 in excess of the swollen profits of recent war years when consumers increased their purchase of fluid milk by 27 percent. And now consumption is going the other way. Another year of subsidy would have kept consumption at the war level and have controlled profiteers but with 19-cent milk both farmer and worker will suffer rising costs.

It will be remembered by farmers that General Martin and his control board made many requests for the lifting of prices during the war. With all their pleadings and all the propaganda of the dealers OPA proved to be the only governmental agency in our milk-control history able to put the milk dealer in his place. Last year a subsidy of $26,484,725 was paid to farmers to help pay additional feed costs. This subsidy was paid from the taxes collected from high incomes and the farmer was not required to split with anyone. Administration costs were less than one-half of 1 percent. Now two and one-half times the cost of the subsidy, or a total of $63,875,000, is being paid by those least able to pay and the farmer is splitting his increase by handing the dealers $25,500,000.

As I recall the days of the last world war, I am reminded of the terrible "let-down" when declining consumer income brought milk prices to the farmer to $1 or less per hundredweight. Farm foreclosures, dilapidated farm buildings, and depleted soils were the remnants of an economy of supply and demand. When Roosevelt and Wallace came on the scene at the depth of the depression there were no farm resources. A vigorous program to replace soil, rebuild credit, and supply comfort for agriculture was their answer to the demands of the times. At the end of 10 years of this comprehensive program we should stop for a moment and take account of stock.

The health of Pennsylvania's people and the health of Pennsylvania soil have been benefited through our agricultural-conservation program by increasing the annual usage of lime from 331,000 tons to 1,163,000 tons annually. An equally impressive acceleration is shown by the use of phosphorus as a soil and health builder from 340,000 to 1,200,000 hundred-pound bags a year. The important elements of bone and teeth—calcium and phosphorus were supplied to children through the milk that was produced on pastures rich in these important elements. The agricultural-conservation program kept the wheels of industry going and utilized surplus fertilizing ingredients to restore fertility to farms depleted through low income in depression years. An average subsidy of $6,000,000 was the Federal Government's investment every year for the past 10 years in better health standards in food and in richer land for the great war-production program. In addition to the contribution in lime and superphosphate the agricultural-conservation program assisted farmers in establishing 97,050 acres of strip cropping, 161,817 acres in winter cover crops and many other well-planned conservation practices like diversion ditches and reforestation. In other words, we used tax money paid by men who have exploited our mines and forests and people to restore our priceless heritage of soil for present and future generations.

The Agricultural Conservation and Adjustments Acts of 1936 and 1938 not only provided for agricultural conservation but set up the machinery for the protection of the farmers market. Through commodity loans and agricultural price supports farmers were no longer forced to accept the price of the speculator or exploiter but was enabled to store grain and other commodities in the ever-normal granary. These loans supplied ready cash for farm expenses and permitted the farmer to market his product when he chose or when the market afforded a profit. These loans not only supplied farmers with cash, they filled the ever-normal granary to the overflowing with reserve supplies of grain for war-food emergencies.

Economic stability came to agriculture when cash income advanced from a low of $192,000,000 in depression years to $273,000,000 in prewar years and $468,000,000 in war-boom years. As this stability took hold the mortgaged indebtedness of farmers declined from $185,000,000 in 1932 to $135,000,000 in the prewar years of 1939 and to $121,000,000 in 1946. Our Farm Credit Administration has moved from the banker's corner where our predecessors put it to the farmer's corner in the Department of Agriculture. No longer is the Farm Credit Administration under the domination of an administration board subservient to the whims of the American Bankers Association. No longer are the resources of the Farm Credit Administration used to liquidate the mistakes of city bankers and large insurance companies. The Department of Agriculture is using farm credit for the benefit of the American farmer, in spite of the fact that the bankers lobby continues to prate through certain farm leaders about an independent board.

Farmers in low income groups have received special attention from the Government in the past 10 years. Farm tenancy was a major problem 10 years ago. Where two families tried to live from the income of one farm both families suffered and the land declined in productive power. Abandoned farms and low income farm families presented a problem as baffling as any of the social maladjustments of the depression years. The Bankhead-Jones Farm Ownership Act has gone a long way toward showing the way to farm ownership by operating farmers. With 40-year mortgages and 3 percent interest the death grip of banker controlled farm credit disappeared and now veterans and worthy farm operators may use their Government to lift themselves by their economic boot straps to successful agricultural careers. Six hundred and thirteen loans have been approved by the Farm Security Administration in Pennsylvania for farm owners, 76 of which have been made to veterans, recently. To the low-income farmer, the sharecropper and family-type farmer rehabilitation loans have been a good investment by the Government in its people. Out of a total of 7,600 loans aggregating $9,555,000 these farmers have paid $5,796,000 back to the Government, most of which has been repaid ahead of schedule. The Farm Security Administration has an enviable record in war-food production since all of the 37 percent increase in food production attributed to those aided by FSA has been the result of utilizing latent and unspent power of farm families previously under-equipped for maximum production. The investment of the Government has at all times been protected by the use of home-economics and farm-management experts fully trained in our best educational and vocational institutions. Farmers were trained to do a job and required to do that job according to plan and subject to records.

Farm life has been made more attractive in the past 10 years. The traditional drudgery of farm life has disappeared because of the use of machinery and electrical equipment. The Rural Electrification Administration was created by Executive order of the late President Roosevelt on May 11, 1935. It was authorized by Congress in 1944. The model REA Act of 1937 gave to Pennsylvania all the benefits of the national act and the farmers of Pennsylvania lost no time in seizing the opportunity to provide the comforts and conveniences of electricity for farms and homes. Under the authority of these acts 13 federally financed rural electrification cooperatives and 1 privately financed cooperative have been established. The Federal Government has loaned $13,971,200 to these cooperatives and as a result 36,792 farms and rural homes have been electrified. The drudgery of the farm woman has been abolished in many homes. She now enjoys the conveniences she previously envied as she visited her city cousin. Farm youth finds promise and allurement in farm life now that boys and girls may look forward to a convenient and comfortable farm home. There is no longer the necessity for aging farmers to "move to town" to enjoy the fruits of their arduous labors in comfort. Rural electrification has either supplied electricity to 65 percent of Pennsylvania's farms or has forced private utilities to supply electricity to them at a rate of competitive equality. The utilities no longer skim the cream from the rural field. They supply whole blocks of territory or step aside for REA to do it. These cooperatives are not a gift to farmers. They are successful business enterprises. They are paying their own way ahead of schedule and they are making extensions as fast as war conditions and postwar conditions permit. Fifty-two thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight farms need electricity before we finish the job. Pennsylvania farmers can expect no help from the Republican utility stooges.

In looking to the future we have not been lax. The Bankhead-Jones Act of 1935 gave to the 12 Northeastern States $150,000 for a research laboratory for the improvement of pastures in our climatic area. This laboratory was located on the campus of Pennsylvania State College under terms of a 99-year lease and works with all experiment stations in the 12 States surrounding it. Here in the Keystone State the United States Department of Agriculture is performing scientific experiments in grass and legume grass and legume diseases and pasture management. Economical milk and meat production must come from improved and well-managed pastures. In this laboratory we are showing the way.

When the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 was signed by President Roosevelt it carried a provision for research into the field of new uses for agricultural products. It was the belief of the Congressmen who sponsored this legislation that conservation of soil alone would not cure the depressing influence of surpluses created through highly productive land. This act was intended to restore fertility, protect markets from exploiters and find new uses for the agricultural surpluses. The Eastern Research Laboratory at Philadelphia was established under the terms of this act. It was my privilege to advise Secretary Wallace to select this central point for its erection and it was my further privilege to assist in its dedication in 1940. In its 10 years of operation it has gone a long way to develop scientific data so that private business may with confidence develop these findings on a commercial scale. Pilot plants have discovered the secrets of nature in a practical way. Waste farm products are now finding economical and practical uses.

Among the accomplishments of this research laboratory is the apple syrup which has been developed for use as a humidant for cigarette tobacco and apple essence as concentrated flavoring. A large commercial factory has been built for the use of fiber developed at this laboratory from casein, a product of skimmed milk, to be utilized in the manufacture of brushes, and several drug companies are busy making arrangements to extract rutin from buckweat and tobacco according to the technique developed at Philadelphia. Rutin is a new drug which promises to relieve people of high blood pressure.

I regret that I can report little in the way of accomplishments in the field of the Soil Conservation Service because of jurisdictional disputes between this Service and our land-grant college and its federally sponsored Extension Service. A political revolution is necessary to dissolve these animosities. Worthy projects in York, Lancaster, Indiana, and Clarion Counties speak eloquently of the benefits of this Service, but stubborn resistance of our political adversaries prevents expansion according to the usual patterns of other States. The Forestry Service is doing an excellent job in Pennsylvania in conserving timber, protecting top soil, and preserving wildlife.

For a State that is generally considered industrial, I speak with pride when I cite the war food accomplishments of Pennsylvania's 170,000 farmers. As a Senator who has been deeply interested in the welfare of the workingman, I have been constantly and consistently interested in the man who needs his food dollar to live. The working city dweller and the working farmer are brothers, in spite of the fact that the exploiter of both agitates disunity and distrust between them. Good wages means a full meal for the miner, the steel worker, and the office man. Full meals for the city dweller means good markets for the farmer. Nineteen-cent milk means undernourishment in the city. Nineteen-cent milk means the return to the old surplus racket for the farmer. I believe in controlled profits through an active and virile OPA and a subsidy to farmers until the cost of feed comes back to the place that the farmer can produce 15-cent milk at a profit. Subsidies are being paid mostly from income taxes collected from the profits of the rich. The crocodile tears of the Pews and Grundies whose taxes help to pay these subsidies are not impressive to the farmer.

Transfer of Jewish Refugees to Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, July 26 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, by request I am asking unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an interesting and challenging address by Mr. Earl G. Harrison, dean of the Law School of the University of Pennsylvania, and United States Representative on the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees. The address was delivered at the Seventy-eighth Annual Convention of B'nai B'rith District Lodge No. 6, on July 10, 1946, at the Masonic Temple, Detroit, Mich. I also include the introductory remarks of Mr. Henry Monsky, the national president of B'nai B'rith.

According to an estimate from the Government Printing Office the manuscript will exceed by two-thirds of a page the two printed pages allowed under the rule without a statement of cost. The estimate indicates that the cost will be $160.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HENRY MONSKY (president of B'nai B'rith). I am now going to take the great privilege of presenting to you our guest speaker. He was the former United States Commissioner of Immigration. He is the United States representative on the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees. He is the dean of the law school of the University of Pennsylvania. But more than all of those combined, as important as those posts have been, and great as have been his contributions in each of those capacities, he manifested a statesmanship, a vision, a courage unequaled by any man, young or old, in public life in the past decade. It was his great privilege to be sent to Europe as the special representative of the President of the United States, something over a year ago, to make a survey of the conditions that prevailed in the displaced-persons centers or camps in the occupied zones in Europe.

You recall his report. He had the courage and he dared to tell the truth in unvarnished form concerning the conditions that prevailed over there. It was published in every newspaper of any importance in America after having been presented to President Truman. As a result of that report President Truman made the initial request of the British Government to transfer 100,000 Jews to Palestine. It was because of that report, and the subsequent request by the President, that the Anglo-American Inquiry Committee on Palestine was brought into existence with its confirmation of Mr. Harrison's recommendation and the President's request.

He is therefore qualified by experience, because of his great capacity, his fine perspective, his excellent courage and humanitarian understanding of our vital problem to speak to us tonight. It is a great pleasure and a very real honor to present to you Dean Earl G. Harrison.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS

Mr. EARL G. HARRISON. Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, it is just about 1 year ago that, after having spent several days at SHAEF headquarters in Frankfurt studying statistics, reports, and statements of policy, I started my trip through Germany and Austria, visiting some 30 of the former concentration camps and centers for displaced persons. While those portions of the report, subsequently filed, dealing with conditions within the camps received most attention in the press at the time, there were two parts of the report which obviously dealt with matters of far greater importance. Indeed, the debate, which followed for some weeks after the publication of the report, regarding conditions within the camps and the extent of the improvement in them between the date of my report and its delayed release to the press, was rather pointless because it was so wide of the real issues.

As was clearly pointed out in the report, most of the people who had spent years in the concentration camps did not ask or even want improvement in the conditions within the camps. They feared that should such improvement come, attention would be diverted from the principal matters. These were stated in the report to be:

"For reasons that are obvious and need not be labored, most Jews want to leave Germany and Austria as soon as possible. That is their first and great wish. Their desire to leave Germany is an urgent one. The life which they have led for the past 10 years, a life of fear and wandering and physical torture, has made them impatient of delay. They want to be evacuated to Palestine now, just as other groups are being repatriated to their homes. They do not look kindly on the idea of waiting around in an idleness and in discomfort in a German camp for many months until a leisurely solution is found for them. * * * Evacuation from Germany should be the emphasized theme, policy, and practice. * * * To the extent that such emigration from Germany and Austria is delayed, some immediate temporary solution must be found. In any event there will be a substantial number of persecuted persons who are not physically fit or otherwise presently prepared for emigration. Here I feel strongly that greater and more extensive effort should be made to get them out of camps, for they are sick of living in camps."

It makes my blood run cold to realize that they are still in camps, that these, the worst victims of the most vicious persecution program of all history, are still compelled to live, no, not to live but to exist on the German and Austrian soil which they loathe. What injustice.

There were those who felt, or at least stated, at the time my report was filed, that I indicated through its content and recommendations some unawareness of the many problems facing in particular the occupying military authorities and that I seemed to expect that too much could be accomplished too quickly. They argued that in view of the gigantic repatriation program then under way, a short time more in camps even for those who had seen their families and relatives exterminated in such places was not unreasonable. I wonder what they think now when well over a year after VE-day and longer after so-called liberation of the concentration-camp inmates, most of them are still denied a normal life and are to all intents and purposes confined. I pause to make entirely clear that at this time I am making no reference to conditions within the camps or centers. I am pointing again to the much more important phases of the situation.

Although disappointed, I was not too surprised when President Truman's personal request addressed to the British Government that 100,000 Jews be permitted to enter Palestine met with an abrupt refusal. I had hoped for a more understanding response from a Labor Government, some of whose high representatives had, during the preelection campaign, made very definite promises and statements regarding freer immigration into Palestine. But my own observations in London and in the British zone in Germany led me to the conclusion that any such proposal would be stoutly resisted or, to state it another way, that there was no real wish or will to help even the few wretched survivors of the Nazi extermination program with respect to their desire to go to Palestine.

The proposal, however, that an Anglo-American Commission of Inquiry be created seemed to me a reasonable one. I was not one of those disappointed at the suggestion or who looked upon it as a means of gaining further delay. In view of the recognized difficulties, it seemed, as I say, reasonable to set up a joint commission comprised of fair, open-minded, judicial men representing the Government from which a request for merciful action had emanated and the Government possessed of the power to grant or deny the request.

I assumed—it now appears naively—that if the Commission did a thorough job and made reasonable recommendations, both Governments would stand by them and earnestly and vigorously seek ways and means to carry them into execution. When invited to appear before the Commission, I promptly accepted. I was impressed with the caliber of the men selected by both Governments. While of course I had no notion of what direction some of their ideas or conclusions would ultimately take, I was rather confident that at least a majority of them would react as I did to the plight of those still confined in camps in Germany and Austria.

As the first witness before the Anglo-American Commission, I stated:

"I am confident that after you have heard all witnesses and have completed your own examinations, you will conclude that the most immediate, the most pressing, and appealing need for remedial action in Europe is in connection with the approximately 100,000 Jews in Germany and Austria. I am equally sure you will conclude that, no matter how much conditions have improved in the camps, or so-called DP centers, in those countries, so long as the former concentration-camp inmates are obliged to live in those places, there is the important unfinished business of liberation."

I went on in my testimony to remind the Commission that they had been charged by the two Governments, as I had been instructed some months earlier by the United States Government, "to make estimates of those who wish or will be impelled by their conditions to migrate to Palestine or other countries outside Europe." Both Governments had agreed that this inquiry should be made—not, I apprehend, as an academic proposition but as a basis for a future course of conduct.

I concluded my testimony before the Anglo-American Commission with the same words used to conclude my report to President Truman:

"I wish to repeat that the main solution, in many ways the only real solution, of the problem lies in the quick evacuation of all nonrepatriable Jews in Germany and Austria, who wish it, to Palestine.

"The urgency of the situation should be recognized. It is inhuman to ask people to continue to live for any length of time under their present conditions.

"The civilized world owes it to this handful of survivors to provide them with a home where they can again settle down and begin to live as human beings."

What the Commission found and recommended is now well known to you. To me, the significant and gratifying and, I must confess, somewhat astounding fact was that the report, including the recommendation that 100,000 Jews from Europe be admitted to Palestine as quickly as possible, was unanimous. Twelve eminent and reliable citizens of Great Britain and the United States had devoted more than 4 months to intensive study and investigation and this was their unanimous recommendation.

In my opinion, the manner in which the British Government has received and handled that report is totally without justification and, indeed, is little if any short of outrageous. One must now question the bona fides of the action of the British Government in having proposed the creation of the Anglo-American Commission. Everyone understood, everyone knew that one of the items of reference was specifically whether President Truman's request that 100,000 Jews from Europe be admitted to Palestine was reasonable, practicable, and required by the present situation. This was a very definite question inherent in the reference of the matter to this specially created tribunal. Had the Commission come back with an altogether new and novel idea, with a different approach to the problem, or with a varying point of view, one could understand that its recommendations would be open to close review and perhaps some modification in acceptance. But that is not the case.

In effect, six distinguished and trustworthy men of Great Britain without dissent said to the British Government and six equally qualified Americans similarly stated to their Government that President Truman's request that 100,000 immigration certificates to Palestine be made available to the persecuted Jews of Europe who wish or (are) impelled by their conditions to migrate to Palestine was reasonable, was practicable in spite of the opposition, and indeed that it was the only action that would be really helpful and merciful to the Jews who had been the victims of Nazi and Fascist persecution.

What happened? The report was received in stony silence and then, in effect, repudiated. This, indeed, was a fine reward to the six Britishers who worked long and hard on a difficult assignment. Why did the British Government propose the Commission? Was it merely in the hope that a decision more to her liking might conceivably come out of it? By her handling of the Commission's report and more particularly in the utterances of some of her high representatives, Great Britain has made a mockery of the whole business. Having in effect asked for arbitration, Great Britain violates every principle of fair play and procedure according to law in refusing to abide by the unanimous conclusions of the arbitrators.

What does Great Britain propose to do—reject the Commission report in its entirety or merely those parts she does not like? I have not seen any authoritative statement—beyond some rather irresponsible, reprehensible, and irrelevant remarks by one high British Government officer, later sought to be explained away.

Belatedly Great Britain suggests that the problem of Palestine is one for the United Nations. After the verdict of the jury is in she thinks of another court to which the case might better be put.

If Great Britain felt unable or unwilling to cope with the situation created by the report of the Anglo-American Commission, the gracious and, I submit, the decent thing for Great Britain to have done was to say: "Here is a report which is important and far reaching. Six of His Majesty's respected subjects participated in its formulation. We are satisfied that it must represent the right thing to be done under all the circumstances and we propose to seek the help of the United Nations to carry it into effect for we support it."

This would have been understandable, because I agree that the whole problem of displaced persons is an international responsibility, and I hope the United Nations will continue to hold that view, and will, without too much further delay, implement its resolutions by specific actions. Great Britain has, however, all too plainly shown her annoyance at the report of the Anglo-American Commission and now seeks to shift, not to share, responsibility for doing the right thing. Unless Great Britain intended in all good faith to stand by and support conclusions and recommendations of the Anglo-American Commission, she had no right to propose its creation.

Few problems in the world are decided or even helped by a policy of vacillation or indecision. In this instance there is not only vacillation and indecision on the part of the Labor Party which out of office condemned the British white paper of 1939 but which after becoming the Government it apparently wishes to continue, but there is stubborn refusal to face the realities of the situation. I found the same thing while touring the British zone in Germany. Admitting that the persecuted Jews were in far worse physical and mental condition than most of the other displaced persons, British officers steadfastly maintained they could not and should not recognize the Jews as a separate category of displaced persons and that they had to be considered like all others along purely nationalistic lines. Although in some respects their attitudes and policies with respect to displaced persons were liberal and understanding, they persisted in their point of view that in spite of their unique and greater hardships and privations, the Jews were not entitled to any special consideration. Their attitude cannot be characterized as anti-Semitic for England has in many ways shown generosity toward, and real concern, for the plight of persecuted Jews, as for example her offering a haven of refuge to 60,000 of them; rather it seemed like an ostrich-like quality of stubbornly refusing to lift one's head from the sand to see and admit the realities of the situation and a too self-assured persistence upon a pattern of conduct totally inadequate to meet the real problem.

To date the British have accomplished practically nothing toward solving the Palestine problem; there has been plenty of bungling. I do not understand their utter impatience and despair. In spite of the report of the Anglo-American Commission, it seems that the Arabs by threats of violence can prevent any British action in the direction of carrying out the recommendations. Everyone knows that the same amount of force on the part of British troops as is now being directed against the Jews would suffice to put into effect the recommendation of the Anglo-American Commission. But it is by no means clear that force would be needed. In spite of their protestations and threats, it is not at all clear that the Arabs would turn a completely deaf ear to the claims and wishes of the surviving victims of nazism and fascism if determined negotiations were undertaken, and I doubt that they have been. I wonder, for example, whether anyone has suggested that if 100,000 certificates were made available for the rescue of the persecuted, no other request for immigration into Palestine would be made for a given number of years, the precise number of years to be determined by conference. I realize the suggestion would not be welcome to many Zionists, but I may be excused for suggesting some such compromise, if it has not already been explored, because I am still haunted by the wan and weary faces of those who, having suffered the tortures of hell, wish nothing so much as to spend their remaining years in peace and quiet in Palestine. I cannot imagine that even the most ardent Zionists would be unwilling, if the shattered remnants of European Jewry would benefit thereby, to postpone for a reasonable period further consideration of their ultimate plans and dreams.

The Arab Higher Executive Committee, in its latest outburst a day or two ago, showed as little understanding of the situation and the problem as Mr. Bevin did a few weeks ago, for the Arab representatives, like Mr. Bevin, referred to admitting more Jews to the United States. Of that, I shall say more in a moment but at this point I am referring to those Jews, whose arms bear the concentration-camp numbers and who do not wish to come to the United States. One member of the Anglo-American Commission related a few weeks ago his poignant experience of asking one group of such Jews in a camp in Germany where they wished to go. When they replied in unison, "Palestine," he said: "Yes, but suppose you can't go there—what is your second choice?" Their reply came quickly, "To the gas chambers." Having seen many of them, having heard their experiences first hand, having looked into their haggard faces, weary of life, I can understand their reply, sad commentary as it is upon the rest of the world. They have had enough of anti-Semitism in any form and enough of any possibility of experiencing it again.

The Arabs have not been able to demonstrate to anyone but themselves that anyone would be harmed by granting this wish of the concentration-camp survivors who could be taken to Palestine. It is the ultimate that the Arabs are resisting—and understandably so—and rather naturally they resist each step in that direction but in carrying their opposition and resistance and threats to this extent they can be, and in my opinion are, wrong. If that must be demonstrated to them, then so be it—in the interests of justice and humanity.

The Arab representatives accused President Truman of "irresponsible" statements. In so stating, they established their own irresponsibility. Their references to "Jewish votes" in connection with the President's actions were unworthy of decent men and a noble race but it is nothing new to have the motives questioned of one who seeks to act along purely humanitarian lines. President Truman has, in my opinion, done just that and he is to be commended for it.

In one respect, however, the action of the United States Government, or rather the lack of action, has been most disappointing and it has weakened our position in urging more prompt and effective action on the part of others toward at least a substantial start in helping displaced persons—one of the most fundamental and urgent problems facing the United Nations today.

Last December President Truman issued a most commendable directive that all and immediate efforts of the United States Government should be bent toward bringing to the United States, within the quota limits, displaced persons from central Europe who wished to come and who were admissible under our laws. To be sure, the quota limits for the countries specified added up to the not very impressive figure of 39,000. But the directive gave to the United States an opportunity to demonstrate at the same time its real concern for the plight of millions of persons uprooted and displaced by the war and also its efficiency.

Private agencies, including B'nai B'rith, proffered help in personnel and even in financial support of those who would benefit by the program. But since it was a Government undertaking, agencies of the Government had to pull the laboring oar. The private agencies could help only to the extent they were permitted to do so.

Now I realize it was no small undertaking, and I think I have in mind the many problems and difficulties, but I feel impelled to say that what has been accomplished in more than 6 months is most disappointing and depressing. Not more than two or three thousand persons have been brought here. I know how slowly the wheels of Government can work but is this all that the best and immediate efforts of our Government could produce? Had we shown the same efficiency, the same speed, the same accomplishments during the war, I fear our allies would have found us of far less help than in fact we were.

I wish President Truman could find time in the near future in an already overwhelming schedule to call for a report on why the progress in carrying out his directive has been so slow. I say with the utmost confidence we could have done better. The thing that disturbs me as I know it disturbs others is wondering whether here again, as in other matters I have mentioned, there is not somewhere a determined resistance to doing the right thing. No thinking and fair-minded person can doubt that for the United States to have taken up quickly, within the course of a few months, 39,000 of the displaced persons, eligible and eager to come here, was the right thing for a country as large and as strong as ours to have done. And it was such a small, right thing.

Yes, it would have offended some Members of the Congress. It is no secret that the President's directive was unpopular with some of them. But we could have weathered that and would have strengthened our hand as we now endeavor to induce other nations of the world to join us in really doing something specific and constructive in solving the great problem of displaced persons, which while it continues to exist will be a threat to the peace and security of the world.

I trust that within the next few weeks, the immigration of displaced persons as contemplated by the President's directive will be facilitated and accelerated but I am skeptical. I am still thinking about the curious situation which obtained only a few months ago, as so well known to members of this audience, in which one abroad could not obtain a visa to come to the United States until he had obtained his transportation and everyone knew he couldn't get his transportation until he had the visa.

There is one other piece of unfinished business I would mention before I sit down. I refer to it because your fine organization has been for so many years and still is deeply interested in the development of sound immigration and naturalization laws.

About 2 years ago I resigned my position as Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization. In my report filed at the time I made this observation:

"There are 11 bills before Congress which would amend or eliminate racial barriers to naturalization or immigration, or both, following along the lines of the recent repeal of the Chinese exclusion laws. It is the opinion of the retiring Commissioner that these bills are correct in principle and should be speedily enacted into law. The only other country in the world that observes racial discrimination similar to that reflected in our laws in matters relating to naturalization is Nazi Germany, and all will agree this is not very desirable company.

"The pattern set by the act repealing the Chinese exclusion laws is a commendable one. It is not only necessary but desirable to place reasonable limitations upon the numbers of persons of all races and nationalities who may immigrate into the United States. On the other hand, all those who are permitted to enter—and there should be no racial discrimination in this respect—should be considered similarly eligible for naturalization. The old theory of 'inferior peoples' should be discarded as something no longer worthy of America in its naturalization laws or otherwise."

I still regard this matter of eliminating all discriminatory provisions from our immigration and naturalization laws as of prime importance. I shall never forget how embarrassed I was as a United States delegate to the First Inter-American Demographic Congress held in Mexico City in 1942 in having many other delegates from the Western Hemisphere countries ask us how we possibly could defend the laws on our statute books excluding Chinese from immigration or naturalization privileges. Happily that "historic mistake" was remedied a few months later. That Demographic Congress passed unanimously a resolution recommending the elimination of all references to "race" in determining eligibility under immigration and naturalization laws. The resolution was aimed squarely at the United States.

As you know, our present laws specifically exclude from naturalization as United States citizens most members of the brown and yellow races and the immigration laws provide for the exclusion of persons "ineligible to citizenship." Happily these discriminatory provisions were recently eliminated with respect to Filipinos and the people of India. This is commendable progress but again our lawmakers seem so reluctant to do what is obviously the right thing. We prefer to approach the matter piecemeal instead of recognizing and admitting that provisions excluding persons from privileges of immigration or naturalization solely because of race or place of birth and having no reference to personal qualifications are totally inconsistent with our democratic principles that involve the respect of man for man.

I scarcely need say that I am not advocating throwing open our gates to all the peoples of the earth. As I have so frequently said in the past, all other nations can understand reasonable limitations under quotas but they cannot understand nor can we defend exclusion or blanket ineligibility. We cannot, in my opinion, occupy our rightful place in the family of nations until we make our immigration and naturalization laws conform to our avowed declarations that men are to be judged on the basis of their personal qualifications and not on their race, their place of birth, or the color of their skin. Let our requirements as to personal integrity, moral character, loyalty to the United States, belief in our democratic institutions, and other matters of an individual nature be as high and as strict as we want to make them but let us say to no man that he is ipso facto ineligible for any privilege in our power to extend because of his racial or national background. That is not Americanism as I understand the word and the concept.

It matters not that the Japanese would be included within what I have been urging. We fought a war with Germany, too, but I have heard no proposal that we now make its nationals ineligible for immigration or naturalization.

I was much impressed with an editorial I read some weeks ago in the New York Times (June 1, 1946), entitled "For Services Rendered." There reference was made to some 2,000 "alien Japanese, whose attitudes and loyalties and activities have been scanned by the Federal Bureau of Investigation more thoroughly than have those of most native-born citizens." It was pointed out that although many of them served with our armed forces or in war agencies, "some in confidential and important capacities," all now face the possibility of deportation. Some are married to United States citizens and have children born here. Yet they are not in position to have the merits of their individual cases weighed with a view to having their deportation suspended because of the requirement in the law that persons to whom the privilege may be granted must be eligible for naturalization.

The New York Times editorial cites one very appealing case (I could give several others that have come to my attention) and advocates remedial legislation, concluding with the words "The loyal 2,000 would seem to deserve that much consideration from the representatives of the American people."

Yes; this is an important piece of unfinished business. I strongly favor the early introduction and passage of a bill which would remove all restrictions upon naturalization or in our immigration laws couched in terms of race. I know of no other action so vitally needed to bring our great country in its proper relationship with the rest of the smaller world in which we live today.

Government Loans to Business Enterprises

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER FERGUSON
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, July 27 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, Mr. Henry Bodman, who is a member of the RFC Board, recently attended the annual convention of the Michigan Bankers' Association at Mackinac Island, Mich., and delivered an address on the subject, Government Loans to Business Enterprises. I am of the opinion that the address is of such importance to the public generally that it should be printed in the RECORD. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOVERNMENT LOANS TO BUSINESS ENTERPRISES

The subject of Government in business in any field is bound to provoke controversy because it involves many of the broadest, most fundamental and troublesome social and economic issues now facing the country.

Certain of these questions are raised and typified by the operations of the RFC, particularly in connection with its loans to business enterprises. In discussing them in this setting we shall be in a field familiar to all of us, and in one which provides a practical approach for analyzing them.

My discussion will be without reference to any particular personalities, or to the present or any other administration—in short, with no political coloring. This can be done because we shall be considering matters which go far beyond, and are more fundamental than any individual or political belief. Only by an unbiased, nonpartisan approach, moreover, can a true perspective be obtained.

The two questions to be discussed are:

1. Are there any circumstances which justify Government intervention in the private financial field?

2. If there are, what are the conditions under which the Government should continue its operations in this field?

In approaching these questions, it may be well to examine how and why the Government gets into activities which so intimately affect our lives and our businesses.

Through the years, as our industrial economy has become more highly developed, and particularly with the advent of mass production, people have become more and more specialized and, individually, less and less self-sufficient. Every one of us is more dependent upon the other fellow. On a broader scale, there has developed a close interdependence of the component parts of our economic set-up, so that difficulties which arise in any important segment of the economy are quickly communicated throughout the whole system. In this way the synchronized conduct of business tends to become affected with a public interest.

The field of banking and investment is one in which there is a large measure of such public interest. This is particularly so as individual borrowing and lending have been replaced by a highly organized banking system equipped to handle financing for mass production.

How far reaching this interest is can be realized if we look back a few years. In the early thirties, as the depression approached its worst, it became clear that the banking system so affected every aspect of our economic life as to make its condition of the greatest public concern. Even those who, as a matter of principle, felt most strongly against Government intervention in business activities, were convinced that the time had come when little improvement in the situation could be expected without some help; and the Government appeared to be the only source of assistance. This was the situation in 1932 when, after a brief period in which the National Credit Corporation endeavored to stem the tide, a law was passed establishing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

This new Corporation, which was modeled after the War Finance Corporation, created following World War I, was authorized to make loans to banks and other financial institutions. These loans were required to be fully and adequately secured, which meant in many cases that the banks most in need of help could not get it.

When the bank holiday was over the RFC's authority was increased to permit it to subscribe for the preferred stock of banks or to purchase their capital notes and debentures to provide needed capital at a time when it could not be obtained elsewhere. This marked the end of the first phase of the RFC's activity and the Government's entrance into the private financial field.

In passing, it may be interesting to note that, altogether, the RFC invested in excess of a billion dollars in the preferred stocks and capital notes of over 6,000 banks. More than 82 percent of this amount has been paid back. The losses suffered so far by the RFC under this program have totaled about $3,200,000. This loss is less than one-third of 1 percent of the amount invested, and is about one-seventieth of the income which RFC has received from interest and dividends on the money advanced for this purpose.

After the immediate financial crisis created by the bank closings, the problem of next importance became that of alleviating the acute situation with respect to unemployment. It was thought that the normal recovery of business was being delayed in part on account of the inability of the banks, due to the ordeal they had just been through, to provide sufficient credit for local business enterprises.

Using the existing authority of the RFC, it was announced early in 1933 that indirect aid would be furnished to business through short-term RFC loans to banks. Because of the provisions of the RFC Act requiring all such loans to be full and adequately secured, and for other reasons, the program of indirect aid to business was not very successful in accomplishing the objective sought.

In view of the apparent need to go further in providing financial aid to business, Congress in 1934 amended the RFC Act so as to authorize direct loans to industrial or commercial business concerns. A notable provision was also included to the effect that loans could be made only when credit was not otherwise available at banks. This amendment relaxed somewhat the former collateral requirements by stating that the security for such direct loans need only be adequate.

Even with this new provision, a very small amount of money was loaned by the RFC under this program. In his annual report for 1934, the Chairman of the RFC told Congress that loans had been difficult to make largely for the reason that those industries most in need of funds could not easily comply with the law under which they could be made.

To meet this condition, the RFC Act was further amended in 1935 so as to relax to an even greater extent the quality standards under which it could make loans. The change made in the RFC Act at this time extended the maturity of loans which could be authorized; removed the limit on the amount which could be loaned to any one borrower; and, most important of all, provided that loans could be made if only they were "so secured as reasonably to assure repayment."

As a result of the general recovery in business, and of the improved liquidity of the banks in 1936 and 1937, they were able to take care of a larger proportion of existing credit demands. The credit emergency was over for all intents and purposes. In view of this situation, and recognizing the emergency nature of the RFC's activities, the President significantly directed the RFC to discontinue taking applications for loans late in 1937.

A few months later, however, when the unexpected business slump of 1938 began to reach serious proportions, the RFC again undertook to extend credit under the terms of its act.

In the years between 1938 and the outbreak of the war, further changes were made in the RFC's lending authority. Whereas, formerly, loans could be made only for the purpose of maintaining or increasing employment, the act was amended in 1938 so that loans could be made to business enterprises if they promoted the economic stability of the country. The condition that such loans could be made only if credit was not otherwise available was retained in the act.

Four important things are disclosed by this brief review of RFC's prewar activities, and of the history of the act authorizing them. These are:

1. A desire to aid economic recovery by making sure that it would not be held up for lack of available credit.

2. A desire that loans be made in such a way as to minimize losses of the public moneys lent.

3. An express policy against having the RFC in competition with banks or other financial institutions.

4. A tendency to relate activities of the RFC to the financial, business, and economic condition of the country.

If we analyze the origin of these objectives, it becomes clear that each of them arose as a matter of the public interest, mentioned earlier. First, as a matter of national interest, the country could not afford to have the spiral of deflation of the early thirties end in a complete liquidation of the banks and of the country's savings.

Further, it was certainly in the public interest to require RFC to hold to a minimum losses of the public moneys at its disposal. And while I can obviously take no credit for the splendid record of the RFC, it is a tribute to my predecessors that it has a surplus from nonwar lending activities amounting to nearly $500,000,000.

Again, in specifically prohibiting the RFC from competing with banks, it was recognized that the banking system of the country should be preserved on the basis of private ownership. And, finally, there were important public considerations in the keying of the Corporation's activities to the degree of stress to which the economic system was subject from time to time.

What each of us believes about the foregoing summary, and about the conclusions which can be drawn from it, depends entirely on his individual viewpoint. On each economic and social issue in which the Government is involved, there are those who contend that all Government activity, particularly if it involves intervention in business, is wrong. There are others who maintain, with equal assurance, that we cannot make the necessary social, technological, nor economic gains except with the active participation of the Government. Which of these beliefs is the more correct, I am not one to say.

In any event, in trying to analyze this problem a little further, I think a few points are very clear. One of these is that we are in a period of tremendous change. Some of the changes, which looked revolutionary less than a century ago, seem entirely logical and reasonable today. For example, even the strongest believers in the laissez-faire theory of banking certainly are in favor of the laws requiring banks to make periodic public statements of their condition. And while there is a great deal of discussion of the amount of FDIC assessment, there is no longer much objection to the principle of Federal deposit insurance. Most of us now feel that, in requiring full disclosure of information on investments, the SEC Act has been of benefit to the country.

On the other side of the picture many believe that too much regulation and intervention, coming too rapidly, impairs the operation of the free-enterprise system, and tends to eliminate the rewards for success which must be maintained and fostered for the preservation of that system.

Frequently we confuse the question of whether we are against Government regulation and intervention as such, with the question of how far it should go.

Assuming that we will agree, based on what has been said, that there have been circumstances which justified Government intervention in the private financial field, we now turn to the second part of the question mentioned earlier, namely, "What are the conditions under which the Government should continue its operations in this field?"

The RFC Act itself provides an answer to this question. It says that the RFC should never make a loan if it can be obtained from private sources on reasonable terms. This assumes a public interest in seeing that credit is made available beyond what private sources can provide. In other words, it says that there are loans that should be made which the banks will not, cannot, or should not make.

At the same time, the RFC is required by law to find "reasonable assurance" for the repayment of the funds it lends.

Taking these two conditions together, we find that the law defines the area in which the RFC is to operate. This area covers those loans which, for one reason or another, cannot be obtained from banks but which still offer reasonable assurance of repayment.

This area expands and contracts as the result of several factors. One of these is that the ability of a borrower to obtain credit depends not only on his own condition, but also upon the present and prospective condition of the bank. As changes occur, or are anticipated in the banking, credit, or business situation, corresponding changes take place in the proportion of deserving borrowers which the banks are able to accommodate. This, in turn, causes an automatic expansion or contraction in the RFC's lending activities.

The illiquidity of the banks in the early and middle thirties prevented them from making many sound loans which, in the national interest, should have been made. It also forced the liquidation of loans which should have been extended. In such circumstances the gap which RFC was intended to fill was relatively large. Today, in contrast, the proportion of deserving borrowers who cannot obtain credit is comparatively small, and the gap which RFC is required to fill is correspondingly much narrower than in the thirties.

Banks today, in my opinion, are doing a remarkable job. They have pledged "that bank credit shall be made available to every competent man, firm, or corporation that needs it for a constructive purpose." This pledge of yours, through the American Bankers Association, indicates your sincere desire to do whatever you can to make sure that our economic structure is maintained and developed to the full. To the extent that this is accomplished, the obligation of the RFC to provide credit is reduced.

However, even today there are some fields in which we are finding a shortage of credit. There has been an expressed national interest in stimulating the development of small business enterprises. Many have said that this would provide the greatest assurance of the perpetuation of the free-enterprise system.

Due to the nature of banks, particularly their foremost obligations to their depositors, there are many new small business enterprises which banks cannot and, perhaps, should not accommodate. In fact, I believe it is questionable whether a small business should begin its career with any substantial indebtedness.

It would be preferable for many such businesses to finance themselves entirely with equity money, so that in their early and uncertain years they would not be faced with an obligation to repay on a fixed basis any substantial proportion of their initial capital. Generally, I believe, equity financing would be more desirable for small business.

However, in the absence of an adequate flow of equity capital into small business concerns, and in view of the mandate of Congress to encourage their development, it would seem that the small business field is one in which the RFC should continue to provide financing on a fairly broad scale. The declared policy of the Government is that the development of small business should not be held back for lack of financing, provided that the benefits derived will bear some close relationship to the ultimate probable costs thereof. I think they will.

There are other classes of borrowers that need special attention, even at a time when credit is so widely available. Certainly everything possible should be done to see that the veterans can take up their interrupted lives; and to see that they get every possible help in starting up in business if they want to. Some of these, for various reasons, the banks may not be able to accommodate, and where such is the case, the RFC has an obligation to fulfill on behalf of all of the people. The RFC is, and I know you are, doing the utmost for them, not only in making loans where needed, but in helping them avoid the common mistakes of business.

A third type of loan relates to the housing program, the success or failure of which may have a great bearing on our future, particularly as it relates to the stability of our population. The family, and the house it lives in, is the most basic unit of society. Housing should not be held up for lack of available credit, and I do not think it will be. In any event, the RFC stands ready to do its part when called upon.

While these three broad groups do not represent the only fields in which we are now engaged, they are receiving our foremost attention at present. We are also giving careful consideration to the terms and conditions under which such credit should be extended, and to the economic effects of our programs.

The foregoing discussion all hinges on the question of how far the Government should go in meeting the credit demands of business enterprises which cannot be cared for by private sources. From the standpoint of the RFC, the answer to this question is contained in the law under which we operate and which it is our duty to administer. Our job is not easy, for we do not make loans as safe as those you make; and yet, as a lender of public funds, we are properly charged with the responsibility for reasonable assurance as to repayment.

I may say in passing, that in my first few months with the RFC, I am tremendously impressed with the fine attitude of the Board and of the staff toward the work of the Corporation. They are loyal, capable, and fully conscious of their responsibilities. It is easy to see why the record of the Corporation has been such an outstanding one.

The banks, too, have a tremendously difficult job, as all of you know full well. While you are encouraged, as a matter of community or national interest, to make all possible loans, you are often criticised for honest mistakes of judgment when things go wrong. The banker's dilemma is that the deposits he agrees to pay back on demand he must put out for a definite term. Of necessity he is in a difficult position and exceptionally good judgment is required of him.

Unlike life-insurance companies, banks cannot predict with any accuracy when their customers will call for their money. The banker never knows when he may be called upon for a large portion of his deposits, for unfortunately there is no actuarial basis for forecasting a business depression. All of these responsibilities, in addition to the duty he has to his stockholders, the banker must consider.

In closing, I may add that the war period put the banks to a real test from which they emerged with flying colors. No war activity was delayed for lack of credit. The banks did a remarkable job. As the reconversion period nears its end, they can chalk up another victory. To the extent that they can continue this fine performance, we, in the RFC, will find our job less difficult.

The Crisis in Housing, Plenty of Houses—On Paper

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, for a long time we have been hearing a lot about the "crisis" in housing. Last January the President created a new office and imported a man from Louisville to act as a supposed expediter. By Executive order he granted vast powers to this individual, giving him virtual control of the entire construction industry. Then the Congress saw fit to add its approval to an extravagant program recommended by Mr. Wilson Wyatt by passing the misnamed Veterans' Emergency Housing Act of 1946. I say misnamed because it is clear that the veterans are not getting houses. So far the houses planned for the veterans are still on paper.

Almost 7 months have elapsed since Mr. Wyatt came to town. Exactly what has been done to get the houses built? Two plans of action have been laid out. The first involves the allocation of materials and the use of priorities to channel building materials for housing. The second involves the use of the subsidy fund of $400,000,000, spreading it around among various producers as an enticement to increase production.

Mr. Speaker, I want to give a brief summary of the major steps taken to regulate the flow of building materials. On January 15 the CPA decided to give priorities to builders agreeing to construct houses under $10,000 and give preference to veterans for purchase. Dealers and some manufacturers were required to set aside certain percentages of their stocks each month for holders of priorities. By March 26 it had been discovered that the CPA was being too generous in authorizing construction of nonresidential building, so a new order was issued. This limited all nonessential construction, and the judge of what was included in this category was the CPA agent in the various field offices throughout the Nation. Later this order too was amended by instructing the CPA field officers to limit their approvals to one-third the average of the 2-week period ended May 23. Then it developed that too many authorizations for the higher-priced homes were being given out so the Expediter issued a new channeling order. This one set up dividing lines for the various regions and localities of the Nation, and all were subject to revision at any time.

I come now to the second line of action: the use of subsidies to get increased production. When the housing bill was before Congress we were told that subsidies were the heart of the housing program even though Mr. Wyatt had no plan and could not tell us what he was going to do with the money. To date only three regulations have been issued. Four weeks after the passage of the VEH Act it was announced that premium payments would be paid on the production of structural clay products in excess of certain quotas. On June 20 the regulation governing plywood was announced and on June 28 the one governing gypsum paper liner was announced. All of these regulations were made retroactive to the 1st of June. On July 2, Mr. Wyatt announced his intentions to issue regulations for premium payments to cover hardwood flooring, of both northern and southern producers; cast-iron soil pipe and fittings, and convectors—extended surface. Now that the OPA bill has been passed Mr. Wyatt will probably go ahead with these plans, making them retroactive to the 1st of July.

Mr. Speaker, keeping in mind that the Wyatt program calls for the construction of 1,200,000 houses in 1946, let us see what has actually been accomplished by all of these orders and regulations. The announcements from the NHA are indeed optimistic. They tell us that they have given permission for the construction of 576,721 new houses and apartments during the period from January 15 through June 28. These figures sound big, but they bear little if any relation to the realities of the situation. Our thanks are due the National Association of Homebuilders for giving us a factual account of how the program is proceeding—or should I say receding? According to a Nation-wide survey conducted by this professional organization less than 10 percent of these authorizations, or "starts" as Mr. Wyatt calls them, have resulted in completed dwellings. We all know the normal length of time needed to complete a house is somewhere in the neighborhood of 3 months. After 7 months of what is supposed to have been an all-out effort, made with practically unlimited powers, most of the projected houses are still on paper—very few have been actually built. Let me give a few examples from the survey: From Baltimore it is reported that of 287 permits or priorities granted, "starts" have been made on only 83 and none has been completed. From Denver, out of the 104 priorities issued all houses are under construction but only 3 have been completed. From Portland, Oreg., of about 4,000 priorities granted, only 1,500 actual "starts" have been made, and less than 100 have been completed. And so it goes throughout the entire Nation. In all cases builders reported that shortages of materials are responsible for this terrific bogging down. It is the failure of the administration, specifically of Mr. Wilson Wyatt, to secure and assure an adequate flow of building materials that has brought this condition about. He was given all the powers he requested, but still he is not doing the job.

Mr. Speaker, the eagerness with which the subsidy funds were sought, and the promises made when they were secured, have not been justified by the use made of them so far. This is probably the result of red tape more than economy; it seems to take about 3 months to start the money rolling out, but once started it flows freely. Under the regulations that have been promulgated by Mr. Wyatt there is plenty of opportunity for arbitrary action and gross favoritism, and you may be assured that the most will be made of these opportunities.

Mr. Speaker, the housing shortage is with us still. The entire construction industry of this Nation is in shackles. There are shortages and severe ones in the field of building materials. Seven months of tight control by Mr. Wyatt have accentuated these shortages instead of alleviating them. Mr. Wyatt has been generous in issuing his paper permits, but he has failed to get needed materials produced and properly distributed. In this connection it is interesting to note that the whole administration-sponsored housing program was first outlined in a letter from Mr. Chester Bowles to Wilson Wyatt on January 11, 1946. It is significant that in stressing the political importance of the program Mr. Bowles wrote: "Housing is the most important single issue facing us at this time. If we muff it, it will snow us under."

Mr. Speaker, the snows are already descending because housing is not being provided for our veterans. The houses are still on paper.

Uncle Sam and Loans Across the Sea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, today I bring to the attention of my colleagues an editorial by Mr. Herman Geiske, editor of the Parkersburg News, Parkersburg, W. Va. The statement deals with the effect of foreign loans and gifts upon our economy and their contribution to inflation, high prices, and scarcity. The article is timely, deals clearly and forcibly with one of our most important problems, and is directed particularly to the attention of the younger voters, including the veterans of World War II:

UNCLE SAM AND LOANS ACROSS THE SEA

For the benefit of the younger voters, including war veterans, who have come of age since those hectic times back in 1932 when the Nation was fighting the backwash of World War I, it is evident that the entire record of the New Deal will have to be brought back into remembrance. Then these voters will be able to see how that New Deal, from start to finish, was a pattern of futility and failure. Failure to recognize the basic foreign causes of the depression constituted one of the New Deal's gravest blunders. Naturally, the New Dealers did not like to admit, in those days, that the peace settlement consented to by Woodrow Wilson at Versailles had sown the dragon seeds of an impending World War II, even though in 1933, and the years immediately following, the war clouds were discerned by statesmen, both here and overseas. So they failed to perceive the war coming in time to get ready for it. The first battleship was not authorized until 1939 and we were in the war almost before it was ready for combat. The full responsibility for unpreparedness rests upon the New Deal for they had full control of both Houses of Congress in all that period.

Now that the war is over and we are facing a period similar to that after World War I, it is interesting to note how the New Dealers have changed their theories about foreign trade. Back in 1932 they were denouncing with howls of indignation the fact that world trade had been created by private loans of international bankers to foreign nations and concerns. They pointed out that many of these loans were defaulted, causing the ruination of not a few Americans who held those foreign bonds.

But what is going on right now?

Instead of private capitalists lending large sums to foreign nations for their rehabilitation, it is the United States Government which is lending the money and taking the risk—at the expense of the pay roll taxpayers. Just stop for a moment and figure out how that works. Let us say that $50 is taken out of a man's pay envelope by the United States Government in the run of a year. That $50 is then lent to a foreign nation. The money is spent by the foreign nation partly in the United States, and partly elsewhere. Let us say that $25 of it comes back and is spent in the United States for United States goods. Then the loan is defaulted. Who loses? The worker, for he is now taxed a second time to make up the loss of the original $50.

That is the process the New Dealers were squawking about back in 1932. They said it merely created the illusion of prosperity. That sooner or later such a bubble would burst, as it had in 1929. But in those days it was the private financiers who took the rap. It was their money which had been risked, not the taxpayers' money as it is now.

How many taxpayers realize that since VE-day the United States has loaned more than $8,000,000,000 to foreign nations. And this is in addition to an exchange reserve of $7,000,000,000 built up in our country by foreign concerns in payment for goods imported into the United States during the war. Thus foreign nationals and countries have over 15 billion dollars of United States money to spend, and it's our money.

And that isn't the end of it. The New Deal is going blithely ahead lending additional billions through the Export-Import Bank, and the Bretton Woods pipe line to all nations in the world hasn't even started to operate yet. When that arrangement gets going United States taxpayers' money will be siphoned overseas at a rate that will make Big Inch look like a trickle.

And all of this will be in competition with the desires of the American people for goods they long have been deprived of. The New Dealers were right back there in 1932 when they said that lending a foreign customer the wherewithal to buy in our country was a poor way to develop foreign trade. The practice was condemned by many Republicans, who noted, however, that under a free economy the American private financiers could lend to whom they chose, at their own risk. The United States Government's stability was not involved.

The intent of the New Deal is plain to be seen. They want world trade to be booming when 1948 rolls around, and it will be, probably on the huge foreign loans already made. But it will all be, in the end, at the additional expense of the American taxpayers.

Foreign nations have found America a good thing. When we lend we are Santa Claus. When we ask payment we are Shylocks. But in their hearts they must be contemptuous of the statesmanship of a nation which permits its resources to be dissipated so lavishly and recklessly. And many of the young GI's who have fought the war so gallantly and victoriously will be amongst those called upon to pay the taxes in future years.

The British Loan and OPA as Seen by a Veteran

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, from a veteran, Phil Wood, with 42 months' service with the Navy, and who is now publishing and editing a newspaper at Bangor, Mich., come the following articles:

PHILLING IN
(By Phil Wood)

Last week-end's long-overdue action in Congress to squelch labor racketeers, end strikes, and bring the Nation back to a semblance of sanity is the first good news I've seen since Japan quit. Particularly fitting, too, that it came just prior to Memorial Day.

Even so, I'm afraid that this, the first peacetime Memorial Day, was pretty much of a mockery.

If the spirits of the thousands of gay, brave young men who gave their lives for this country are watching the scenes today, they must feel bitter indeed. I hope they can't see, I hope they don't know of the futile mumbo-jumbo their so-called leaders have made of what was supposed to be a brave new world.

A lot of good men died in this last war, as they do in every war. None of them wanted to die. None of them wanted war. Not more than a handful of them even wanted to be in uniform. They didn't understand what had happened other than that their country had been bungled into another war. They were told they had to fight and fight they did, better than any other nation or group of nations that opposed them.

In that fight, they died. Those boys won't be back to the homes they fought to save. They won't come back to the equal opportunity to work, to live, to love, to raise a family that politicians are so fond of ranting about. They died, they thought and hoped, so that their families, their friends and buddies who did get back could enjoy those things unhampered by the whims and oppression of dictatorship.

Thousands more came home, to a hospital, where they will remain, helpless, hopeless, battered and crippled for months, years; dragging out a miserable existence at the mercy of callous, clumsy, incompetent, and uncaring attendants. If you're in doubt about that last I'll be glad to argue it with you personally. I saw the workings of the Navy's biggest and best hospital at Great Lakes at first hand. Guys who lived through the Army's medical mill tell me it was the same deal.

But we won the war. The enemies who supposedly pointed daggers at our national heart were completely and convincingly defeated. The world returns to peace. Our victorious armies came marching home, and with them came the spirits of the men who died.

I hope those spirits didn't stay. I hope they weren't here, standing sadly by on this first Memorial Day, the day set aside in their honor. Or if they were here, I hope they couldn't see what we see: their country's government run by white-livered weak-kneed nincompoops; their Congress filled and controlled by petty, greedy grafters who place their own reelection above all else; their families and buddies at the mercy of labor racketeers who flourish because our Government lacks the guts to slap 'em down.

Their former allies busily and happily engaged in the international game of making a prize jackass out of Uncle Sam; the burden of feeding, clothing the world saddled securely on American taxpayers; the islands, outposts, and frontiers they fought, bled, and died for handed meekly back without a murmur; their military leadership still fumbling blissfully along 20 years behind reality, quibbling as usual in its vicious caste system over rank and precedence; a wartime monstrosity of OPA, "holding the line" of least resistance, bringing scarcities, bootlegging, graft, and petty red tape.

But why go on? You know the picture as well as I do. I hope the guys who died weren't here to see it on their first Memorial Day.

But if they were, wouldn't it be wonderful if one of 'em could get to Washington to talk to his President, his Congressmen, his Senators? It would only take a few minutes. Just long enough for him to say:

"Lissen, you numbskulls" (he'd use a better term than that) "I bled to death on Tarawa with six Jap machine gun slugs in my belly while you sat home safe on your fat behinds. I didn't get my guts shot out so my kid brother would have to pay dues to some beady-eyed crook who can't talk English before he can get a job; so my girl would have to know a guy who knows a guy to get a pair of stockings; so my mother would have to run all over town and beg to get a pound of butter. I'm not tryin' to grow daisies out there in that stinkin' sand so Stalin and Churchill and their strong-arm men can make a monkey outta the old U. S. A. another time.

"I helped take Tarawa; my buddies took a lot more o' them blasted islands; we don't figger the kids next door oughtta have to go back and take 'em again.

"We carried the ball for you; wheninhell are you gonna get the lead out of your pants and do a little ball carryin' of your own?"

Wouldn't you like to see and hear a speech like that in Washington? I would. If it could happen, maybe next Memorial Day we wouldn't have to be ashamed.

PHILLING IN

(By Phil Wood)

This seems to be a bad week. They go that way sometimes. For a while it looked as though everything would straighten out, but now our durn Congressmen and Senators have been at it again.

It's the British loan and OPA I'm sputtering about, case you haven't guessed from the introduction.

That loan affair really burns me up. I can see no justification of it whatever, now, or any other time. It's useless to do a lot of wailing about it, but remember the time old Churchill said, "Give us the tools and we'll finish the job"?

Well, blast him, we gave him the tools and then finished the job, too. Now that we'll be paying for what we've given away so far for the next hundred years or so it surely doesn't make any sense to me to add another gigantic debt for American taxpayers to sweat out.

Sure, the British did some heavy fighting. Sure, they were bombed plenty. But, confound it, we didn't come out of it untouched either. How about the ships, the men, the materials and the rent we've paid for the use of British bases?

It's just as reasonable to me to turn around and hit England for a "loan" to replace the American Navy ships that were sunk at Pearl Harbor.

But, it's done. Voted by the men who are supposed to be smart enough to represent the best interests of our country in Washington. I hope they are that smart. As far as the British are concerned, they've put over another fast deal and are entitled to some sort of credit for it. If now that they have the money they'd split it evenly among the men and women who actually did the fighting, it might do some good.

OPA I'm not sure about. The new program that seems due for enactment at present isn't quite as bad as the previous hodgepodge, but it's still disconcerting to think that this Nation collectively must be told what can be sold for how much.

Possibly such a thing is still needed, if it ever was, but I doubt it. It's a complex problem, confusing to guys much smarter than I ever hope to be, but some parts of it are so simple that only a fumble-witted bureaucrat can fail to see through it.

Take butter for example. For a long time, Bangor stores could not meet the demand for butter. Hidden subsidy payments of tax money kept the price somewhere near normal, but the supply was still short.

Came the end of the OPA and subsidies and price climbed steadily. But, as the price went up, the demand decreased. Last week, local stores had plenty of butter, at 80 to 90 cents per pound, and sold very little. When the creamery truck came around they didn't buy any more and the truck went back with nearly a full load.

That sort of thing makes sense to me, even though it doesn't take 40 or 50 uncivil nincompoops and a lot of office space to administer the program with triplicate forms to be filed no one knows where. It's as simple as A, B, and C. When the price of anything gets higher than people will pay, it won't be long until that price comes down to what they will pay.

And, if it will work for butter, it seems to me that it will work for everything else, eventually. That's why I'm sorry to see any sort of OPA system forced back on us until the old law of supply and demand has had a chance to get to work.

It's true that living costs have gone up alarmingly. It's true that today's high wages mean very little when they still won't buy much. But, as long as people are suckers enough to pay too high prices, those prices will stay too high. They'll come down when people kick and don't buy, and not until.

But, that's only my opinion, and as such certainly isn't worth much. It'll be interesting to see what the wise guys in Washington will come up with this time.

Senator Swift, of Alabama

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, July 27 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Senator From Alabama," published in the Alabama Local Government Journal for July 1946, in which very fitting and high tribute is paid to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. SWIFT], who happens at the present time to be the distinguished occupant of the chair.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SENATOR FROM ALABAMA

Governor Sparks could not have made a better choice in filling the United States Senate vacancy caused by the regrettable passing of Senator John H. Bankhead had he spent months and gone over each mile of territory within the State in search of a person for the seat.

ROBIN SWIFT is everything that a State could want in a Senator. He is able, progressive enough and fearless. He will dignify the place that was so ably filled by Alabama's greatest statesman for 16 years.

For 14 years the editor of the Alabama Local Government Journal and Senator SWIFT have been close friends—political and personal. We have differed at times in our political views and reactions, but always this editor has had the highest regard for his opinion and respected his position. We had a hand each time in his election to the State senate. We shall never regret it, for he is in every way a great legislator.

Unfortunately, the Members of the United States Senate will just commence to know ROBIN SWIFT and appreciate him for his fine intellect and his tireless study of knotty public questions when his term of office will expire. This is regrettable. He should be allowed to spend years in the Senate. There he would leave a record from which both Alabama and the Senate would benefit.

We have never heard ROBIN SWIFT deliver an address or make a speech that we thought would win votes. He is not that kind of statesman. But we have heard him—each time we heard him, in fact—when he talked real sense; when he spoke real logic. Alabama has never sent a better trained or more experienced public figure to the National Senate. We doubt if one so experienced has ever gone there to represent this State.

In the State senate, ROBIN SWIFT has been an alert and zealous progressive-conservative who seldom gets out in front and rarely has been sensational. When the time was at hand for a penetrating, carefully worded question to demolish the opposition, Senator SWIFT was there. He has always been a man who feels deeply, thinks clearly, speaks with restraint, acts vigorously, and does not compromise. Once this editor wrote him taking him to task for opposing a governor then in his "honeymoon period" with his legislature. His opposition was so sharp and carefully directed as to almost defeat a piece of legislation that we thought advisable. He promptly wrote us explaining his reasons for opposing the pending legislation. We shall never forget the closing words of his letter. They were: "* * * I cannot compromise my views—my honest convictions—even for the friendship of your friend, the governor." ROBIN SWIFT never compromised a conviction in the years that he spent in the State legislature.

On the floor of the United States Senate, ROBIN SWIFT will be quiet. But he will be a conscientious worker in committees and exceptionally clever in detecting jokers in bills. He will be a painstaking worker. He knows the art of legislative draftsmanship and manipulation. He will be in the Senate only 5 months, but in those months he will leave his mark.

Our Ex-Presidents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER FERGUSON

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, July 27 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Our Ex-Presidents," written by Clarence J. Root, of Highland Park, Mich. Mr. Root was born in Springfield, Ill. He has always been greatly interested in the life of Abraham Lincoln. He has been a student of the lives of our Presidents, and has prepared a very able review of the record of 24 Presidents who lived through their terms and became ex-Presidents. There has been considerable discussion as to what our Presidents should do after they leave the White House—whether they should engage in public life, in business, or in professional activities, or whether they should merely rest on their laurels. I believe that this document is of such importance to the public generally that it should be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR EX-PRESIDENTS

(By Clarence J. Root, Highland Park, Mich.)

There has been considerable discussion as to what our presidents should do after leaving the White House. Should they engage in public life, business, or professional activities, or merely rest on the laurels of the past? Let us review the records of the 24 presidents who lived through their terms and became ex-presidents.

Our first President, General Washington, declined consideration of a third term. After the strenuous years in the Army and as President he was anxious to return to Mount Vernon and resume the life of a gentleman farmer. From his own writings we find that during the forenoons he rode around his farms on horseback. Dinner was at noon; after dinner, a walk and tea. There were guests at Mount Vernon almost daily, many of them strangers. Washington spent much time going over his correspondence, and kept a diary, with very complete weather records. During 1798 he journeyed to Philadelphia. He was met with escort troops and other military honors en route, and at Philadelphia dined at some home every day. On December 12, 1799, several hours were spent in the saddle, exposed to cold and snow. The next day he was attacked with quinsy and acute laryngitis, and died on the 14th. General Washington was 65 when he left office. He lived 2½ years.

Although John Adams was one of the older of the presidents at the time of his retirement his was the distinction of living longer (25 years) than any other and to the greatest age (90), and he lived a year after his own son became President. His retirement was spent at Quincy, Mass. Adams was not wealthy but was comfortably situated. He devoted himself to his family and the care of the home acres. There were 13 grandchildren. Much time was spent in reading, and he wrote somewhat. Mr. Adams was clear minded to the last, and the old fighting spirit never left him. His written statements show very decided opinions. When past 75 he still rode at times, and at 85 could walk 4 or 5 miles over the rocky hills, but his sight finally became impaired and the walking was given up early in 1826. On July 4, 1826, the town was celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence. He sat in his chair muttering "Thomas Jefferson still survives," but Jefferson had died earlier the same day. Thus two signers of the Declaration of Independence, both past presidents, died on the same Fourth of July.

Thomas Jefferson refused the request of the legislatures of five States to consider a third term. He retired at 65 to spend the remaining 17 years of his life at his country estate, Monticello. People of prominence from all parts of the world came to consult the sage of Monticello on questions of economics and politics. At times there were as many as 50 overnight guests. Although retired, his influence had diminished but little. He worked to improve the government of Virginia and its educational system, and to encourage better methods of agriculture. A large part of his time was devoted to correspondence. Jefferson planned and established the University of Virginia.

Because of his overgenerous maintenance of position while President and the demands made on his hospitality afterward he died a bankrupt. Relatives, invited guests, and strangers stayed for weeks and even months. A national subscription brought $16,500, and his beloved books were sold to Congress for $23,950. The money was paid to his creditors. At 65 Mr. Jefferson was on his horse 3 or 4 hours daily, and several times each year made a 90-mile journey on horseback. Death came July 4, 1826, at the age of 83, just 50 years from the day he made famous in all history. His old political rival, former President John Adams died the same day. Only Madison and John Adams lived to a greater age.

After retiring from two terms at 66, President and Mrs. Madison (Dolly Madison) spent 19 peaceful years on their estates of Montpelier, Va. He discussed social and moral questions, education, and slavery, was interested in farming, and wrote much on all topics of public interest. Mr. Madison attended the State constitutional convention of 1829, but he avoided participation in political affairs. His lavish hospitality, large number of guests, and the expensive gentleman farming nearly ruined him financially. During his retirement President Madison was never in robust health for any continuous period, and toward the last was rather severely afflicted with rheumatism.

James Monroe, like his Virginia predecessors, retired to his country estate, Oak Hill, in Loudon County. He was then 66. In 1825 Lafayette and President J. Q. Adams together were his guests. Monroe was a regent of the University of Virginia, and Madison named him chairman of the 1829 Virginia Constitutional Convention. Monroe and Madison were very devoted friends. In his later years he experienced financial difficulties. Congress voted $30,000 to reimburse him for expenses in the public service. After the death of Mrs. Monroe the former President sold Oak Hill and moved to New York City to reside with a daughter. He died a year later on July 4, the third President (President Coolidge was born July 4, 1872), to pass away on Independence Day, and all within 5 years. His retired life lasted 6 years. In 1858, the centennial of his birth, his remains were reinterred with solemn ceremonies at Richmond, Va.

At 61 John Quincy Adams presumably had retired from public life but his district in Massachusetts elected him to Congress, where he remained until his death 19 years later. Senator Bennett Champ Clark has said of J. Q. Adams, "A congressional career which for brilliance, devotion, and service perhaps was never excelled in our legislative history." Mr. Adams lost both sons after leaving the Presidency. In 1843 he visited Niagara Falls, and then proceeded to Cincinnati to lay the cornerstone of the Astronomical Observatory. The trip was one of triumphal progress, and there were special honors at the public reception in Buffalo. He suffered a stroke of apoplexy on the floor of the House, February 21, 1848, and died 2 days later.

Of all our Presidents Jackson was the oldest at retirement, 70, but he lived 8 additional years. He took a lively interest in all public questions. His home was a mecca of politics; there were numerous visitors. From Washington the General returned to his home, "The Hermitage", Nashville, Tenn., where he busied himself restoring and improving his plantation. For the most part his last years were quiet and uneventful. General Jackson was ill a considerable portion of his later years.

Martin Van Buren was the unanimous choice of the convention for reelection, but was defeated by Harrison in the election. He remained a figure of national importance and was active in expressing his political views. In 1844 he received at the convention 13 more votes than a majority, but the two-thirds rule lost him the nomination. In 1848 Van Buren was the candidate of the Free Soil Party. General Taylor, the Whig candidate, was elected President. Following the election Mr. Van Buren traveled 2 years in Europe, and returning in 1855 lived quietly at the old home in Kinderhook, N. Y., except for a trip through the country. He was 58 when his term closed and 79 when he died.

Vice President Tyler succeeded Gen. William Henry Harrison when he died in 1841, 1 month after his inauguration. In 1844 Tyler was nominated at an irregular Democratic convention. However, he withdrew from the race. From then until the Civil War he held no public office, but his opinion on public questions was sought and the ex-President was in much demand as a speaker. He was president of the Peace Convention which met in Washington February 4, 1861. In May, Tyler was elected to the provisional Congress of the Confederate States, and later to the permanent Congress, but he died before it met. The 16 years of his retired life were spent on a 1,200-acre estate on the James River in the county of his birth.

James K. Polk was 53 when he left the White House. He was taken ill within a few weeks after returning to his home in Tennessee, and died at Nashville in June.

Gen. Zachary Taylor died suddenly after serving 16 months and the term was completed by Millard Fillmore, who was 53 when he retired and lived 19 years beyond that. Mr. Fillmore made two or three visits in Europe where he had personal interviews with Queen Victoria, Louis Napoleon, the Pope, and other crowned heads. In 1856 the American or Know Nothing Party nominated him for President and later the nomination was accepted by the Whigs, but he received the electoral vote of Maryland only. Thereafter he took no public part in political affairs, but was always deeply interested. When President-elect Lincoln passed through Buffalo in 1861, Fillmore was chosen to greet him on behalf of the city.

Franklin Pierce spent the winter following his retirement in Madeira, with Mrs. Pierce, and then journeyed on to Europe. They were absent 2 years. The trip was quiet and unostentatious. The winter of 1859–60 was at Nassau. Mr. Pierce deemed it due to the high office he had held not to engage in business. His time was spent at his home in Concord, N. H., with reading and the care of a small farm. He supported the North when the war broke out. They had lost all three children previous to his time in Washington. After the death of his wife in 1865 he seldom left New Hampshire. He was 52 at retirement and lived 12 years after.

Except Jackson, Buchanan was the oldest President at retirement, 69. He resided at Wheatland in Pennsylvania, where he spent much time in correspondence and in writing a defense of his administration. Buchanan took a lively interest in public affairs, and announced his support of Lincoln's administration. He died after 8 years in retirement. President Buchanan never married.

When Lincoln was assassinated in April 1865 Vice President Andrew Johnson became President. He served all but 1 month of a full term, and retired at 60, living 6 years as an ex-President. At the Democratic National Convention in 1868 he received on the second ballot the second highest vote. After returning to his home at Greenville, Tenn., he spent some time traveling through the South and meeting the people. In 1869 Mr. Johnson made public addresses in the State campaign, and that same year missed election to the United States Senate by one vote in the legislature. In 1872 he was defeated for Congressman-at-large, but in January 1875 was sent to the National Senate. He died in July of that year.

At the close of General Grant's second term in 1877, then 54, he made a tour of the world. Mrs. Grant and their son, Jesse, accompanied him. They returned in September, 1879. On this trip he was received with distinguished honors in Europe, then visited India, China, and Japan, receiving more honors on his return. In 1880 he went back to his old home in Galena, Ill. This same year an effort was made to secure for him nomination for a third term. Grant led for many ballots; had over 300 votes for 36 consecutive ballots. He then became active in the campaign for Garfield. Visits were made to Cuba and Mexico in 1880 and 1881, and in the latter year the family moved to New York City, buying a home there. The following year Grant served as American Commissioner to draw up a Treaty of Commerce with Mexico.

He became a partner in the firm of Grant & Ward, but took no active part in its affairs. All of his available funds, $100,000, were invested. The firm failed in 1884, and an unsuccessful effort was made to hold Grant personally liable. He surrendered all his property to satisfy the creditors. In 1885 Congress restored him to the rank of General, and retired him on full pay. He worked on his memoirs enduring great suffering from cancer of the throat, hoping the sale would provide funds for his wife. The manuscript was finished shortly before his death, and the royalties restored the fortunes of the family. During June of 1885 General Grant went to Mount McGregor, near Saratoga, N. Y., where he died on July 23. His life as a former President lasted 9 years.

At the close of his administration President Hayes returned to Fremont, Ohio, being then 58 years old. He possessed enough property to live in ease and comfort, and derived much pleasure from his spacious grounds. The house was a center of social life and never long without guests. Mr. Hayes engaged in no business or professional activities and took no active part in politics. He was a trustee of Ohio Wesleyan University and Ohio State University, president of the National Prison Reform Association and the Slater Educational Fund, and engaged in various philanthropic enterprises. The former Civil War officer attended the reunions of his regiment and also, when invited, other reunions; and delivered numerous addresses on Memorial Day and other occasions. His days were fully occupied with reading, historical studies, a heavy correspondence, and the improvement of his estate. He passed away at the age of 70 after 12 years as an ex-President.

President Garfield died 6 months after his inauguration and Vice President Arthur succeeded to the Presidency. He was 54 at the end of his term, and resumed his residence in New York City. In 1884 Arthur's name was presented for renomination, but Blaine was nominated. Arthur lived 2 years as an ex-President.

Benjamin Harrison, the grandson of President William Henry Harrison, was renominated in 1892, but was defeated by Cleveland. After March 4, 1893, then 59, he returned to the practice of law at Indianapolis. In 1893 and 1894 he delivered a course of lectures at Stanford University. Later he was leading counsel for Venezuela in the Anglo-Venezuela Boundary Commission, a member of the Peace Conference held at the Hague and of the International Board of Arbitration. Harrison wrote This Country of Ours, Views of an Ex-President, and some magazine articles. A number of public addresses were made, including one in Paris. For a pastime he enjoyed duck shooting. He lived 8 years after leaving the White House.

The only President to serve two terms not consecutive was Grover Cleveland, who retired from his first term when he was 52 and from the second at 60, living 11 years after the final retirement. The party nominee in 1888, he was defeated by Benjamin Harrison and then resumed the practice of law in New York City (1889–93). At the close of the second term he settled permanently in New Jersey. Mr. Cleveland delivered an annual series of lectures on public affairs at Princeton, and wrote a number of articles on important questions. He was a trustee of Princeton University, and in 1905 was a member of a committee representing the majority stockholders of the Equitable Life Assurance Co. Cleveland made annual hunting trips, and fishing trips, too. At Princeton his mail occupied the forenoons. In the afternoon callers were received and there was a drive or walk. The evenings were devoted to writing and games. He published Presidential Problems and Shooting and Fishing Sketches after retiring.

Theodore Roosevelt, although serving nearly two full terms, was the youngest (50) at retirement of any of the Presidents, and probably the most active as an ex-President. He became President through the death of McKinley. A few months after his successor's inauguration Colonel Roosevelt went to East Africa on a 10 months' trip to hunt big game and collect specimens. Europe was visited on the homeward journey, where a number of public addresses were made, and he represented President Taft at the funeral of King Edward VII. After his return he became a contributing editor of Outlook magazines and made numerous public addresses. Colonel Roosevelt was a candidate for President in the 1912 Republican Convention. Taft was nominated. An improvised Progressive Party nominated Roosevelt, but Woodrow Wilson won the election.

On October 14 Mr. Roosevelt was shot by a maniac at Milwaukee. He continued his editorial work on the Outlook and wrote his autobiography. In 1913 Roosevelt journeyed to South America to address numerous learned bodies and to secure specimens in the jungles of Brazil for the American Museum of Natural History. He determined the course of an unknown river through 900 miles of wilderness. The trip was full of hardship and peril and Roosevelt became very ill. In 1916 he and Mrs. Roosevelt visited Trinidad. He refused the nomination of the Progressive Party and supported the Republican nominee, Charles Evans Hughes. During the World War the former President offered to raise a division of volunteers and serve as one of the brigadier generals. Throughout the war he was intensely active and interested in public and political affairs and in the conduct of the war. Addresses were made for the Liberty Loan and the Red Cross, and he wrote in magazines and newspapers on war participation.

Mr. Roosevelt was never free from recurrent attacks of the jungle fever contracted in South America. He died January 6, 1919, at the age of 60. His principal works comprise more than 30 books, of which more than one-half were published after his retirement as President. Colonel Roosevelt's home was at Oyster Bay, Long Island, where he is buried.

President Taft was renominated in 1912, but Wilson was elected. In 1913 Mr. Taft became Kent professor of law at Yale University, lecturing on constitutional law. He was interested in international peace and devoted much time to lecture engagements. During the World War he was joint chairman of the National War Conference Board. In 1921 President Harding appointed him Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court. In 1922 the Chief Justice visited England. His summer home was at Murray Bay, Canada. Because of illness he resigned in February 1930 and died the following month. Seventeen years had passed since he ceased to be President, from age 55 to 72.

Woodrow Wilson served two full terms, leaving the Presidency when he was 64 years of age. Mr. Wilson was an invalid when he retired. He lived quietly in Washington for 3 years. His activities were confined to motor rides, visits from friends, and a weekly visit to the theater. His first public appearance as an ex-President was at the burial of the Unknown Soldier, November 11, 1921.

The death of President Harding made Calvin Coolidge our Chief Executive. On leaving the White House Mr. and Mrs. Coolidge returned to Northampton, Mass., where they purchased a new home. Together they made a trip to the Pacific Coast via the South. The Autobiography of Calvin Coolidge was written after retiring. For a year the former President contributed a daily short article for newspaper syndication. He became a director of the New York Life Insurance Co., and in 1932 was made chairman of a nonpartisan commission to investigate the plight of the railroads. During the 1932 Presidential campaign Mr. Coolidge made an address at Madison Square Garden, New York, and later made a radio address. He died suddenly in his home, 4 years after retiring, and at the age of 60.

Ex-President Herbert Hoover left the White House at 58 and returned to his home at Stanford University, Palo Alto, Calif. He has busied himself with his papers, made several trips to directors' meeting in New York City, and has enjoyed some motoring and fishing trips. During the present campaign he has made a number of addresses that have been broadcast by radio. In 1934 he published The Challenge to Liberty.

It will be seen that, in general, the earlier Presidents were inclined to retire to their homes and forego business and professional activities, and many of them took no active part in politics. In later years the ex-Presidents have been more active. On the average our Presidents retired at 59 and lived 11 years afterward.

The Future of Economic Liberalism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, July 27 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address entitled "The Future of Economic Liberalism," delivered by Hon. Wendell Berge, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, at the annual meeting of the National Lawyers Guild in Cleveland, Ohio, on July 6, 1946.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FUTURE OF ECONOMIC LIBERALISM

It is gratifying and reassuring to meet with a group of lawyers who think in terms of law as an instrument of special service. The history of progress in society is a story of struggle for better law. We do not achieve improvement merely by recording a vote of the people. Their will must be reduced from political principle to a legal rule or an institution. It has been one of the tasks of lawyers to translate the aspirations of our people into law, and into living institutions.

All too often lawyers become so preoccupied with individual practice, with the technical problems of particular cases, that they lose sight of the broad social significance of their calling. I take it that one of the principal functions of the National Lawyers Guild is to sound repeatedly a clarion call to lawyers to use their profession to serve the ends of a broader social justice.

Lawyers are constantly exposed to the danger of becoming impediments in the way of society's forward march. We are trained to revere precedent. The processes of abstract logic which we follow in much of our work may, if we are not alert to the danger, lead us far afield from modern realities. Sharp critics have called us "quasi-supernatural medicine men" and "political theologians." We have been called "a privileged, parasitic class."

That the suspicion directed at lawyers is not entirely without justification, we must in candor admit. But the admission should not lead us to repudiate our profession, but rather should it spur us on to more determined effort to fulfill the great opportunity and crying need for lawyers with conscience and social vision.

I know that I am speaking tonight to men and women who believe that liberalism in political and economic conviction is not incompatible with devotion to the law. Liberalism is difficult to define and limit because it is a continuing attitude toward problems of government, rather than a fixed code of principles. But one fixed and unalterable purpose of liberals is the support of democracy, not as a mere form of government, but as an underlying philosophy with deep spiritual meaning. Thomas Mann, who has had an ample experience with other forms of government, warns us that every definition of democracy is insufficient, but proceeds to give us one of the best working definitions as follows:

"We must define democracy as that form of government and of society which is inspired above every other with the feeling and consciousness of the dignity of man."

In 1910 Woodrow Wilson pointed out to the bar that Americans had reconstructed political society and that the liberal movement of the future would concern itself with the evils in our economic society. If we look understandingly at the liberal movement of the present we see, as Wilson predicted, that it is concerning itself more and more with economic rights and privileges than with political rights and privileges. Our generation is groping toward an economic bill of rights that will protect our people from irresponsible exercise of economic power, just as past generations worked toward the constitutional bill of rights which has long restrained the irresponsible exercise of political power.

In this liberal movement Woodrow Wilson set the task of lawyers in these words:

"In every deliberate struggle for law, we ought to be the guides, not too critical and unwilling, not too tenacious of the familiar technicalities in which we have been schooled, not too much in love with precedents and the easy maxims which have saved us the trouble of thinking, but ready to give expert and disinterested advice to those who purpose progress and the readjustment of the frontiers of justice."

There have been few times in history when men could be so conscious as they are today of working and living in the first hours of a new age. The world is slowly emerging from a war unequaled in its dimensions and shattering in its effects. Strange and complex developments in science, in society, and, indeed, in nearly all phases of our intricate civilization require the highest order of our ability.

In this respect the aftermath of World War II involves many more difficulties than were present in 1919.

We know that it is given to this generation to make momentous choices for good or ill. We must work toward lasting peace or we shall risk incredible devastation in a war fought with atomic weapons, rockets, plagues, and other instruments of mass destruction. We must discover democratic solutions to new economic and political dilemmas or we shall jeopardize the existence of democracy itself.

In this transition the United States has a responsibility and an opportunity which are unique. On the economic level, especially, our role is critical. The American economy is the greatest productive unit in the world. Our success in utilizing this industrial power for the attainment of our own prosperity will exercise a major influence off the health of the world economy.

Moreover, what happens in the American economy will determine the fate of economic liberalism, both in our own country and abroad. If this Nation, with its tremendous economic potential, its tradition of economic freedom, its creative imagination and know-how, cannot demonstrate in peace the capacity to provide full production, full employment, and rising standards of living, economic liberalism as we think of it will perish.

Nearly every other major industrial nation, either because of the impact of war or because of continued inability to resolve an economic crisis, has lost faith in economic liberalism, abandoned free enterprise, and adopted some form of a managed or controlled economy. It is therefore crucial for those of us who adhere to the economics of a free society to have a clear grasp of the ends and means that are necessary to make our economy work. We must also have a distinct understanding of the conditions and trends which most seriously threaten the survival of the system of free enterprise.

There are many who feel that the die is already cast. They believe that the age of enterprise is over, that we can no longer expect enterprise to assure an expanding economic life, and that consequently we must inevitably accept the displacement of free economic institutions by the blueprints of a managed economic system. They point to the current perplexities of reconversion, to the disputes between labor and management, to the action of other countries, and to the confusion in economic thinking, to support the contention that we are also on the way to a controlled and closely administered economy.

Unless we have irrevocably succumbed to economic fatalism, a moment's reflection will dispel any belief that the disappearance of enterprise is either inevitable or desirable. If enterprise disappears, it will do so because we have failed to overcome the trend to monopoly. If economic liberalism is permitted to fail, it will be because the American people have ceased to be vigilant in the safeguarding of their economic rights. If the economic basis of liberalism in society is undermined, we may well sacrifice the whole structure of our cherished liberties. None of this need come to pass if we are firm in our determination to eliminate those conditions in our industrial life which constitute the great barriers to our future economic growth.

It would be a grave error to underestimate the serious and formidable tasks involved. The rising power of monopoly in the American economy has acquired proportions unprecedented in our history. Unless this power of monopoly is checked, we shall be compelled either to submit to economic planning by the monopolists themselves or to exert complete political sovereignty over economic affairs. In either case liberalism would cease to exist as the guiding philosophy of our Nation.

Let us review some history. From the time this Nation was established until shortly after the Civil War it had perhaps the freest economic life of any country in the world. There was a continent to discover, towns and cities to build, industries and inventions to create and to perfect. Opportunities of every nature far exceeded the capacity of those who sought to exhaust them. But in the seventies and eighties the American people became really concerned with the growing problem of monopoly, and this national concern culminated in the passage of the Sherman Act, which we recognize today as the American charter of economic liberalism.

But notwithstanding the Sherman Act, and as a result of failure to enforce it, many fields of industry have come under the domination of powerful and concentrated economic groups. The needs and pressures of the First World War accelerated the growth of economic concentration, so that in 1919 it was already apparent that monopoly in its many guises had come to be America's economic problem No. 1.

In the following decade the American economy ran the gamut of boom and bust. Again, because we had become tolerant of mergers, deluded by size and unalert to the significance of monopoly power, the antitrust laws lapsed almost into disuse. Wave after wave of consolidations swept over industry. One agreement after another eliminated competition, or fixed prices, or divided fields of production. It is common for us to think of the twenties as preeminently a period in which enterprise was unrestricted. Actually this was far from the case. What happened was that one field after another came under the domination of the industrial giants. When activity in the formation of cartels and combines had reached an all-time high, the free market had been so thoroughly weakened that it collapsed under the crushing weight of restrictions.

All of us are familiar with the sequel to this era of consolidations. The great depression had both economic and political effects. Not only were millions of people impoverished and deprived of economic hope and opportunity, but industrial expansion practically ceased. Desperate expedients were adopted both here and abroad to revive industry and to give employment. When World War II began, this country had not yet completely recovered from the effects of the depression. Nevertheless, when the American people were called upon to produce and to fight, they proved once more to the world that the genius of freedom, once it had been marshalled, was invincible.

The time has now come when we must assess in unequivocal terms what has happened to the American economy during the war. We know that it is within our power to avoid the mistakes of 1919, but we also know that it is immeasurably more difficult to do so. The reason is not far to seek. A careful and precise study of economic concentration in World War II has recently been published by the Small Business Committee of the Senate. Its conclusions are so startling and its implications are so clear that they leave no room for surmise. The concentration of economic power in the hands of a few small vested groups is today higher than ever before in our history.

How did this happen? It happened because when this country went to war and sought to mobilize industry, it was compelled to turn to the industrial giants as the source of war materials. It has long since become public knowledge that the severe shortages of critical materials and the enormous difficulties which we experienced in the production of many strategic goods at the outset of the war were traceable directly to monopoly and cartel control. Restriction after restriction on the full use of our resources was uncovered. Time after time we became aware of planned scarcity in essential materials, and almost invariably such scarcity could be attributed to the presence of cartel and monopoly interests. Because competition and independent enterprise had been eliminated in so many fields of industry, Government had no choice but to call upon monopoly. In many cases it was necessary for the Government to create whole industries which monopoly had prevented from coming into existence.

Inescapably, small business suffered a severe set-back in the process of war production. As early as 1943, President Truman, as a member of the Senate investigating the national defense program, pointed out that while at the beginning of the war 175,000 firms provided 70 percent of the Nation's manufacturing output, and 100 large corporations produced 30 percent, this ratio had been completely reversed, so that 100 corporations accounted for 70 percent of war and essential civilian contracts, while 175,000 small companies had been reduced to a mere 30 percent of the total output. More than 500,000 small business concerns disappeared during the war years.

Now, as this country turns to the building of a peaceful and prosperous world, we find that the shadow of monopoly overcasts our economic future. Where industry after industry was ruled by an industrial giant before the war, it is now dominated by a colossus. The 250 largest corporations now hold roughly two-thirds of the Nation's usable manufacturing facilities. These same 250 corporations either own or are in a position to control facilities equal to those of all our manufacturing corporations in 1939. Sixty-three of the largest manufacturing corporations have sufficient liquid assets to purchase all of the usable Government-owned facilities or to purchase the assets of 71,000 small corporations. That such a development is already under way is apparent in the sharp rise in the number of mergers and acquisitions. In the last quarter of 1945 there were more mergers and acquisitions in manufacturing than at any time in the previous 15 years. This consolidation movement spells further reduction in the number of independent concerns and increasing concentration of control in major manufacturing industries.

Much the same condition holds true if we consider wartime developments in science and technology, nearly all of which promise to have peacetime applications. Because the bulk of our industrial research before the war was fenced in by cartels and monopolies, it was necessary for the Government to use the means at hand when wartime research was undertaken. As a result 68 top corporations received two-thirds of the value of Federal research and development contracts and the top 10 corporations received nearly 40 percent of all wartime research contracts. This means, in effect, that the few entrenched groups which dominated research before the war and carried on the great bulk of industrial research during the war now have further control and know-how. We have come to recognize that access to technology is of primary importance if small business is to have an opportunity to enter the market and to develop. Yet we must face the fact that unless some means are found to provide small business with the chance to acquire know-how or to develop new inventions, it will be almost impossible for new concerns to compete.

I referred earlier to Thomas Mann's definition of democracy as Government inspired with consciousness of the dignity of man. How can this consciousness exist if so many are dependent on so few? A statement which I read in the New York Post a few days ago, from the pen of Francis E. McMahon, crystallized this aspect of the question:

"The curse of monopoly is not primarily that it can rig prices as it sees fit, or because it can regulate production for the sake of higher profits. These are but symptoms of the real cancer, which consists in depriving individuals of the economic power essential to their dignity as human beings. It is not a free but a servile state, in which the many are wholly dependent upon the few who own and control. This is hardly like the American dream."

Monopoly groups in our economy, as I have already noted, today control a greater proportion of raw materials, of plant facilities, of research, and of financial power than at any time before the war. The real significance of this condition is not so evident in reconversion, nor will its effect upon employment and production be felt in the period immediately ahead when industry is producing goods to replace the shortages of the war years. The real question threatening the American economy is whether high levels of employment and production are to be maintained after the immediate demands are met. It is then that the American economy either will begin genuine peacetime expansion or will begin to contract. We shall then know whether we are once more destined to experience the severest fluctuations of the business cycle. That point in our history will be crucial, and it is not far off. Unless independent concerns can come into being, can enter the market, can gain access to the new technology, can produce without fear of monopoly retaliation, can sell products at prices that are not fixed, there will be scant hope of avoiding a severe depression.

If we are to reestablish the conditions upon which a system of free enterprise depends, if we are to look forward to expansion rather than depression, if we are to maintain and to increase opportunity for all the people, then we must begin now to undertake corrective action. In this matter time is all too short.

What can we do? In specific terms, it will be necessary to undertake an antitrust program of far greater proportions than is now pursued. Our present facilities are grossly inadequate as to funds and personnel, and this situation must be corrected if we really mean business. It will be necessary to give every possible aid and assistance to independent enterprise. It will be necessary to maintain constant vigilance against the attempts which will be made by powerful groups in our economy, either to exempt themselves from the operation of the antitrust laws or to frustrate the free market by collusion.

I believe that this course of vigorous enforcement of the antitrust laws and encouragement of small business is in complete accord with the desires and interest of the American people. It is a remarkable fact that in nearly every postwar program set forth by public agencies or private groups there is complete agreement on the necessity of vigorously enforcing the antitrust laws. This recognition reflects the underlying feeling of the American public, as indicated by polls in which 85 percent expressed support of antimonopoly measures by Government to strengthen free enterprise.

In the light of these facts, it must be said bluntly that American liberalism must now meet its most arduous test. Liberalism is not an economic dogma designed to benefit "the smallest part and least proportion of humanity," but is rather the set of attitudes that seek the best interest of all the people. Liberalism fosters variety and independence, and encourages criticism. In these qualities lie the hope for economic progress and the protection of the public against the abuse of economic power. In these premises is the surest guarantee that can be given of steady economic development in our society.

The performance of the American economy during the war, and our present capacity to produce and to consume warrant the belief that this country possesses a tremendous scope for future economic growth. Opportunity for individuals, for new firms, for new industries and new techniques, is the key to this development. But there will be neither growth nor opportunity unless we are able to prevent the further concentration of economic power, and eliminate the grip of monopoly on enterprise. The American people have never undertaken a peacetime venture in which their fortunes and their welfare were more directly at stake. Upon the outcome will depend the fate of economic freedom, and with it the existence of liberalism in this century.

American Legion Address by Lt. Gen. George E. Stratemeyer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OLIN D. JOHNSTON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, July 27 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by Lt. Gen. George E. Stratemeyer before the convention of the American Legion of South Carolina, at Greenville, S. C., July 22, 1946.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and legionnaires of South Carolina, it is a real pleasure for me to speak at this State convention of the American Legion. Perhaps I should use the word privilege instead of pleasure, because it is through active organizations like yours that our great Nation, which so recently fought and won the conflict just over, can prevent another such war. Only by bringing before the citizens of the country the necessity of always being prepared, can we accomplish this aim. As I stand before you today, I know that I am speaking to a group, who, during the war just over, served our country in or out of the armed forces. I know and the public knows, that you did a splendid job overcoming great hardships during the severe trials and battles that finally brought us victory. The combined war effort of our Nation through active joint participation of the land, water, and air team won us a great victory.

You Legionnaires here today, represent a true cross-section of veterans from all three of the services. Many or most of you have only recently exchanged your uniforms for civilian dress. It is satisfying to know that by your presence here as members of the American Legion, you have not laid aside your interest in the military or your interest in the welfare of our Nation. Many of you are engrossed in the job of making your place or regaining your place in the business world. You have transferred your leadership from the military to the civilian, but I am certain that from your experiences in this past conflict, you have individually resolved to keep alive your interest in our armed forces for national security. Your position as civilians and veterans is unique. You will be looked to for guidance in the problems of national defense, and I urge you to stress to those who don't know—or worse yet—to those who don't care—the importance of maintaining a strong land, water, and air force—particularly an air force—in order to insure a lasting peace. I do not say "particularly an air force" just because I am an airman, I say it because like all of you, I am once again enjoying the American way of life and like all of you, I want to continue to enjoy the fruits of what we all fought for. It can all be summed up in five small but all important words—air power is peace power.

This is the great fundamental change that has come out of the war. We have changed our concept of the globe. We have recognized a change in the relation of nations to each other. With air power, as we demonstrated so forcibly in Europe and again against Japan, we have changed the strategy of modern warfare. Although it required an invasion to bring about the unconditional surrender of Germany, Japan was brought to her knees without the landing of a single unit of infantry in the Japanese homeland. But air power has changed even more than the strategy of modern war. Modern aircraft capable of flying 10,000 miles nonstop loaded with atomic explosive guided missiles, robot planes, all these have changed the tactics of modern warfare. Things that were commonplace during the recent war seemed like a Jules Verne story 10 years ago. Recently, in Arizona, a test rocket fired by our ordnance people reached a speed of over 3,000 miles per hour. Push-button warfare may seem like a comic-strip idea, but may well be a real kind of war in the not-too-distant future. No longer can we think of defense in terms of borders or frontiers. Our frontiers are everywhere. We cannot defend our industrial might by having a military base at Hawaii, a strong naval base at Guam and 16-inch guns on the east and west coasts of the United States. We must defend our new frontiers—frontiers of the skies—with air power. The future routes for air attack between America and Europe or Asia will be over the North Polar regions. Electronic navigaton units and technique, present day antiweather controls, and the present-day high level of flying efficiency by all major nations, insure the success of such missions.

We have today an Air Force of approximately 400,000 men. This is the number of men that the Army Air Force requested Congress to allow them as a basic force. With an adequate Air Reserve and Air National Guard, a force of 400,000 highly trained specialists in aerial warfare should be sufficient for our peacetime Air Force. However, in our Air Force today, only 75,000 are trained pilots, navigators, bombardiers, and technicians. These figures will indicate to you how important it is that we wake up now. It seems impossible that we as a people, did not learn the bitter lesson that war subjected us to during the past 5 years.

There are, I know, many men, both in the armed forces and in public life today, who plead our cause for being prepared. However, the general public must also be informed of the facts, and it is through groups like yours that our mission can be accomplished.

In my capacity as commanding general of the Air Defense Command, I am charged with the mission of organizing the integrated air defense system of the continental United States. In order to accomplish this mission, the Air National Guard and the Air Reserve have been placed under the supervision of this command, together with various units of the Regular Army.

The Air Defense Command will train personnel in the most advanced methods of air defense, and maintain units in readiness to perform such special missions as the commanding general, Army Air Forces, may direct. Thousands of well trained technical Air Force personnel were maintained throughout the war years to insure our adequate air defense system. Since the end of hostilities, most of these men and women have returned to their peacetime occupations in fields of endeavor foreign to any of those they learned in the Army. Pilots, mechanics, radar operators, electricians, engineers, and other specialists who have been discharged will want to avail themselves of the opportunity to keep their hand in work similar to that which they learned through Army training. These technicians are facing a period of stagnation that becomes a problem of national importance inasmuch as they are losing their ability through inactivity. This makes it evident that the necessity is great for an adequate air training program during the peacetime era.

The proposed Air National Guard will be comprised of 12 wings, 27 groups, and 84 squadrons, manned by approximately 59,000 officers and men, and equipped with over 2,300 planes of the latest type. If present plans are approved and accepted by the 48 States, and indications are that they will be, the Air National Guard will have 79 air bases with at least 1 squadron based in each State and the District of Columbia.

The Air Reserve program calls for 170,000 officers and men to be assigned to 34 groups and 225 squadrons located at approximately 130 bases throughout the country. The Air Reserve will be initially provided with approximately 2,800 of the latest type planes. We have already commenced the activation of the first 40 bases of the Reserve program and by the 1st of the month flying will have commenced in earnest.

In order to supervise the training of the Air National Guard and to train the Air Reserve, we have six Regular Army Air Force Headquarters within the Air Defense Command. These Air Forces are: the First Air Force at Fort Slocum, N. Y., the Fourth Air Force at Hamilton Field, Calif., the Tenth Air Force at Brooks Field, San Antonio, Tex., the Fourteenth Air Force at Orlando, Fla., the Second Air Force at Offutt Field, Omaha, Nebr., and the Eleventh Air Force at Harrisburg, Pa.

I might add at this point that South Carolina is located in the area of the Fourteenth Air Force, which is commanded by Brig. Gen. Leo. A. Walton. General Walton is an outstanding and understanding officer who will conduct his portion of the Air National Guard and Air Reserve Program with the utmost efficiency. He is anxious to assist all members of the Air National Guard and Air Reserve in any way possible, and should any of you listening to me have any problems in which you think he may be of assistance to you, just write him a letter. General Walton and his staff will make every effort to help you. I might also add that he will welcome any suggestions or constructive criticism you may be able to present to him, and I hope you do this whenever possible.

We believe our organization is sound and that we have a good strong framework to start with. Right at present, we have a vast pool of potential Air Guard and Air Reserve men with World War II experience. However, these men in a few short years, through physical limitations, age and other factors, will have to be replaced by younger men.

This brings up an important subject. The youth of today must be kept air minded and must have sufficient facilities at their disposal to become trained flying and technical personnel. This cannot be done overnight but in conjunction with civilian schooling and civilian occupations, some time should be devoted to this air and technical training by the youth of today.

I have already seen tentative plans for aviation and preflight courses in the secondary or high schools of this country, and this is exactly what we need.

If the different States and municipal departments of education would sit down with the Civil Air Patrol in their immediate vicinity, or a similar civilian aviation organization, and work out a series of introductory aviation courses for boys and girls of high school age, it would indeed be a long step in the right direction. We must educate the youth of today in air power, for he is the airman of tomorrow. I mentioned the Civil Air Patrol because it is now a recognized auxiliary of the Army Air Force and is a national organization. Its wartime record speaks for itself and in most instances, it would be the organization for the States and municipalities to contact when planning aviation courses for their secondary schools. There are of course, many other patriotic groups and individuals who are qualified to work with us in the planning of aviation courses in the high schools, and I would like to take the opportunity of extending an invitation to the States and municipalities, to solicit help from the Air Defense Command Air Force Headquarters in your locality when planning aviation courses for your high schools.

As I said before, I believe that the people of the United States, in keeping with the obligations of democracy, should be aware of military thinking and planning pertaining to our national safety.

The Army Air Forces must be allowed to maintain the highest level of research and development of any nation in the world. Even more important the great destructive power of the atomic bomb makes one-way operations profitable; and one-way flight is characteristic of rockets and guided missiles. The surest defense will be our ability to strike back quickly with a counter-offensive, to neutralize the hostile attack at its source, or to discourage any sustained effort by immediately destroying an aggressor's ability to wage war. Only one agency has the reach and speed to do this—air power. Given our air power, visible to other nations, and understood by them, we can look forward with confidence to the future. Had this country possessed an adequate air force in the early thirties, the story of the war would have been different—perhaps never fought. But too much economy was practiced, and appropriations for research and development by the Army Air Force were always pruned to a minimum, with the result that the development of our air power in the early days of the war was nothing short of a miracle. The importance of continuing research and development cannot be overemphasized. In the early thirties Germany spent seven times the amount of money that was spent by the United States on aeronautical research and development, and the results were obvious in their lead in jet propulsion, supersonic planes, and rockets. Germany, however, blundered in her concept of air warfare and never developed a strategic air force, and they were too late in developing jet propulsion.

We of the Air Force believe we know what should be done with air power in the interest of the security of our country, but whether it is done is out of our hands. It is in the hands of the War Department, of which we are a division, of the Bureau of the Budget, and the Congress.

Fortunately that means that it is actually in your hands and that you can help us in deciding the future of America's air supremacy. We believe that the Air Force should have a separate and coequal position with the Army and Navy. We believe such a coequal position is absolutely vital. It is vital because in order to develop new air weapons, together with the techniques and strategy of their employment, we must be able to proceed unhampered by surface thinking, either Army or Navy. The Air Force of 1955 must be built right now, for if war breaks out tomorrow—God grant that it won't—we must be ready yesterday with the latest weapons of air science ready to smash our enemies' war potential. This will be impossible if control of air power is vested in a number of Government agencies whose major responsibilities be in other fields. The officers and men of the Army Air Force will continue to work with the zeal and energy shown in the past to the end that their day-to-day efforts will contribute immeasurably to the advancement of air science.

We need the support of you Legionnaires of South Carolina, and the support of the Nation as a whole. Air power is not cheap, but it is the best national security insurance in the world today, and the cost of the premium is not excessive when the protective value of the policy is considered. It's a sound investment and I urge you to insist that the policy be written and never be permitted to lapse. In conclusion I should like to repeat one sentence which should become the slogan of every man, woman, and child in these United States. Memorize it and repeat it over and over and never permit yourself to forget it.

Air power is peace power.

I thank you.

Congressional Reorganization Is Not the Answer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. GWYNNE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. GWYNNE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the bill, S. 2177, for the reorganization of Congress has received wild acclaim in certain quarters. Their enthusiasm is often based on the claim that the legislative branch is somehow not functioning and is responsible for most of the ills which beset the people.

It is the time-honored privilege of a free people to criticize its lawmakers. Without it representative government soon languishes and dies. Nowhere has this prerogative been exercised with less restraint than in America. A visitor from Mars, reading the public press, or listening to radio commentators might reasonably conclude that Congress was useless, ridiculous, venal, vicious, and a stumbling block in the path of progress.

One columnist critic, in his zeal, proclaimed:

> Congress has remained a collection of 2-cent politicians who could serve well enough in simpler days. But the ignorance and provincialism of Congress renders it incapable of meeting the needs of modern government.

Others, not so intemperate in their language, say that Congress is not functioning and that it must be streamlined, whatever that may mean.

The special committee which prepared this bill has unquestionably worked hard and faithfully and has explored many suggestions for the betterment of the legislative process.

The purpose here is not to defend the Congress, but rather to suggest that its present difficulties are due to more fundamental and deep-rooted causes than its critics usually mention. It is not the failure of our national legislative body to function properly only a symptom of a malignant national disorder—a condition which threatens the very existence of free government itself? In other words, is constitutional government working in America? Or are we creating a condition under which any kind of popularly elected legislative body must each year become more impotent and eventually pass from the scene as it did under Mussolini, Hitler, and Stalin?

Some critics argue that the payment of better salaries and participation in a retirement system would result in more capable and independent Congressmen. But would it? A check of the roll calls over the years does not indicate that financially secure Members are more independent or courageous than those less fortunately situated. It is true that private industry pays more money in its important positions. This is a great help, of course, in getting capable people. But private industry also follows a different method in selecting them. It usually chooses its officials on their record of past performance and not on the basis of rash promises for the future. Better results in securing desirable Members of Congress will be accomplished by the following: First, more factual reporting of the real work of the Congress and less playing up of the sensational; second, effective "counter battery work" on the part of the general public against highly organized pressure groups; third, a greater interest on the part of the voters; fourth, shorter sessions.

In recent years, the number of large daily papers maintaining staffs in Washington has increased. The means of communication has been greatly improved. And yet there is less real reporting of the proceedings in Congress than in former days. Of course, thousands of words are written annually about minor things that are a bit sensational. Some of the witnesses appearing before the special committee pointed this out very clearly.

Then, too, the advent of the columnists and the radio commentator has greatly changed the picture. Many of them are propagandists, more interested in reader and listener reaction than in presenting the truth. Some of them serve a useful purpose; but they have not yet attained a sense of responsibility toward their public.

Any practical politician will tell you that pressure groups are factors to be reckoned with. Their interest in government consists largely in getting something for themselves—usually money from an already burdened Treasury. They are not primarily interested in better Congressmen; they want Members who will support their proposals. Generally speaking, it is still true that if a man builds a better mouse trap the world will seek him out and make a beaten path to his door. Nevertheless, he will not get the votes of the Amalgamated Order of Mice, who, after all, are not interested in better mouse traps, but rather in bigger and tastier free cheeses.

Inasmuch as these groups are in the minority, what is the secret of their power? The answer lies in their effective organization. They maintain lobbies in Washington, and through their publications they keep their dues-paying members advised as to what Congressmen are "going along." They get out lists of votes "against the people"—that of course being determined by a small group holding very fat jobs. On election day their program of rewarding their friends and destroying their enemies has defeated many a Member who is honestly trying to legislate in the national interest.

The practice of organizing minorities for the purpose of getting special privileges from government is almost as old as government itself. It had much to do with the destruction of the Roman Empire. George Washington warned against it. It is now one of the great threats to our future as a free people. The time is here when everyone must realize "that government is a watchdog to be fed, and not a cow to be milked."

Historians have often pointed out that the failure of the two-party system in any country foretells the failure of representative government itself. Recent years have seen a breaking down of party solidarity and party responsibility. Instead of a party platform of definite, sturdy planks on national policy, it now consists of bales of neatly worded promises to various groups—the whole tied together with the hope of patronage. Two striking examples were the 1944 platform of the two major parties. The Republican Party, at least, might well ponder the statement attributed to its great founder, Abraham Lincoln—that when two parties have the same platform there is no longer any need for one of them.

There is considerable justification for the claim often made that Congress is not functioning—is not performing the duties it was meant to perform. But is that not really due to the fact that we as a people and as a government are not carrying on as the Constitution intended? We are turning away from a government of constitutionally limited powers to one whose authority is, for practical purposes, absolute. Functions once carefully distributed among three independent branches are centralized in the executive branch. State and local governments are, through a grant-in-aid system, being stripped of their power—in effect, swindled by the use of their own money. Instead of a society based on individual initiative, on equality of opportunity, on personal responsibility, we are turning to a planned economy. It is very doubtful if any independent legislative body can be made to work in such a government—streamline it as you will.

The Congress was intended to be the policy making branch of the National Government. It was given broad powers, including the right to add to or subtract from the executive branch, and the most important right of all, that to appropriate money. Its first loss of power and prestige came when it allowed encroachments upon the rights of the States. For, as powers belonging to the States were taken away and brought to Washington, they went not to Congress, but to the executive branch. This was pointed out years ago by John C. Calhoun.

It is not possible for any legislative or policy-making body to write laws which will cover every situation that may arise. At best, only clear, definite principles may be laid down. In former days these general principles or laws were interpreted and built up by court decisions resulting from trials in which the people themselves had a right to be heard. So the interpretations tended toward the practical and took into account the day-by-day experience of the people who actually were affected by the law. Now laws are implemented and interpreted and applied in the multitudinous bureaus that infest the National Capital. Someone has said that from 1941 to 1945 there were issued an average of 152 regulations a day. These regulations are written by people sitting in offices in Washington, far removed from the scene of their application and often with no practical knowledge of the subject affected. Thus, instead of the law coming up from the trials and tribulations and experiences of a free people, it goes down from some cloistered bureau, and another long stride is taken away from constitutional government.

It is now the practice for groups getting into difficulty to look to the National Capital. Washington is quick to respond, and soon a "gentle rain of checks" descends as if from Heaven. Formerly this was our own money, but now, due to the large deficit, it is the money of our children we are so gaily spending. Of course, huge spending programs require a great array of employees. They have relatives and friends, and votes become involved in a big, big way. Soon the notion gets abroad that the success of a political party depends upon the amount of largess it is able to dole out rather than upon the soundness of the policies it advocates.

The net result of all this is that the Federal Government is constantly getting more control over the lives of the people. There is hardly an activity of the citizen with which the National Government does not meddle. It regulates the way he shall run his business; it may even, at any time, go into competition with him. It siphons off in taxes a large share of his earnings. It scales down the return on his investments; consequently, he cannot provide for his old age and must look to the Government for security. In a word, we are becoming a government of men rather than a government of laws. We have embarked on a planned economy—differing from that of Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin only in degree. If we call upon the Government to plan our way, we must also give it the power to make us walk in that way. In such a government, policies and decisions must be made by one man, or by those subject to his orders.

An independent legislative, or policy-making body is not needed in such a set-up. In fact, it only gets in the way. Then it is held up to ridicule and scorn by the new, self-annointed liberals. Eventually, it becomes atrophied from lack of use and passes from the scene. If you have any doubt of it, go back to your history books.

Shall we streamline Congress? First let us streamline our own thinking. Let us decide what kind of a government we really want. If we have the courage to return to the government envisioned by our forefathers, the rest will take care of itself. For an independent and efficient legislative or policy-making branch will emerge again.

Bellamy Says UNRRA Is Doing Fine Job for Displaced Thousands

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the seventh in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called A Trip Through Hell, and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

One of the most pitiful aftermaths of the European War is the horde of displaced, stateless persons and of refugees and expellees. I have seen any number of these poor human beings in camps where they are fed above the level of the civilian population, and ministered to as well as can be under the difficult circumstances of an unsettled Germany.

But I shall never forget the hopeless look in the eyes of many of them. They were brought to Germany against their wills as slave labor and came from all the countries of Europe. Many lost their families and most of them lost all their physical possessions. When Germany lost the war they were thrown onto the charity of the conquerers, and it should be a proud boast of the four great powers that they were not abandoned to their fate. Although no facts are really known as to the treatment these people received in Russia, it is believed that they have been treated on the whole much better by the British and Americans and even the French, although the French are no great shakes at charity.

According to a report of January 31, 1946, the then number of displaced persons in Germany was 208,978, including probably 197,490 not repatriable. That means that there were nearly 200,000 persons who could not be sent home because they had no home, and who would be a permanent charge on Germany unless some other home could be found for them.

POLES AND HUNGARIANS LEAD

Of those requiring repatriation, 98,378 were Polish, of whom 65,000 were judged nonrepatriable. Of Hungarians there were 77,243. These are the largest groups.

In the American zone of Austria, under the command of Gen. Mark Clark, the general conditions of which will be referred to in a later article, there were, as of April 1, 1946, 52,918 displaced persons. Many of these persons are Jews. One must never forget that Hitler made the extermination of Jewry one of his major political objectives and that he almost succeeded in it.

It has been estimated that the total Jewish population in Germany and the conquered countries which ultimately fell into Hitler's bestial hands totaled nearly 7,400,000 and that 6,000,000 were liquidated, leaving only 1,400,000 surviving. Nearly all are women without husbands, mothers without children, men without wives, and children without parents.

"Liberation," as the Plain Dealer said editorially the other day, "brought them freedom only from the gas chamber and the crematory—not from starvation, disease, and mass homelessness."

UNRRA DOING FINE JOB

We visited two camps for Jewish displaced persons and were greatly impressed with the efforts being made to bring some balm to the wounded hearts, some hope to the broken souls, and some light to the tired eyes of these poor people, largely from Poland, the Ukraine, and the Baltic States. One of these camps is outside of Weisbaden and the other near Salzburg, at Bad Gastein, a famous Austrian spa. The Salzburg camp is by all odds the most elaborate and best run. UNRRA had recently taken it over from the Army and seemed to be doing a fine job.

In fact, I should like to interject a remark here to the effect that UNRRA seems to be hitting its stride at last. It was much criticized at first because of the caliber of men who went over for it. Some seemed to be fellow travelers of the Russian Communists in their general outlook and others more interested in themselves than in suffering humanity. That has been largely eliminated, as some eliminated themselves and some were fired. The staff seems to consist largely of sincere, helpful people.

In the Bad Gastein camp the displaced Jews were housed in permanent buildings and there were schools from kindergarten up to high-school subjects for the children, with useful work for the grown folks to do, such as making their own clothes, tending gardens, etc. Furthermore, there was a program of recreation.

I am told that the condition of these waifs when first rescued was past belief. They were filthy, typhus ridden, on the verge of starvation, hysterical, and without hope. Surely, if there was ever a godly work it is that which has been accomplished in these cases.

WITH ONE VOICE: "PALESTINE"

We asked a group of adult Jews in the main recreation hall at the Salzburg camp where they wanted to go after the war, and with one voice they answered Palestine. They had made up their minds there was no other answer. They had seen enough anti-Semitism to last them the rest of their lives, and they feared that once the peace treaty had been signed there would be a recrudescence of it in their European homes. Other groups confirmed the universal yearning for Palestine, with a few dissident votes in favor of America, but I have yet to see one of these European displaced persons who wanted to stay in Europe. They had had enough of that.

Of course, the Jews are not the only displaced persons in Germany and Australia. There are many gentiles, too, but most of them can be repatriated.

There are still a great many prisoners of war in Germany, held by the American authorities and employed on road work, removing debris, etc. But there is never a sufficient number of guards, owing to the demobilization policy of the Americans. The result is that most of the prisoners of war sit in a stockade, awaiting the peace treaty which will free them; that is, unless they can be proved to have been criminally active Nazis.

One final word about the displaced persons. Babies have a way of being born no matter in what private trouble their parents get. Old people have a way of dying at the most inconvenient times, and many in the prime of life get sick at the wrong occasions. The living conditions of these displaced persons, even when under Allied care, are terrifically hard. Anything that can be done in the way of charity from America to ease their lot will surely be rewarded in heaven. The International Committee for Jewish Relief, which has been an able force abroad, is doing a fine job all along this line. Joseph S. Silber, formerly secretary of Ray T. Miller, when Miller was mayor, is prominent in this work in Vienna.

Limbs for the Amputees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. L. MILLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a letter I am sending to Surgeon General Kirk on the subject, Limbs for the Amputees.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the Government has fallen down on the job of furnishing suitable limbs for the military personnel who were unfortunate enough to lose a limb in this last war.

I have examined some of these limbs and they do not bear the mark of expert workmanship and experience. I have appealed to Surgeon General Kirk on several occasions urging that he make it possible for these men needing artificial arms or legs to go to a reliable, recognized, commercial artificial limb company so that they may get a limb which will be satisfactory and which they will wear.

I note that there are quite a number of amputees at both the naval and the Army hospital who have had limbs amputated as long ago as 18 months and yet they are not wearing artificial limbs. I realize some of these men may have poor stumps, carry some shrapnel, or have loose bone which may keep them from wearing a limb with any degree of comfort. I also know that many of these men have excellent stumps and ought to be wearing artificial limbs. These men complain that the limbs furnished them by the Government do not fit and that they cannot get the needed service from the leg shop which the Government maintains.

An individual that goes for a long time on crutches develops an inferiority complex, which is indeed difficult for him to overcome.

I am including a letter with my remarks, which I am sending to General Kirk in which I urge him to look into the problem of artificial limbs and make it possible for these men to get good limbs from a recognized maker of artificial limbs.

JULY 27, 1946.

Maj. Gen. NORMAN T. KIRK,
Surgeon General of the Army,
War Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL KIRK: Recently I made some visits to the military hospitals and had an opportunity to talk at various places including the Capitol to men who have had a leg amputated—most of them below the knee.

These men, as you know, are interested in having Congress pass legislation which will cause the Veterans' Administration to furnish them with a car. Some of these men have had their legs amputated as long as 18 months. I am wondering why they do not wear artificial limbs. I have examined some of the stumps. They seem to be in excellent condition. The men tell me that the legs furnished by the Government are not satisfactory; that they get no service from the hospital. May I suggest to you that provisions be made for these men to be given the opportunity and the right to go to a good, reliable commercial leg house and have a limb made which they can wear.

I speak with considerable concern and experience because 12 years ago, at the age of 42, I lost both of my limbs below the knee. I had several reamputations, but within 6 months, even before my limbs were healed, I was wearing two artificial limbs. For the past 10 years I have been able to do about everything I wanted to do with certain limitations.

It seems to me that the men at the hospital who have one amputation below the knee ought to, as soon as possible, be given artificial limbs properly fitted which they can use. They ought to be encouraged to use these limbs. I know from experience that they are not ever entirely satisfactory or comfortable and sometimes become very, very sore. I also know it takes a little backbone and intestinal fortitude under these conditions.

I urge you to look into the situation of the amputees and the type of artificial limbs which are supplied to these men. They ought to have the best. If they have that there seems to be no good reason why they should not wear the limbs and assume their rightful place in society.

I should like to have your expression as to whether these men might not be permitted to go to commercial leg concerns so they can be carefully and properly fitted.

With kindest personal regards, I am,
Sincerely yours,

A. L. MILLER,
Member of Congress,
Fourth District, Nebraska.

St. Louis Post-Dispatch Criticizes Russian Press Denunciation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM R. THOM
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. THOM. Mr. Speaker, the success of the United Nations will depend ultimately on the ability of the United States, Great Britain, and Russia to keep on a basis of cordial relationship.

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch has recently printed the following editorial in which it deplores the Russian press denunciations that blossom forth coincident with meetings of the representatives of the three countries to further the peace settlements:

WHAT RUSSIA SHOULD LEARN

As the conference of foreign ministers in Paris opened, it was accompanied by a chorus of denunciations of the United States and Britain from the Government-controlled Russian press. The Anglo-American allies are blamed for creating the existing diplomatic deadlock, for the paralysis of traffic on the Danube, and for feeling—ridiculously, according to New Times, the unofficial mouthpiece of the foreign office—that Russia could not have defeated Germany without their aid. Yet it is not so much what is said as the tone in which it is said—the tone of bitterness, of rancor, of downright hostility.

Surely, the Russian Government cannot suppose that an atmosphere of acrid diatribe is a proper one for the Paris conference, or likely to produce good results. It is true that Foreign Secretary Bevin spoke in a denunciatory vein at Bournemouth recently, but his tone was mild compared with that taken by the Soviet press. Bevin's was criticism by a man whose obvious intent in criticizing was to find a way and a will to compose the differences. The outbursts of the Russian press imply no such intent; their general effect is rather to represent the United States and Britain as being so impossible to get along with that cooperation with them is not to be expected.

The rest of the world has much to learn about Russia and it ought to be learning fast. It is also true that the Russian Government has much to learn about the rest of the world, and about getting along with it, particularly with the United States and Britain. There is a good deal of urgency about this, also. One of the first lessons that Russia should be learning is that friendly and reasonable discussion cannot thrive in an atmosphere of venomous denunciation—that there are two ways to criticize the actions of another country, one of them friendly, the other hostile—and that countries which are trying to get along as allies do not find fault with each other in a manner appropriate only to foes.

Premier-Marshal Stalin, Foreign Minister Molotov, the editors of New Times, Izvestia and Pravda, and other leaders of Russian thought and expression might ponder, with profit, the relations of the United States and Britain. These two nations have not always agreed. Sometimes they have disagreed violently. But for some considerable time now they have known how to disagree as friends, energetically, sometimes passionately, but always with the underlying knowledge of a mutual respect and liking and with a taking-for-granted that their emergence from dispute would be friendly.

What if, to the contrary, Britain approached its differences of opinion with the United States by issuing official statements denouncing this country as dictatorial, filled with false pride, impossible for a reasonable and self-respecting nation to get along with? What if the United States sat down to the conference table with Britain only after issuing a blast against the English in which disputes of the past as well as the present were gathered together to feed the fires of ill feeling? It would be impossible for the two countries to work together because they would have deliberately made it impossible.

The Soviet Government needs to realize that it has just as much reason to do its utmost to work together with the United States and Britain as the United States and Britain have to do their utmost to work together with Russia—no less, and no more. The stake all of us have in common is the continued existence of the planet we live on. If a few hot words left unsaid will contribute to that desirable objective—and they will—they will be words well unspoken. There is no proper place for recrimination among allies. There must be respect and reasonableness, or there is no alliance, only the shabby pretense of it.

Action, Not Words

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. BYRNES
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the Federal Government is broke. "It is in the hole" approximately $270,000,000,000. For that sum, you can buy 50 times over, at full assessed valuation, all of the real and personal taxable property in the State of Wisconsin.

I have heard no voice raised in this body against the extreme necessity of recognizing the enormity and evil influences of that debt nor against the imperative need of balancing our budget and reducing that debt. On the contrary, I have heard, from every source, noble words and phrases speaking in favor of those measures.

How different the actions from the words.

Already, as this Congress prepares to adjourn, plans are announced by some to fight for a reduction in taxes for the next fiscal year. Already, as time catches up with the Seventy-ninth Congress, bill after bill becomes law, each authorizing further drafts on a Treasury which is incomparably barer than Old Mother Hubbard's cupboard.

When are we going to appreciate that this Government has just fought the most expensive war in history? When are we going to realize that we have to pay the cost of that war? When are we going to face the terrifying facts of national bankruptcy?

There is no easy way to remove this millstone of a debt from around our collective necks. The way is hard and unpopular. It requires high revenue and decreased expenditures.

As individuals and as a government, we must tighten our belts and economize until it hurts. We cannot today afford the luxuries of a financially sound government. As a government, we must learn to live on the bare essentials until our financial house is in order.

The people and the States and the local units of government must unlearn the 15-year habit of expecting perpetual hand-outs from the Federal Government. Foreign governments must learn that this Nation has hit the bottom of the barrel. There is no money left in the United States Treasury for gifts and donations.

It is popular to advocate expenditures for one humanitarian purpose after another. It is unpopular to oppose such expenditures. But, there is more at stake than popularity. The welfare and integrity of our country and the maintenance of our form of government are at stake.

This is not the time to talk of either the reduction of revenue or of grandiose projects. We must maintain revenue; we must stop Federal hand-outs; we must pare expenses to the bone.

Stealing Canada's Water

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Daily Calumet of July 23, 1946:

STEALING CANADA'S WATER

A Canadian newspaper is fearful over the approval of an amendment to the proposed St. Lawrence seaway treaty by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that it claims would give the United States sole discretion as to how much water is to be diverted.

The Montreal Daily Star, in a recent editorial, aims directly at Chicago and its diversion through the drainage canal and asks: "Are we about to see a renewal of the controversy which shook the relations between this country and the United States in the early twenties?"

A further comment is: "The amendment would have no importance whatever if it did not affect Canadian waterways. The water diverted through the Chicago canal would not flow in that direction at all by natural process. It is water diverted from the Great Lakes and any volume of water allowed to escape from the Lakes to the Middle West river system necessarily lowers the level of the Great Lakes and the whole St. Lawrence system."

We admit their contention in reference to "natural process" but wonder whether they realize that many natural processes have been altered in nature's forces to conform to needs of civilization. When the Great Lakes were formed by glacial action there was not the great city of Chicago at the foot of Lake Michigan with millions of people requiring pure drinking water. Before cities and factories and farms were established on this continent there were no artificial dams, water-power generation and irrigation projects developed. Such processes are man-made—not natural processes—to serve humanity. It is a natural process for rivers to feed lakes but our Calumet River was reversed so that polluted material would flow out of, rather than into, Lake Michigan.

And in that section above quoted reading * * * "and any volume of water allowed to escape from the lakes * * * necessarily lowers the level of the Great Lakes. * * *" Could it be that the Montreal Daily Star is unfamiliar with the plight encountered recently by port cities of the Great Lakes as a result of the exceedingly high water level? Surely as a result of the damage done by the much too plentiful water those worried port cities would have welcomed means of water escape to solve their problems.

The editorial concludes with: "Chicago, with the support of other Middle Western States, once before tried to 'steal' the waters of the Great Lakes whose sources lie wholly within Canadian territory. It tried to do it then by legal process and was defeated. It should not now be permitted to do by subterfuge what it was denied the right to do legally."

There has been a lot of water over the dam since that legal decision—in fact, far too much in our almost record high-level Great Lakes—and there have been geologists telling of the cyclic low and high levels of those lakes and discoveries that Chicago's diversion rate prior to the legal restriction had virtually no effect on those levels. It was Chicago's hard luck that the restriction edict was rendered at the cyclic period when the Great Lakes level was low. From the testimony of experts it is apparent that Canada's waters will not be depleted by the diversion amendment and Chicago will again have polluted matter washed out if increased diversion is permitted.

Congress Reorganizes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Star:

CONGRESS REORGANIZES

Whatever else may be said of the record of the Seventy-ninth Congress, it has won a prominent place in congressional history through its passage of the much-debated congressional reorganization bill. In so doing it has confounded the pessimists who contended that the prospects of obtaining agreement at this session on this truly revolutionary measure were extremely slim. There was an incentive, of course, in the form of the provision for increased salaries and creation of a retirement system, but it would be unfair to attribute passage of the legislation to any such bait. The only reasonable conclusion to be reached from the high tenor of the debate is that the majorities in both Houses were won over to the plan by the persuasive case for reorganization made out by the able La Follette-Monroney joint committee.

The joint committee was confronted with a tremendous task when Congress directed it to make the first comprehensive study of legislative procedure since 1921 and to "recommend improvements in such organization and operation (of Congress) with a view toward strengthening the Congress, simplifying its operations, improving its relationship with other branches of the United States Government, and enabling it better to meet its responsibilities under the Constitution." The measure sent to the White House does not follow all of the recommendations of the committee, but it does provide for a substantial portion of the more important reforms urged by the group in its farsighted report.

One of the more drastic reforms which went through both Houses with relatively little change is the one which will reorganize a number of committee chairmen out of prestige-enhancing jobs. This is the plan for reducing the number of Senate and House committees through elimination of some and consolidation of others. In final form, the bill reduces Senate committees from 33 to 15 and House committees from 48 to 19. The District committees, incidentally, are retained, as the committee had recommended. This streamlining of the committee structure was rated by the joint committee ahead of all other changes in importance, in view of the fact that 90 percent of the work of Congress is done in a "committee workshop" that is inefficient and outmoded. The new alinement will eliminate most of the overlapping and duplication of functions which have handicapped committee work in the past.

There are many other proposed improvements in the congressional machinery, including a budget-balancing plan designed to keep appropriations in line with revenues. Senate and House disagreed on the amount of salary increases but compromised in conference on a $2,500 raise, and concurred in bringing their Members under a retirement system. Few persons will begrudge legislators these benefits, which, in the end, should make service in Congress more attractive to men of high caliber. Viewed as a whole, the congressional reorganization program should go a long way toward bringing Congress into step with the fast-moving age in which it plays so prominent a part.

New Deal Frustration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, less than 3 months ago, this Nation was in a turmoil due to strikes in which hundreds of thousands of miners and railroad men participated. There was a widespread, pent-up, specific demand that the Congress of the United States and the executive branch of the Government pass some legislation to make such future tie-ups highly unlikely, if not impossible.

I well remember that at a time when it seemed that the very stones would cry out for action, the President came before Congress and urged Members to pass a labor program which embodied many good points and some very bad points. This body passed the legislation by an overwhelming vote, but the legislation was bottled up in the Senate and never has emerged.

Still later, as you know, there did emerge what became known as the Case bill. This was the best possible piece of legislation that could be passed, in my humble judgment, and it would have gone far toward restoring some semblance of a balance between labor and industry, with resultant protection for the millions of consumers of this Nation.

This good bill passed both Houses of Congress and was sent to President Truman. He vetoed it at the urging of labor lobbyists. His action in this respect was recognized widely as a "sop" toward the CIO and other militant minority labor groups.

A little later, both Houses of Congress passed and sent to the White House the so-called Hobbs bill, which was nothing in the world but a law which restated the old laws against highway robbery. Confronted with this bill and its obvious, long-felt need, the President signed it into law. If he had not done so, in all likelihood the bill would have been passed over his veto.

The fact that he finally signed the Hobbs bill should not be viewed mistakenly by any citizen as a sign that this predominantly Democratic Congress and this Democratic administration has done anything at all about the need for labor legislation. The mountain again has labored and brought forth a mouse.

As everyone who is at all familiar with the situation knows, the Hobbs bill had been passed by this House again and again. Heretofore, it had been stalled in the Senate, but its enactment and signing into law was long overdue—at least 8 years overdue and likely much longer. As a matter of fact, if the New Deal had not had a majority on the Supreme Court and the executive branch of this Government had not consistently catered to a rapacious minority in the organized-labor minority, there would never have been a need for the Hobbs bill, for, I repeat, it merely reiterated, in effect, the law against highway robbery.

I would not dare let this Congress adjourn without restating this recent American labor history, because I, for one, am convinced that the people want the so-called Wagner Act amended in such a way as to take the heel of an organized labor minority off the neck of the American people.

As we all know, after all the hullabaloo and make-believe fight between the President and certain leaders in the railway brotherhoods in recent months, there still is no new labor law in existence which would make unlikely, or impossible, the recurrence of the economic stagnation which came about only a few short weeks ago.

John L. Lewis still can call his miners out on strike or give them permission to strike.

A. F. Whitney and Alvanley Johnston still can advise the railroad workers to strike and to paralyze the Nation any time they desire to do so.

The automobile workers still can walk out and break their contract without possibility of being penalized by the Government whenever they desire.

The steelworkers still can break their contract and bring slow paralysis to every segment of industry at any time they, or their leaders, please to do it.

Nothing — absolutely nothing — has been changed by this Democratic Congress and this Democratic administration to protect the American people against left-wing labor leaders who, if they desired, could band together and bring the greatest industrial machine on earth to a quick and disastrous halt whenever and however they please.

We have heard many speeches and read many statements from the President and other administration leaders about the necessity for a strong defense as a bulwark and as a threat to other nations.

We have seen a Democratic administration bludgeon the draft down the throats of millions of American parents who were opposed to it.

We have heard talk of increasing our forces abroad and of the necessity for continuing atomic research and research in every field of endeavor relating to war and preparation for war.

Yet, this Democratic administration—and I want the record to show it plainly—has let month after month pass without working for and obtaining legislation which would prevent one or two or three labor leaders from combining and halting our industrial machine. The only reason such a Nation-wide strike has not been held is because the labor leaders have not yet wanted to hold it—not because they cannot.

We are all cognizant, I am sure, of the fact that every once in a while Westbrook Pegler, or some honest union leader, comes out with a blast—fully documented—that Communists control certain unions. Always, when I read such disclosures, I ask myself one question: What if the Communists were to get in control of the biggest and most important unions? We know what their objective is—to overthrow this Government—and we know how slippery and slimy they are, and we must never discount the possibility that they can get control at the top of any union in America. I ask again: What if they should? Under existing laws they could do this Nation more harm by one strike than any known enemy could do in a year. They could render us immobile from a military standpoint at home, they could tie up our merchant ships, they could close down our mines, they could shut down our steel mills, they could virtually destroy this country from within unless there were swift, sure action. And in the confusion they might be able to seize the Government itself.

I am not talking about something that is far-fetched or recounting to you the bad dreams of a maniac. I am telling you that under existing labor laws, if the Communists were to get in full control at the top of only a few key unions, they could make this strong Nation a mighty weak Nation in a very short time. Even with all the laws in the world, we must be careful as long as the Communist fifth column marches in America. But without the needed laws, we must be vigilant eternally.

We Americans must remember that the commies are working while we are sleeping—that they are not thinking of making money, but of seizing power, that they do not dream of life in a better America, but of ruling in a Sovietized America.

When I return to my home, Mr. Speaker, you can depend upon it that, when asked what happened in Washington after all the hullabaloo in regard to needed labor legislation, my reply will be: "The Democrats put out a lot of beautiful words but, as usual, they failed miserably to perform."

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Gould Lincoln from the Washington Evening Star:

THE POLITICAL MILL

(By Gould Lincoln)

Congress, probably to the surprise of many of its Members—particularly those who do not believe in change—finds itself streamlined today as a result of the passage by the Senate and House of the La Follette-Monroney bill. The measure is designed to increase the efficiency of action by the legislative body, to eliminate a lot of the underbrush which has clogged the motion of the Senate with its 96 Members and the House with its 435.

Advantages which accrue from the new legislation are many. Principal among them are the reorganization of the committee structure of both Houses; the legislative budget, which will be worked out early in each session of the Congress; the overseeing of administrative agencies of the Federal Government by the streamlined standing committees, and the increased staffing of the congressional committees and the Legislative Reference Bureau.

The number of standing committees of the Senate is reduced from 33 to 15; of the House from 48 to 19. The jurisdiction of the new committees has been extended to cover the subjects which in the past have been in the hands of the larger number of committees. One of the most important changes is the creation of a single committee in the House and a single committee in the Senate to deal with the armed services, instead of having separate committees on military and naval affairs.

Whatever may be the fate of the pending bill to unify the services, the whole subject of national defense will be handled by the same committee in Congress—no longer will needs of the Army and of the Navy be considered in separate vacuums. Undoubtedly this decision of the Congress will have an important effect on the measure, which has been strongly supported by President Truman, for the unification of the services.

The legislative budget should go far toward keeping Federal expenditures and revenues within balance in the future. The budget will be worked out by the Senate and House Committees on Appropriations, the Senate Finance Committee and the House Ways and Means Committee, acting together.

If the expenditures, according to the budget, are to be in excess of the revenues, then provision must be made for increasing the national debt to the extent of that deficit—a stern check on the runaway facility of appropriating public money in the past.

In the recent past—and indeed since the 1880's when a single committee of the House originated both appropriation and tax legislation—Congress has gone ahead with its appropriations and left the revenue raising to catch up, if possible, a year or two later.

Attached to the bill is an increase in the compensation of the Members—from $10,000 to $15,000, $12,500 in salary and $2,500 in expense allowance. This increase is long overdue. With the income taxes of the Federal Government, plus the income taxes of the States, Members of the House and Senate have had little "take home" pay. Certainly a small amount when it is considered that the Members must maintain homes in Washington and in their own States, and, in the case of House Members, make a campaign for reelection every 2 years, and in the case of Senators, every 6 years. This increase in salary may have been the "sugar" which helped the bill finally to pass. Assuredly, it was not without its effect.

The history of congressional pay indicates the wariness with which the matter has always been approached. In 1850 the salaries of Members of Congress—which has been the same for Senators and Members of the House—was $3,000. After the Civil War, in 1866, the salary was increased to $5,000. Forty-one years rolled by before there was another pay increase—when in 1907 the salary was made $7,500. In 1925 it was boosted to $10,000, the figure for the present Congress, and now 21 years later it is proposed to go to $15,000 for the new Congress which comes in January 3.

Members have had a $2,500 expense allowance, during the present session. This is continued by the new bill and becomes part of the $15,000 compensation. When it is considered that labor generally received about $1 a day a half century ago and now receives $1 an hour for similar work, or perhaps more, the proposed increase for Members of Congress does not seem out of place.

The bill provides also a retirement pay system for Members of Congress who care to avail themselves of it by allocating 6 percent of their basic pay. They must have served at least 6 years and have reached the age of 62 to become beneficiaries.

The streamlining plan for Congress was worked out by a joint special committee, with Senator LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin, as chairman, and Representative MONRONEY, of Oklahoma, Democrat, playing the leading rolls. To them, and to Representative DIRKSEN, of Illinois, Republican whip of the House, must go the credit in large measure for the reform legislation.

Regulation W Should Be Rescinded at Once

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, I have made several talks, both in and out of Congress, during the last year on the subject of consumer credit and the infamous regulation W, which controls, regulates, and regiments consumer credit in the Nation.

This regulation was imposed upon the people of this country in wartime and no serious objection was raised. However, we are now at peace and this regulation should be rescinded in order that we might have fairness and justice in the distribution of credit facilities to the people of our country.

Furthermore, the regulation is hampering reconversion and will eventually be the cause of further serious distress among factory workers, consumers, and management alike, unless it is eliminated soon.

I am glad to insert into the RECORD, for my colleagues and readers of the RECORD, an excellent article entitled "Consumer Credit Rule" from the Chicago Journal of Commerce for July 19, 1946. The article follows:

CONSUMER CREDIT RULE

Having tasted consumer credit regulation during most of the war a majority of the Federal Reserve Board smacks its lips and asks for more of the same. The board's annual report calls upon Congress to grant permanent authority to regulate terms and conditions of this credit, as a means of softening the impact of cyclical swings.

The report has been issued piecemeal to the press and pending study of the section dealing with consumer credit only the views of those favoring permanent regulation are available in detail. The attitude of the minority can, however, be surmised in general.

The board minority's position will square pretty much with that of businessmen who believe that there is no right or economic reason for Government to dictate the conditions under which consumers shall acquire goods through the installment method. These businessmen are in the great majority, though there are a few who can work with such controls existing.

Regulation W, which was imposed in wartime to supplement other controls, was accepted by virtually all businessmen as unavoidable in the emergency. Most of them would like to see it liberalized immediately and dropped altogether in, say, a year.

The purpose of regulation W was to impose restraints on inflation but, as anyone can observe these days, it is not doing that. Its effect is to handicap the person who can buy only on time and favor the cash buyer. On the purchase of a new car, for example, regulation W requires a third down and the balance in 15 months, as compared with 18, 24, and even 30 months in the past. This means that the installment buyer of the lowest-priced automobile today must pay $85 or so a month, a sum beyond the ability of the masses to pay out of earnings.

While the regulation remains in effect, a more reasonable arrangement would be 25 percent down and the balance in 18 months. This liberalization would encourage sales of such goods as radios, which currently are moving slowly because the customer must put up $33 or more on console sets. In prewar times a $10 down payment was the rule.

The effect of regulation W now is to encourage the buying public to withdraw savings and cash E bonds. That procedure is helping the inflation spiral.

It can be doubted, therefore, whether permanent regulation of consumer credit, by which the Reserve Board would tighten the rules in boom times and relax them when a depression is in the offing, would accomplish the purpose of controlling cycles. The proposal is especially ludicrous when it is suggested that there might have to be Government subsidization of financing sales of automobiles to the unemployed.

Stevenson Antidisease Bill—H. R. 5715—Provides Foundation for Research To Discover a Cure for Cancer and All Incurable Diseases

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of cancer research. I have introduced H. R. 5715 providing for medical and scientific research to discover a cure for cancer, infantile paralysis, rheumatic fever, rheumatic heart disease, arthritis, brain fever, nephritis, pernicious anemia and all other so-called incurable diseases.

We Republicans have always recognized the need for a program of this nature. The Republicans favor the enactment of a sound bill providing the know-how to discover means of curing and preventing cancer and all other degenerative diseases. We feel it is humanitarian to support legislation which has for its purpose the establishment of research laboratories in this country to be staffed by the finest medical and scientific brains of the world whose determined effort it will be to find the cure for all such diseases that have been a scourge upon the human race for centuries.

In 1942 cancer alone killed 163,000 people in the United States. Deaths from cancer and other degenerative diseases last year numbered more than the deaths of members in the armed forces of the United States in the World War.

We built entire cities and employed more than 125,000 workers and scientists to develop the atomic bomb. The purpose of my bill, H. R. 5715, is to make possible the construction of research laboratories and medical institutions equipped with the most modern scientific machinery, where the keenest brains of the world may carry on independent research, with the sole purpose and determination of finding a cure for cancer, infantile paralysis, rheumatic fever, rheumatic heart disease, and the other so-called incurable diseases enumerated in my bill.

Mr. Speaker, good government is concerned with the greatest good for the greatest number. I have always stood for the highest precepts of government for the benefit of all. I am concerned with the fate of millions of our people who are doomed to mental and physical torture and death due to cancer and other degenerative diseases, sometimes called incurable diseases.

To discover the cure for cancer or any degenerative disease will mean the alleviation of untold mental and physical suffering for millions of people now living, and millions yet unborn.

Human beings must not be left to die without the concerted effort on the part of science, medicine, brains, and money to discover a cure for cancer and other so-called incurable diseases, such as infantile paralysis, rheumatic fever, rheumatic heart disease, Bright's disease, diabetes, arthritis, brain fever, pernicious anemia, arteriosclerosis, and nephritis, diseases that are the plague and the scourge of all mankind.

Mr. Speaker, on March 8 of this year I introduced H. R. 5715 in the House. My bill provides for the mobilization of the scientific resources of the entire United States, together with the best medical and scientific brains of the world, with the aid of the most modern research machinery and equipment, for the purpose of seeking the cause and cure of cancer, and all other degenerative diseases which I have herein enumerated. My bill, H. R. 5715, should receive the immediate favorable consideration of the Congress.

Address of Most Rev. Bernard J. Sheil, D. D.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS S. GORDON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by the Most Reverend Bernard J. Sheil, D. D., auxiliary bishop of Chicago, before the International Alliance of Allied Stage Employees and Motion Picture Operators (A. F. of L.) Convention, July 22, 1946:

When we think of the recent wave of great strikes, so lately settled, and when we think of the strikes now in progress, we cannot be too happy over the advance we have made in the United States toward a better society. Whatever may be the other reasons for the strikes, certainly the reason underlying all others is the general dissatisfaction of the worker with his share of the good things America so abundantly provides. In the past 12 years we have been blessed by social legislation that was sorely needed and that was enacted at a providential time. But, we see now, very clearly, that even this is insufficient. For the social frontiers of our society are as vast and uncharted in their way as were the geographic frontiers of our Nation in the eighteenth century. In other words, although we have admirable social legislation, it still scratches only the surface. What we need is fundamental social and economic reconstruction. And I mean fundamental in the sense meant by the Popes, from Leo XIII to Pius XII.

I realize full well that this is asking for a transformation not only in economics but especially in morals. I realize also that this is a process which requires many years. But this does not mean that we are to remain idle, waiting for the time when we shall suddenly find our minds freed from dusty and dangerous preconceptions. There are immediate issues to be dealt with, quickly and intelligently.

Such an issue is the OPA, now going through another straining process in Congress. No one with any feeling for people, no one with the barest knowledge of economics, will deny that OPA was a providential instrument for the ordinary people of our Nation. Yet, Congress waited until June 28, 2 days before the dead line, to pass a bill which extended the life of OPA for one more year. The popular revulsion at congressional indifference to the will of the people was aptly summed up by President Truman when he called it "a choice between inflation with a statute and inflation without one." The principal objection, of course, was to the Taft amendment, which "puts into (manufacturing) prices the profit per unit of sales which the industry received for that particular product in the year 1941." It is important to note, as the Commonweal says, that the Taft amendment did not choose any old year, but only 1941, "a wonderful year for profits, more wonderful than any year since, and 50 percent more wonderful than the very, very wonderful year of 1929." Generally, there has been an increase of 15 percent in the cost of living since OPA died. It is absolutely certain that, without controls, prices will rise fantastically. Perhaps the saddest facet of the whole OPA fiasco is that a considerable number of Congressmen are determined to make the next years very profitable for profiteers; at the same time, American labor has no intention of letting prices rise without demanding increases in wages. A new and more disturbing wave of strikes now seems unavoidable, and the blame will rest largely with Congress. All of this should teach us, for one thing, that politics and economics are very closely related. And we would be fools indeed to return to Congress men whose rank irresponsibility threatens the Nation with chaos.

As another means in the solution of our difficulties, I urge the passage of the 65-cent minimum-wage law. Even this would only give the workers concerned the magnificent sum of $26 a week, or $1,452 a year. It should be passed without delay. Although the figure is still substandard, it is nevertheless a step in the direction of a family living wage. As such, I believe, it has moral priority over other considerations. I wonder whether the opponents of the 65-cent minimum wage would like to live on $26 a week. I wonder whether the economic royalists and their lackeys realize that, even with this pitiful increase, the beneficiaries would still have to struggle for a bare existence. Since this legislation has been gathering dust in the House for many months, I think a deluge of mail and telegrams would at least momentarily arouse the reluctant Representatives from their indifference.

To quicken the coming of the good society, the guaranteed annual living wage is an absolute necessity. It is no dreamy speculation of impractical planners. It is likely that no other single measure would do more to bring about the traditional American dream of a social order worthy of man. It is a very obvious means of aiding men to achieve their temporal and eternal end as human beings and children of God. This alone gives the annual wage a sound moral justification. Certainly it would add to a stabilized family life. This would be a pure gain for us, since a strong family life is the basis of a healthy nation.

It is pleasant to note that all of the guaranteed annual wage plans now in operation in America were undertaken at the initiative of private industry. Farsighted businessmen have contributed much to the new plan.

Labor unions must extend their activities beyond a mere definition of wages and hours and the settlement of isolated grievances. Labor unions ought to participate in the management of industry. This is simply a question of the workers' rightful request for a voice in things that affect them vitally. Union-management cooperation is the extension of the principles of democracy into industry; it is an instrument through which all persons in industry participate at all levels in working out their mutual problems. Our fabulous wartime production is an amazing proof of the effect of unity and cooperation. A few outstanding American industries have made a start in this direction. Without any harm to anyone involved. I think Pius XI was referring to this when he said, "In the present state of human society * * * we deem it advisable that the wage contract should, when possible, be modified somewhat by a contract of partnership, as is already being tried in various ways to the no small gain both of the wage earners and of the employers. In this way, wage earners are made sharers in some sort in the ownership, or the management, or the profits. And again he is pertinent when he says, "Unless the various forms of human endeavor, dependent one upon the other, are united in mutual harmony and mutual support; unless, above all, brains, capital, and labor combine together for common effort, man's toil cannot produce due fruit."

Only those who are economically illiterate will oppose these proposals. They would be a sure means of achieving for millions of Americans that standard of living about which so much is said, but which is posessed by so few.

While we are trying to reach fundamental reform, morally and socially, let us not forget that the Congress of the United States has always played a large part in the sort of society we have. This is a relationship we wish to preserve. But, if we really wish to build a society in which Christian values are preserved and in which man can live as a child of God, then let us examine closely the kind of men we have in Congress. With unmatched stupidity, this Congress has consistently sloughed off the 21-point reconversion program of President Truman. Often consistency is a debilitating and vicious luxury which we can ill afford. We are witnessing a kind of national refusal of responsibility. A phenomenon which is not unfamiliar in this country. I hold no brief for either party, but I cannot refrain from expressing my astonishment at the excellent Republican record of some of our southern Democrats. There are some outstanding men in Congress, men of statesmanlike quality, of high intelligence, and with a deep concern for their country, but their number is not legion.

If we wish really to effect the reconstruction of society, we must examine our relations with one another very closely, and if we look at ourselves honestly, we discover that we need, basically, love for one another. I do not mean a sentiment that comes and goes with passing whims, but the steady flame of Christian love that animates all good souls. The world needs bitterly the love of men for men, the love of Chinese for Caucasian, of the Negro for the white, of the Pole for the Russian, of the Irish for the Jew, and the love of the American for all the world. Love is not for the weak, it is for the strong, for only the strong can quell the pangs of envy, only the strong can grapple with the tearing tenacles of hate, only the strong man can accept his brother on terms of honest equality without rancor, with the love of brother for brother.

And let us not talk of the brotherhood of man in loose, vague terms. The brotherhood of man is no mere political slogan: It is a reality. We are all brothers because we are all literally God's children. Without this basis, brotherhood is a mere catchword. Brotherhood is a living, pulsating reality; it is a real factor in our lives, which we can neglect only at great peril. The present state of the world is a prime example of what happens when men forget or deny their intimate relationship with one another.

We are alarmed, legitimately alarmed, at the divisions which have grown up among us Americans. Labor and management are still seriously divided; and the farmer is against them both, while the consumer is lost in the shuffle. We see Poles hating Russians, the Irish hating the English, the whites suspicious of the Chinese, and all united in hating the Jews and the Negroes, who return the hate. We see Irish-Americans gathering for various meetings; we see the Polish-Americans and the German-Americans, etc., gathering for their various purposes. But we see precious little of any of our people getting together simply as Americans. We need unity now as never before. But we shall not have that unity until we start to act as Americans without hyphens. Unfortunately, the most malicious weapon of division lies in the field of religion. I say malicious because theological differences, which should be argued on their own merits, have often been deliberately forgotten in the welter of misunderstanding and bigotry in which we have submerged ourselves.

It is true that many men in high places oppose all reforms because they do not understand the changes that are taking place. They are hawking the same old wares of political and social shoddy, and they are totally unaware that disaster threatens to engulf us all. Yet, these men are not the only enemies of progress. There are others more subtle, and therefore more dangerous. Some of these unhappily are in the labor movement. I refer, of course, to Communists. It is useless to deny that there are Communists in labor unions. But it is an arrant lie and hysterical nonsense to claim that all unions are dominated by Communists. However, the small percentage of Communists in the unions do bring immense harm to unionism in general. Communists generally are not interested in unionism. They are primarily concerned with the advancement of communism. Wherever Communist counsel prevails, labor suffers.

Nevertheless, I contend that when Communists attain leadership in any union, they do so only because of the apathy of the rank-and-file members. The average union member is morally bound to see that his union operates honestly and efficiently. His duty as a union member requires him to act always in the best interests of the union and of the Nation at large.

It might be asked why we are so concerned with the temporal aspects of man's life. Why do I, for instance, a bishop of the Roman Catholic Church, speak on these matters? Cardinal Saliege has indicated the answer briefly: "The kingdom of God is not of this world, but it is in this world that it is won. It is in this world that it begins, though it is in Heaven only that it has its plentitude."

The work of salvation begins here: A man's work, a man's home, a man's family have a very intimate bearing on the salvation of his immortal soul. We plead for economic and social betterment only to make it a little easier for men to enter Heaven. Man has a higher destiny than this earth. We want to help him achieve that destiny. That is why we hope for the realization of something that ordinary people have long dreamed of. They dreamed of a world where everyone would have everything necessary for attaining happiness. They dreamed of a world where destitution would only be a melancholy memory. They dreamed of a world where laughter and innocent merriment would replace suspicions and hate; a world where nations would live in harmony and prosperity. They dreamed of a world in which there would not be Anglo-Saxon nor Latin, nor Negro, nor Oriental, but only human beings. They dreamed of a world peopled by men clothed in the regal dignity and splendor of freedom; a world that would be a stepping stone to Heaven.

The Place of the American Republics and Canada in the New World Order

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by my friend, Dr. Joseph Francis Thorning, rector of St. Joseph's, Carrollton Manor, Md., at the University of Maryland, College Park, as part of the program of the twentieth annual rural women's short course, prepared under the direction of Miss Venia M. Kellar, assistant director of the extension service. The lecture deals with the relationship between the good-neighbor policy and the United Nations. It bears the title "The Place of the American Republics and Canada in the New World Order."

THE PLACE OF THE AMERICAN REPUBLICS AND CANADA IN THE NEW WORLD ORDER

(By Dr. Joseph F. Thorning, rector of St. Joseph's, Carrollton Manor, Md., and special lecturer on sociology in the Catholic University of Chile)

In the terrible flames of World War II, the good-neighbor policy, as conceived by its architect, Sumner Welles, and promulgated by its popularizer, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, met the supreme test of "blood, sweat, and tears." Tried in the crucible of world-wide conflict, inter-American friendship met the challenge of totalitarian nazi-fascism triumphantly. As our good neighbors themselves often proclaimed in the course of the last 5 years, "Las Américas unidas, unidas vencerán," "the united Americas will find victory in their united front."

To emphasize the contribution of the other American Republics and Canada to our recent victory is a simple act of justice. The historical record discloses that, almost immediately after the Japanese sneak attack at Pearl Harbor, the tiny Republic of Costa Rica, democratic to the core, hours before the Congress of the United States of America swung into action, had declared war upon the warlords of Tokyo. Although only Canada and the United States of Brazil actually dispatched complete army divisions to fight on the battle fronts of Europe, the other peoples in this hemisphere, in overwhelming numbers, sympathized effectively with our cause, while their governments, one by one, broke diplomatic relations with the Axis Powers.

In a most critical hour for the peoples of the Western Hemisphere, the spiritual unity of the American Republics and Canada established itself as a precious, sacred reality. Our enemies were regarded as the enemies of America; our friends the faithful allies of humanity, liberty, and democracy.

Naturally enough, when the representatives of peace-loving nations met at San Francisco, exactly 1 year ago, they discovered that the American delegations—using the word "American" in the complete, correct sense of that term—were determined that the tried-and-true moral unity of the New World would have to be integrated with the framework of one new world, embracing every continent.

From the very beginning of the United Nations organization, there was a general recognition of the unique regional understanding that had been achieved, in an era of independent liberty, among all the peoples who live in South, Central, and North America. Every sincere statesman could see the 3,000-mile unfortified frontier between Canada and the United States as well as the towering figure of the Christ of the Andes on the crest of the mountains that stretch between Chile and Argentina in South America.

It was acknowledged that the new world society could do no better than to accept as a glorious fact, and to enlarge upon it if possible, the spirit symbolized by the words emblazoned under that statue of the Prince of Peace:

"Sooner shall these mountains crumble into dust than the peoples of Argentina and Chile shall violate the peace they have sworn to maintain at the feet of Christ, the Redeemer."

As a result, in chapter VIII (regional arrangements), article 52, paragraphs one, two, and three of the Charter of the United Nations read as follows:

"1. Nothing in the present Charter precludes the existence of regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action, provided that such arrangements or agencies and their activities are consistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

"2. The members of the United Nations entering into such arrangements or constituting such agencies shall make every effort to achieve pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies before referring them to the Security Council.

"3. The Security Council shall encourage the development of pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies either on the initiative of the states concerned or by reference from the Security Council."

Entirely consistent with the tenor of this article is the inter-American military cooperation bill, which, by a unanimous vote, was reported favorably on June 5, 1946, by the United States House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee. According to the provisions of this measure, the President of the United States would be authorized to supply military instruction and training to other American states, as well as to maintain their equipment and to transfer to them arms and munitions, where consistent with the military and naval requirements of the United States and with the national interest.

The authorized instruction might be carried on at service schools within territory under the jurisdiction of the United States, in which case the students could be supplied with clothing, medical attention, subsistence, quarters, and Government transportation to and from their home countries.

All agreements contracted under the authority of the proposed law would be subject to any general system for the regulation of armaments which may be adopted by the United Nations.

It is interesting to note this spontaneous acknowledgment of definite limitations upon national sovereignty written into legislation now under consideration on Capitol Hill. The admission, of course, is implicit in the ratification of the United Nations Charter by the Government of the United States.

Inter-American military, naval, and air collaboration, within the framework of the United Nations, is one step, albeit an important one, toward fixing the responsibilities of the American Republics and Canada in the new world order. Understandably enough, measures of this nature would be of chief concern to the United Nations Security Council.

The next phase of inter-American cooperation would fall directly under the jurisdiction, or rather scope, of the Economic and Social Council. Since the basic philosophy of the Charter envisages the acceptance, continuance, and strengthening of measures or projects that, while promoting inter-American interests, may also contribute to world stability and prosperity.

During World War II, for example, the United States of America and other allied nations benefited substantially by the quinine, quartz crystals, and balsa wood of Ecuador, Peru, and Brazil; the tin, mica, and tungsten of Bolivia; the sugar, tobacco, and fruits of Cuba; the oil of Venezuela and Colombia; the copper, manganese, nitrates, lead, and vanadium of Chile; the hides and wool of Uruguay; the mahogany, rubber, kapok, henequen, antimony, chicle, coffee, and bananas of Central America; the timber and nickel of Canada; and by the zinc, oil, and lead of Mexico. Thanks to bountiful supplies of prime materials drawn from the soil and mines of Latin America, the United States speedily transformed itself into an arsenal of democracy and later into a powerful factor in the organization of victory.

Our country, at the same time, made vital contributions to the health, sanitation, industrial, and agricultural development of the other American republics. Machinery, electrical equipment, modern mining tools, and the best types of air, rail, and automotive transport were put into the hands of our good neighbors. In short, inter-American friendship has been, is, and must remain a two-way proposition. The idea that the good-neighbor policy has been or can be a one-way street is a complete misconception. Furthermore, as has already been suggested, it is contrary to the facts.

In every department of life, the Americas and Americans have much to learn from each other. Strong as have been the political and economic ties which bind the peoples of the Hemisphere together, they can be enormously supplemented by an interchange of cultural and artistic values.

It is significant, for example, that in South America the poet is esteemed as the supreme exponent of what is true and beautiful and good in life. The artist gives testimony to the paramount nature of spiritual values over those that are merely material. For the majority of folks in Latin America, there is a golden reality wrapped up in the lines of the playwright, Pedro Calderón de la Barca:

"Al rey la hacienda y la vida
Se ha de dar;
Pero el honor es patrimonio del alma;
Y el alma sólo es de Dios."

"To the King give life and fortune
They are his due;
But honor is the patrimony of the soul;
And the soul belong only to God."

In the act of Chapultepec, initialed at Mexico City on March 4, 1945, and subsequently ratified by every democratic assembly in the Western Hemisphere, it was stated in article 6 that the "principles, which the American States have practiced in order to secure peace solidarity between the nations of the continent," constitute "an effective means of contributing to the general system of world security and of facilitating its establishment."

Furthermore, in the concluding paragraph (part III) of the declaration of that instrument, it was explicitly agreed that all Western Hemisphere regional arrangements and activities would be "consistent with the purposes and principles of the general international organization. * * *"

As has already been pointed out, this agreement was recognized and tied into the fabric of the United Nations Charter at San Francisco. Consequently, it is correct to emphasize that, just as the Act of Chapultepec fits perfectly into the background of world law, so the Charter places its seal of approval upon the Act of Chapultepec as an important pillar of one world.

Both the regional agreement, as well as the world-wide organization, it may be added, represent the crystallized wisdom and experience of generations. Decades of slow, sure development paved the way for the two agreements, complementary to each other. In the same way that the Act of Chapultepec is the climax and crown of successive inter-American conferences for the maintenance of peace, dating from the first in 1890, so the Charter of the United Nations stands as the high-water mark of world civilization, towering above the Covenant of the League of Nations, which for 20 precarious years, with headquarters at Geneva, Switzerland, attempted to picket elephants with baby ribbon.

Although the inter-American security system probably has more successes to its credit than the late League of Nations, the Geneva experiment, with its tragedies, weaknesses, and some constructive achievements, especially in the sphere of humanitarian control of drugs and the traffic in women, as well as in the sphere of international labor legislation, taught a number of salutary lessons—at least, by the negative method. Painfully and by measured steps mankind seems to be learning the uses of reason, cooperation, friendship, justice, and law.

The struggle, uphill though it be, is in the direction of new horizons, not unilluminated by the sunset glories of the past. In this sense, Chapultepec and San Francisco are not so much turning points in world history as they are the culmination of centuries and centuries of human aspiration. Agonizingly, many generations of men, women, and children have reached out for, without grasping, the ideal of one world.

Inasmuch as motives or self-interest can never be entirely absent from the minds and hearts of our people, it may be helpful to conclude with a most thoughtful admonition, which constituted the leading editorial in a recent issue (June 8, 1946) of the New York Times. This editorial, entitled "Argentina and the U. S. S. R.," is one of the most objective, balanced comments that has appeared in the press of the United States on the subject of inter-American friendship as part of world order. In part, this analysis reads as follows:

"The implications of the resumption of diplomatic and trade relations between Argentina and Soviet Russia are more important than the fact. On the factual side, there is no reason why two great countries should not have diplomatic intercourse, even when their political ideologies are at opposite poles; that was the argument advanced in favor of United States recognition of Russia during the early days of the Roosevelt administration. When two countries have complementary economies, large trade delegations are the rule and not the exception * * *.

"When those things are said, however, one runs out of analogies to explain the new relationship of Argentina and the U. S. S. R. For one thing, up to almost yesterday, Argentina and Soviet Russia have been more at loggerheads than almost any two other countries that have not been at war with each other. Argentina made the motion expelling Russia from the League of Nations in 1939; Russia made every effort at San Francisco to block Argentina from the United Nations. The controlled press of Moscow has, until yesterday, thundered 'Fascist' and many other charges at the Argentina Government. Peron's press in Buenos Aires has been no less rabid about the Soviet.

"Why, then, this sudden change? * * *

"The only possible answer is that the motivation was purely political on both sides. Peron undoubtedly believes it will help him in his effort to establish himself as the strong man of South America. For Moscow, the recognition of the Argentine Government gives them more diplomatic representation in Catholic Latin America than in any other area except Europe. Two years ago Europa encyclopedia listed only two Latin-American countries with which Moscow had diplomatic relations, Mexico and Cuba. Today she has established relations (in addition to Argentina, Mexico and Cuba) with Brazil, Chile, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Panama, Uruguay and Venezuela. * * *

"This diplomatic penetration of Latin America is not necessarily bad, nor alarming. But it would seem to behoove the United States to keep in good repair its own diplomatic fences there. A conflict of ideas, and of diplomacy, is shaping up to the south of us as well as in Europe and Asia. Kept on that plane it could be stimulating for everyone. But its successful resolution into a peaceful world is something that must be worked for, not just wished for."

This should be enough to suggest that, although the World War has come to a condition of armistice in Europe and Asia, the world revolution, which began on an organized scale in 1917, continues in every part of the globe, including the countries of South, Central, and North America. It is a duel, perhaps to the death, between the democratic, libertarian principles of Thomas Jefferson and the totalitarian dogmas of Karl Marx.

In the issue of this vast struggle, the American Republics and Canada may play the decisive roll. Either the good-neighbor policy will again prove itself as "the second line of defense and progr-" for the United States, within the framework of the United Nations; or the Western Hemisphere will be split into two or three fractions and factions, with the fruits of recent victory turning into the apples of Hesperides.

Every good citizen of the world, however, will devote his best efforts to happier, nobler goals: the achievement of understanding on the basis of the high professions of the almost-forgotten Atlantic Charter, equal opportunity for every people under the aegis of a free press and by the technique of honest elections, to determine their own destiny. If this is to mean special privilege for none, even the most powerful, it suggests that the one world, for which we strive, must provide a just, peaceful, democratic application of each article in the United Nations Charter.

If, as would appear probable, the East and the West are to come to grips in Latin America, the other American Republics and Canada can provide not only the open forums where friendly rivals ventilate their views, but also the testing ground for policies which can compete without conflict. The New World can be a theater for new ideas, not an arena, provided we remember that the New World has a unifying principle to give to one world. For the long pull, it must be emphasized, despite rivalries, disappointments and disagreements, that the Western Hemisphere is only a single area, not the totality of the earth's surface.

In the light of this discussion, the slogan, "the United Americas will build victory upon union," takes on fresh significance. America, in the broad sense of the term, can be the spearhead for a real United States of the world. For the inter-American community is only one part, albeit an important and viable integer, in the world community. The latter can only be one New World.

Extension of Price Control Act

OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, when the previous conference report on extending the OPA was before us on June 25, I supported it without hesitation because, while like almost every other Member I did not like some of its provisions, I thought it was a workable compromise, and on the whole better than either the bill previously passed by the House or that passed by the Senate, and better than any other bill we were likely to be able to get.

It provided a policy and a mechanism to stimulate maximum production without removing controls from a single commodity. Our choice was no longer between moderate price increases—just enough to take care of cost increases including wages, and thus to permit greater production—and no price increases at all. The wage-increase policy sponsored and carried out by the administration beginning last fall had made price increases inevitable, as proved by the fact that from March to June the OPA had to grant 500 price increases in order to get production. So our only alternatives were moderate price increases under control, or still greater increases out of control. Between those two I unhesitatingly chose the former.

When the President vetoed that compromise bill, I voted to override his veto, because I doubted that it would be possible to get another bill that would be enough better to outweigh or compensate for the confusion and dislocations into which the veto with sudden suspension of all price control would inevitably plunge the country. Events I believe have vindicated that position.

The majority leader [Mr. McCORMACK] has said he has reason to believe this new compromise bill will be acceptable to the President. But neither he nor any one else has claimed the bill is more workable than was the former bill. There is reason to believe that it is less workable in some respects, especially after these weeks without controls when our whole economy and business generally have behaved on the whole much better than was predicted by the panicmongers and those who believe in permanent control by the Government; and when it will be much harder to reinstate both the psychology and the mechanics of control than it would have been to continue them without the interruption.

I could not vote for this conference report were it not for the decontrol mechanisms it sets up. I must assume that the President will appoint really high-grade, practical, and experienced men to the bipartisan Decontrol Board—not advocates of a particular economic or political theory, and that the Senate will not confirm such appointments if he should make them.

It appears that we are already past the peak in price rises for most of those commodities which are placed under the Decontrol Board. The huge crops being harvested and to be harvested this year and the larger-than-normal livestock and poultry populations indicate that if our economy is free, the prices of meat, dairy, and grain products will go down, or at least go no higher Most of them are already little, if any, higher than on June 30 if the subsidies are added to the ceilings of that date. If conditions continue to improve there can be no possible justification for reinstating controls on August 21. If the passage of this bill would cause such uncertainty and fear in the minds of producers that there results a drying up of supplies or diversion again to black markets, then the Decontrol Board will certainly decide that it would be disastrous to reinstate controls on the commodities in question and will so announce at the earliest possible date.

On the other hand, if perchance there should for whatever reason be any runaway price rises, the passage of this bill protects the public by the very fact that there is a Decontrol Board which can act to restore controls at any time they become necessary.

The housewives of America are proving they can and will provide the most effective type of price control, and one that does not spawn black markets. I hope and believe that it will not be necessary or advisable to restore Government controls on at least grain, livestock, dairy and petroleum products. But this bill, in addition to reinstating controls on rents and on some manufactured commodities, provides a sort of insurance against uncontrolled inflation by authorizing restoration of price controls on the above-mentioned articles, if unreasonable prices should require it.

I believed the former bill was workable, if administered in good faith; and in my opinion this bill, too, is workable if administered in good faith. Therefore, it has my support in the faith it will prove to be in the interests of all our people, during the remaining few months of this critical transition period.

Keeping America Green

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, Minnesota was once almost all covered with green forests.

Vast areas of this timberland have been destroyed by fire. We are still rich in this natural resource and every effort should be made to prevent further destruction of our timberland.

My attention was recently attracted by an advertisement issued by the Weyerhaeuser Sales Co., of St. Paul, Minn., in connection with an effective campaign now in progress to save our timber.

The article starts out with a preliminary plea for cooperation. The article is as follows:

EVERY FORESTED STATE NEEDS A "KEEP GREEN" MOVEMENT

Fifteen States already have organized "keep green" committees. Through them industry, the public, and the Government work hand in hand to solve this common problem. They are getting results.

If you are interested in what "keep green" can accomplish in your own State, we suggest you write the American Forest Products Industries, Inc., 1319 Eighteenth Street NW., Washington, D. C. They can tell you how such a program is organized and explain how it works. They will help you gladly, because that's their business—to help keep trees growing for America.

The business of keeping America green is a job so very simple we Americans have been making hard work of it.

It's so easy that we Americans have been overlooking it to the tune of some $40,000,000 a year in direct money losses—sometimes more than $100,000,000 in a single year.

The job of protecting our growing forests from searing flames is as simple as this:

Bill Jones, one hand on his car's wheel, forgets his ash tray and tosses his cigarette out the window.

The Tom Green family cleans up the paper napkins, plates, and tin cans—as all good picnickers should—but goes away leaving campfire smoldering.

Farmer Brown burns his brush pile too close to the woods. Now he has neither brush nor woods.

And, sometimes, even a logger knocks the glowing embers out of his pipe and succeeds in wiping out his job along with a lot of timber.

There you have fair examples of the cause of half our forest fires—just simple carelessness a moment's thought could have easily prevented.

Another 25 percent of our forest fires is blamed on incendiaries, folks who set them deliberately. Don't call them arsonists, because most of them aren't. They think they are starting fires for a good purpose, perhaps to green up pasture grasses.

These good citizens lack only one simple thing—an understanding of the greater values in their woodlands, for them and for their country.

Of such stuff the American forest fire problem is made. It's an immense aggregation of many little things, which, added together, make the job of fire prevention actually a huge one.

It's the job of convincing every individual that he, himself, is a personal guardian of our forest future, of his forest future. Because every individual is capable of starting a forest fire, every individual is capable of preventing one.

The organized "keep green" movement has spread to 15 States in only a handful of years. It gives nearly everybody something to do about forest fires. The gist of its philosophy is that forest fires are a problem personal to each of us, not something for the other fellow to worry about.

It gets everybody at work. It enlists the active participation of sportsmen and school children, of chambers of commerce and labor unions, of veterans and women's clubs, of business and service clubs, of teachers and farmers.

All these people learn that our forests are producing wood on round-the-clock shifts. They know they produce more than wood. They produce jobs, and taxes for better schools, and good roads. They provide recreation as well as pay rolls. They keep towns prosperous and they put money in the pockets of farmers.

Knowing their personal stake in forests, these "keep green" sentinels are always on guard, to prevent fires from starting, to keep their own States and America green.

Shall Taxes Be Reduced?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. T. MILLET HAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a statement by the House Republican Postwar Tax Study Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member. This statement was unanimously approved at a meeting of the committee on Wednesday, July 24.

I am also including a statement made by Congressman JOHN TABER, of New York, on the proposed reduction of Federal expenditures in the event of a Republican House in 1947. Congressman TABER speaks with authority. In the event of a Republican victory, he would be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

I also want to call attention to a statement made by Congressman HAROLD KNUTSON, of Minnesota, which flatly says that, with a Republican House, income taxes can be reduced 20 percent. This statement also is authoritative, because Congressman KNUTSON is scheduled to become chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. Speaker, there is no reason whatever to think it necessary to maintain wartime taxes in time of peace, and I think the country was shocked by the recent suggestion of President Truman that taxes may well have to be increased. Only the continued wastefulness of an administration wholly committed to a pay-roll bureaucracy keeps taxes up. And the only remedy is a Republican House which has no obligation to the pay-roll boys and would usher them into private employment once again. The statements I have referred to follow:

STATEMENT BY REPUBLICAN TAX STUDY COMMITTEE

Canada is preparing to reduce taxes 23 percent in 1947. The United States is preparing to reduce taxes not a penny in 1947.

Why shouldn't the Government of the United States do as much for its taxpayers next year as the Canadian Government does for its taxpayers?

The committee found no reason except one why taxes should not be reduced in the United States handsomely in 1947. That one reason is the continued New Deal program of spending and wasting public funds.

Our reduction for 1947 in individual income tax would have to be at least 20 percent in order that our citizens may have some reductions corresponding to those the Canadian budget will grant her citizens for 1947.

Our tax committee has found as a result of our studies an imperative need for a complete overhauling of our Federal tax system. Adam Smith, more than 150 years ago, laid down four essentials of a sound tax system. His tests were:

1. Taxes should be based on ability to pay.
2. Taxes should be definite and certain and not arbitrary.
3. Taxes should be levied at the time and in the manner which cause least inconvenience to the people.
4. Taxes should take out of the people as little as possible over what is needed by the Public Treasury.

Our present tax system violates all of these essentials. Our taxes are unduly oppressive and disregard the ability of our people to bear such burdens. The language of the statute is so complicated that it is extremely difficult for the simplest tax problem to be solved without the advice of a tax expert.

The administration now insists that not only must our present unbearable burdens be continued, but that it may be necessary to increase taxes next year. The American people, administration spokesmen say, must be forced, regardless of wasteful bureaucratic expenditures, to provide a balanced budget next year and prevent inflation. Apparently the administration is insensible to the effect of these oppressive taxes taking an excessive percentage of our people's income or the effect on curtailing expansion of private business and employment. The administration apparently means to continue its wasteful and reckless spending of the people's money, regardless of the cost tc the country.

We believe the sooner our Government again restricts itself to its proper functions, and restores those extra-Federal activities to the States and to the people, where they belong, the sooner we will have sanity, economy, and efficiency in our National Government.

The reduction in Federal expenditures and the reduction in individual and consumer Federal tax burdens have been very small. Our citizens are still paying heavy and oppressive wartime taxes in peacetime. Let us compare our figures with cur neighbor, Canada, and see what has been accomplished there in the way of reduced taxes and reduced expenditures.

Our Federal expenditures for the fiscal year 1946 are approximately $65,000,000,000. For 1947, our second year of peace, under the continuance of the present New Deal spending, it is anticipated that Federal expenditures may reach $43,000,000,000. This would be a reduction of approximately only 34 percent from expenditures for 1946, notwithstanding the fact that 1946 included at least 2 months of the war.

Canada, on the other hand, is presenting a budget cutting expenditures for 1947 in excess of 40 percent. Our present administration is now talking in terms of no tax reduction for 1947; the Canadian tax budget calls for a tax reduction of approximately 23 percent, in addition to the 16-percent tax reduction which the Canadian Government has granted for the year 1946.

If expenditures for 1947 are reduced by 50 percent under 1946 expenditures, our 1947 expenditures should be around $33,000,000,000. This would leave a surplus of around $7,000,000,000, as receipts for 1947 are estimated at around $40,000,000,000. Of course, if expenditures for 1947 could only be reduced for part of the year, because the legislation would not be effective until 1947, this should still provide us with ample funds for reducing individual income taxes for 1947, for giving substantial relief to our consumers from heavy concealed wartime excises, and for providing a sizable reserve to be applied in reduction of the national debt.

We, therefore, conclude that if unnecessary and wasteful Federal expenditures are eliminated there can and should be substantial individual tax relief for 1947.

STATEMENT BY CONGRESSMAN TABER

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, a Republican-controlled House of Representatives next year will reduce Federal expenditures below $32,000,000,000 for the fiscal year following its election, will balance the budget, and provide a surplus to be applied on the reduction of the national debt.

Total expenditures during the current fiscal year have been estimated at $42,000,000,000 by Government economists and at $47,400,000,000 by Senator TAFT. This means a deficit of $8,000,000,000 to $10,000,000,000.

It is futile for the Democratic Party, which has become the pliant servant of Federal bureaucrats, to promise much-needed reductions in Government spending. A Republican-controlled House would be under no obligation to the personnel in Federal departments and bureaus and would consider all appropriation bills with the interest of the country as a whole in mind. It will be the definite purpose of Republicans on the Appropriations Committee and in charge of the legislative machinery of the House to dismantle this vast Government machine built up by the New Deal in the thirties and over-expanded during the war years.

It will be history repeating itself. After the First World War, the country turned from the Democratic Party to the Republicans. The Republicans dismantled the war government, balanced the budget, reduced taxes three times, and had surpluses of $10,000,000,000 to apply on the national debt. The pattern of what is ahead of us in 1947 and 1948 is identical. Governor Dewey's famous slogan "Time for a change" is most appropriate.

A Plea for Better Butter Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker one of my constituents, Mr. E. T. Eide, of Spooner, Minn., was recently confined to a hospital for several weeks.

During the time he was recuperating from an operation, he wrote an article setting forth the problems of agriculture with particular emphasis on the dairy farmer.

The article is obviously written by a man who has had practical experience in the fields about which he writes. Mr. Eide has demonstrated a thorough understanding of the farmer's problems and of his mental attitude toward governmental control.

Because I feel that the article published in the Baudette region is so comprehensive and worth while, I have asked that it be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It follows:

A PLEA FOR BETTER BUTTER PRICES

In the winter of 1942–43 there was an acute shortage of pulpwood that threatened to close up the paper mills.

"Paul Bunyan" meetings were held in the main pulpwood-producing counties in northern Minnesota to help win the war. Little hope was held out, however, of getting the required amount, because nearly all of the younger men of this area were in the armed forces, or had left to work in the war industries. On account of the fact that parity prices for farm products were based on 1909–14 labor cost, and that the great improvements in farm machinery, that revolutionized grain farming, had not to any great extent helped the small dairy farmers, many of the younger farmers sold out and left. Lake of the Woods lost 30 percent of its farmers, mostly under 50 years of age. A few in their seventies could not take rigors of farming, but had no difficulty in keeping up in the war industries.

The poplar pulpwood was, to start with, most critical. Now it happens that this was the type of wood that is available in the settled part of our wooded areas, and on account of the low price, did not interest the timber companies or the large loggers. It would be the farmers' job to get it out.

This was the situation that faced those who were left to carry on. I will not at this time go into details but let the results speak for themselves. Long before the logging season of that winter was over, the unloading spurs at the paper mills were clogged up with poplar pulpwood, and this in spite of the unusual severe winter that hampered both farm and timber work. Since then the cutting of poplar pulpwood has been controlled to avoid a glut, but in spite of greater demands no real shortage has hampered the operations of the mills.

THEY HAVE WORKED HARD

So that those who never handled any poplar pulpwood will get an idea of the extreme hardship these middle-aged farmers had to endure to get out this large amount of wood, I will give a few details.

It weighs about 2½ tons to the cord, is cut in 8-foot lengths with a minimum top of 4½ inches and has to be carried or dragged through brush and snow out to the skidding or truck roads. In many instances the sticks thus carried greatly outweigh the man who is carrying them. It is truly blood work. Now how could these middle-aged farmers accomplish such a herculean task? The price incentive, of course, had something to do with it, as for once he was on a nearly even footing with the rest of the workers, enabling him to pay off some of his debts. His intense patriotism, aroused by radio and newspaper appeals, also did its bit, as did our invigorating northern climate. However, all these could not give him the intestinal fortitude to keep him working from 70 to 100 hours a week for several years.

THE FARMER'S WIFE

This picture would not be true if no mention was made of the assistance the farmer's wife rendered in accomplishing this almost unbelievable feat. In several cases she took over the entire task of taking care of the stock when her husband had to go into a camp too far away from home.

He generally came home Saturday nights and stayed over Sunday and rested up by hauling hay and doing other work that his wife could not do alone.

In most cases, however, the timber was close enough so he could stay home, then she helped with the chores in the morning and evening, took over the noon chores so that her husband, when the days were short, could spend all the daylight hours in the woods. If there ever was a class of people that can look our boys, now home with their hard-earned victory, right in their eyes, these rugged pioneer farm women surely can.

We must find out where this "atomized" energy is obtained, for it is just as far ahead of the war efforts of the rest of the working people as the atom bomb is ahead of the ordinary ones.

THE DAIRY SITUATION

The farmers in this area consume large quantities of dairy products, especially in its most concentrated form of butter. They don't use it as a "token" like you get in the restaurants and hotels, but really smear it on thick. Thirty-five to forty pounds per person annually would probably be a fair estimate. Besides its known high nutritional value it also seems to act as a tonic, giving its user a will to work and endurance to keep it up for years. This is the food that "the powers to be" are trying to wean the American people away from, first by pricing it so low that it is unprofitable to produce it, and also by suggesting that the hotels and restaurants make the "tokens" even smaller so that 90 instead of 60 can be made from one pound.

THE FARMERS ARE CONFUSED

At the present pricing of butter and of cutting pulpwood, the farmers are confused. When he takes care of his stock his wages are based on the 1909-14 level, plus a subsidy that most of them consider an insult, but have to accept or go broke. The prevailing factory wages at that time were from 20 to 25 cents an hour. At the same time, when he gets hold of his trusty ax and saw, an investment of about $10, his wages jump to 90 cents, or even $1, per hour. In other words, he is at the same time living over 30 years apart as far as his wages are concerned. He is at the same time in his thirties and in his sixties, and the most confusing part of it is that the middle-aged man can earn three or four times as much as the man in his prime. No wonder some of the old-timers feel cocky.

HAS SOMEBODY SLIPPED UP?

The most remarkable feature of the whole mess, however, is that the "brain trust" forgot to make a difference in the prices of pulpwood produced by farmers and in the regular camps. This is in contrast with the pricing formula of other farm products. The main cost in producing poplar pulpwood is labor, as the cost of stumpage is negligible.

According to our late President, aided and abetted by industry, labor, and even so-called farm organization, to allow for the increased cost of labor, in formulating the parity prices, would not only ruin the farmer, but the whole country as well. According to that reasoning, these farmers who produced our pulpwood and kept our mills running by doing so were utterly ruined. The only redeeming feature is, of course, that compared to the over 6,000,000 farmers in the United States, the number thus sacrificed is so small that the country can afford it. In other words, they were expendable.

FALSE PROPHETS

I have been watching these same elderly farmers very closely to check up on the prophecy that they would be ruined if they got the same pay as others. It has seemed to work just the opposite, in fact the extra money enabling them to pay up some of their debts, seems to have given them a new hope. Said one of them, displaying a handful of paid-up bills: "I am a free man again. I feel just like I have been released from jail. Ever since I took my homestead here in 1905 I have been in debt. There was always something to buy for the farm that the income could not take care of." I could not help noticing a new gleam of hope in his eyes, as I shook hands in congratulating for a swell job well done.

There is at this time a serious shortage of butter, a quarter of a pound seems to be as much as the grocer will sell to a customer, if he has any at all. In trying to cope with this situation the Duluth Chamber of Commerce has recommended to the President that a ceiling be placed on cream prices, so that more would be churned into butter.

SHOULD RAISE BUTTER PRICES

Those gentlemen probably never tumbled to the fact that raising the price of butter would at this time have the same effect, as we have capacity to produce enough to satisfy all of the price incentive there is. According to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a document presented by Senator REED, of Kansas, proves that, from 1910 until the United States Government started to interfere with prices and wages, a pound of butter was at all times worth more than an hour of work, based on the average industrial wage scale. If somebody should suggest that according to the present wage scale, 90 cents or even $1 a pound for butter would be in line, a cry would be set up that it would be the same as denying low-income groups this health and energy-building food. (The States and the U. S. Government should assume that responsibility. The school lunch is a step in the right direction and should be enlarged upon). However, if all the work that is required to produce milk under the average conditions prevailing on the small dairy farms, were taken into consideration, it would not be so unreasonable after all. Very few of them are equipped with milking machines, or have storage space for the hay required to stall-feed the cows for 7 months out of a year.

THE COW

All the braintrusters singly or collectively have not been able to change the nature or habits of the cow. She is still the same old bossy, that in order to get lots out of her, you first have to put lots into her. The smartest politician or salesman living, has not been able to talk her out of anything, in short, she cannot be cheated. She still has to be milked 12 hours apart, 7 days a week thus eliminating a short workweek, unless there are two crews on each farm. We are very fortunate in having a class of farmers that are willing to have their nose against the grindstone 365 days a year to enable us to be the best-fed people on earth. The least we can do to pay them for their endless toil, is to pay them for their produce a price that will pay them wages comparable to what is paid in industry today instead of 30 years ago. The farmers have not yet asked for time and a half for every hour that exceeds 40 hours a week; but when we old fellows have gone to our reward and the returned soldiers get their bearings, this economic injustice will have to be eliminated as they will not be so easy to deal with. The news that some Nebraska farmers have formed an organization to strike against the strikers is not so farfetched and crazy as it might seem at the first glance. They have a weapon in their hands, far more potent than any atomic bomb, and the sooner the rest of our population realizes this the better for all concerned.

I sincerely hope that the farmers will not be provoked to use it to get economic justice.

E. T. EIDE.

SPOONER, MINN., February 19, 1946.

A Story of Sordid Selfishness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, in the Times-Herald of Washington, D. C., for today is an item which ought to cause everyone who thinks straight about world affairs to do some more thinking. This item refers to the fact that the United States is getting no cooperation from Russia in connection with rehabilitation in war-torn countries and particularly in Germany. The item reads in part as follows:

CREATES ECONOMIC CHAOS—UNITED STATES CHARGES REDS ARE LOOTING HUNGARY OF FOOD AND MATERIAL—SHARPLY WORDED PROTEST ASKS SOVIET TO ASSIST IN NATION'S REHABILITATION

(By John M. Hightower)

On the eve of Secretary Byrnes' departure for the Paris peace conference, the United States last night sharply accused Russia of creating economic chaos in Hungary by stripping her of vital food and industrial materials.

This country also appealed directly to Foreign Minister Molotov for Soviet cooperation with America and Britain in rehabilitating the former satellite of Germany.

LETTER HANDED TO MOLOTOV

The State Department made public a letter which Ambassador W. Bedell Smith delivered to Molotov Tuesday containing the appeal. The letter also declared the Red army had been stripping Hungary of foodstuffs while the Russian Government had removed $124,000,000 worth of manufacturing equipment and is currently absorbing 50 percent of Hungary's industrial production.

The strong protest may foreshadow a fight over Hungarian reparations at the peace conference.

We would be inclined, Mr. Speaker, to think that there was some mistake or some misunderstanding after reading this news item. However, we know better. This is not the first time that facts have been developed showing that Russia is doing her best to loot and ruin all other countries where her dominating influence prevails. The way that she plundered Manchuria is typical of the Russian attitude. It makes us wonder what the American leaders were doing when they were holding conferences with the rulers of the world while World War No. II was going on and while America was pouring out her blood and treasury to help save the rest of the world. This selfish attitude to loot and ruin other countries in order to profit by their misery is not conducive to a lasting world peace. It prompts me to ask a question as to just what our men in the armed forces were fighting for during World War No. II. The administration ought to give a clear-cut answer.

The Fundamental Logic of Housing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD M. SIMPSON
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Arthur W. Binns, president, National Home and Property Owners Foundation:

THE FUNDAMENTAL LOGIC OF HOUSING

(By Arthur W. Binns, president, National Home and Property Owners Foundation)

Between men of good will, our disagreement is as to method and not as to objectives, as is true in most cases. Every man and woman of good will, interested in housing, ardently desires to solve the problem—to provide a good home for every American family in the shortest length of time and to clear the slums and the blighted areas out of our cities. We disagree, however, as to the method by which this shall be done.

The story is told of two professors of philosophy in the city of Munich, who were heard one day to be in mortal combat. The prefect of the police was called and broke into the house. He found one of the professors dying and the other dead. He lifted the head of the dying man close to his ear and heard the barely audible words, "We are two professors of philosophy. We agreed that universal peace was desirable, but we disagreed slightly as to the method of obtaining it."

It is to be hoped that public and private housers will not find themselves in the sad state of the two professors of philosophy, dissipating and destroying each other because they disagreed as to the method of achievement.

I have vigorously opposed the program of public housing in the past and I will continue to oppose it in the future as long as my light remains as it now is, fundamentally for one very basic and simple reason.

I do not believe it is possible to have any such thing as just a little public housing. I believe it has now been clearly demonstrated that the thing that is at stake is not a contest between public and private housing at all, but rather a fundamental contest of philosophy. We have on the one hand, the public housing program which advocates, in one form or another, the progressive socialization of property. We have, on the other hand, the free competitive enterprise proponents who oppose the socialization of property and believe that the best interests of all of our people are served by private ownership and by free, competitive, capitalistic economy.

Very seldom do the proponents of public housing say frankly that they believe in the socialization of property. They talk of there being a place for public housing. They talk of just a little public housing. There may be those who believe honestly, that it is possible to have just a little public housing. I do not think so. I think it is no more possible to have just a little public housing, than it is possible to have just a little cancer.

You see, once public housing enters an area it sterilizes this area to all private enterprise and creates a no-man's land around it. Obviously private enterprise cannot go into this no-man's land, so Government must. This in turn creates a new no-man's land and so by an absolutely inevitable process of expansion, Government housing eventually becomes a socialization of all housing.

I am certain that history will eventually record that the decision which was made, when it is made, will be shown to be between all property owned by the State and between private ownership. I am absolutely convinced that this is the issue which must now be decided.

I will not here debate the relative merits of a national socialistic program in which housing is nationalized and the merits of a free enterprise system.

I have often felt that it would be a much more useful thing to debate and decide this fundamental issue rather than to constantly cloak the major issue under the disguise of housing.

He who advocates public housing as a permanent national policy advocates the permanent nationalization of all property. Let us stand on this issue and on this base make our decision.

Because I wish this opinion to be extremely brief, I shall not attempt to touch, in even a passing manner, the vast collection of exhibits which might be set forth touching on the whole problem. I wish to say one further thing only.

The question is properly asked by those who are quite willing to acknowledge the thesis set forth herewith as correct, "What is the alternate? How may a good house be provided for every American family in the shortest length of time?"

I am quite convinced that the answer to this question lies in the second-, third-, fourth-, and fifth-hand house.

I believe it to be completely absurd to reverse the whole normal process of distribution by supplying a new house to the lowest level of consuming power.

We could never have achieved the miracles of distribution which have been achieved in this country by this inverted process. Always we have distributed the new article, the most advanced article, to the man who is best able to buy it. Always as a reward for industry, success and achievement, the individual who has so achieved has been the one to merit the finest and the most advanced product obtainable. By the simple process of depreciation, this new product has then passed from hand to hand until the very poorest man in the whole community had a product many times as good as the one which he originally had, before the first purchaser started the thing off at the top.

It is obvious that only a minute percentage of our whole population can ever have new houses. One only has to consider the fact that a very small percent, perhaps 1 or 2 percent, of the total houses in the country can at any one time be new, so that most of us, no matter what our incomes may be, or our standard in the community may be, occupy used houses throughout the majority or all of our lifetimes.

Just for fun, I made a search in my own family not long ago and I find that on neither side of my parents has there been a new house in the family for over three generations.

If we are sincere, therefore, in desiring to provide a good home for every American family, in the shortest possible length of time and if we are not seeking, in disguise, to sell national socialism under the cloak of housing, the thing to do is to pour into the top the greatest number of new houses for any level of the population which may be in the market as fast as we can.

When our magnificent home builders with their matchless energies and resources and abilities succeed in providing 100,000 new homes for people who can afford them, for perhaps seven, eight, or ten thousand dollars purchase price, they automatically provide 100,000 new homes for people less able to pay. Homes, not new in construction, but new to the family who will occupy them.

Housing, you see, is like a stretched chain—when you lift the top link, you lift every link in the chain.

On the other hand, the policy of national socialism, in which the profit motive and private capital is attacked as a philosophy, leads automatically to the discontinuance of all new building and thus our shortage gets constantly worse and our problem more acute.

One philosophy works wonders in production, the other destroys production. One is the philosophy of shortage, the other the philosophy of an expanding economy ever building and supplying wider and greater needs. One method is successful, the other defeats the whole alleged purpose of housing. This is my basis for vigorous opposition to a national policy of continued and expanded public housing. I simply believe that we will begin to get results when we abandon the Alice in Wonderland philosophy of having somebody else do our job for us, when we cease to expect the Federal Government to finance the people, and when we return again to individual responsibility and away from ever increasing collectivism which moves steadily toward a total state.

The Republic of the Philippines a Living Monument of the Golden Rule Between Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I present to the House a splendid editorial appearing in the Paterson (N. J.) Evening News, and captioned "The Republic of the Philippines a Living Monument of the Golden Rule Between Nations." As one who visited Manila, Corregidor, and Bataan last January, and as a student of the history of the islands, I agree fully with the writer's conclusion that the Mother of Republics will never lose interest in the welfare of the new Republic of the Philippines, which is hallowed in our history.

Last Thursday night it was my happy privilege to attend a dinner in compliment to the first Ambassador sent to our country to represent the Republic of the Philippines, Joaquin M. Elizalde, whom we in the House remember so affectionately as a former Resident Commissioner representing the old Commonwealth in this body. I know that the Ambassador will also be glad to have a copy of this editorial, which is being dispatched to him at once. The editorial follows:

THE REPUBLIC OF THE PHILIPPINES A LIVING MONUMENT OF THE GOLDEN RULE BETWEEN NATIONS

The Republic of the Philippines came into being on July 4.

The promise we made to the Filipinos in 1898 we have kept. They are now free.

A new and brighter chapter has been written into the history of evolutionary imperialism. An example has been set to other powers having dependencies in Asia and elsewhere.

The United States has done something unique in the history of the world.

We took an impoverished and retarded people, fed them, washed them up, educated them in self-government, and then gave them their freedom, without their having to fight for it.

The experiment cost us several billion dollars, through the years, but who will say today that it was not money well invested?

The Spaniards had been in the Philippines more than 300 years when we evicted them in 1898. They had done little or nothing in that time to improve the material well being of the people.

Commerce and industry were played down. The natural resources of the islands were untouched. The vast majority of the people remained in poverty, squalor, and ignorance.

We have not only spread education among the masses but have also introduced economic measures to raise their standard of living above the subsistence level.

We have not looted them for the benefit of our own pockets, as has been the fashion in most colonies.

The idea that in keeping the Philippines, after the Spanish-American War, we were moved by pure altruism is not true.

We acted from self-interest.

Germany wished to acquire the islands, as a base for its Far Eastern policy. We not only prevented its doing so. We acquired them as a base for our own expanding interest in the Orient.

A few Americans, too, saw visions of tremendous commercial gain, which did not pan out.

The vast majority of the people of this country were reconciled to the retention of the Philippines only by President McKinley's pledge to aid them to merit self-government and then to give it to them.

The self-interest which induced us to keep the Philippines was conditioned by enlightenment.

The payoff came when the Japanese invaded the archipelago. With few exceptions, the Filipinos remained loyal to the United States. They fought gallantly on our side. They suffered indescribably.

The promise of Philippine independence on a specific date had effects far in advance of its fulfillment.

The leaders of the Indonesian war of independence pointed to it, as the goal toward which they, too, were fighting. The Indian leaders found in it confirmation of their demand for freedom from the British Raj.

All through the colonial world it gave impetus to the desires of exploited peoples to govern themselves.

As we cut the Philippines adrift, we can look back upon a job well done.

Americans can never lose interest in the welfare of a country hallowed in our history by Manila Bay and Bataan.

The Republic of the Philippines is a living monument to an experiment in applying the Golden Rule between nations, a beacon to struggling peoples everywhere.

If that be imperialism, then let Moscow make the most of it.

Divide and Conquer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. BYRNES

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the State of Wisconsin was recently shocked to read in the press that the city of Knoxville, Tenn., had banned the sale of Wisconsin milk in the city, indirectly attributing its action to an increase in infant mortality from 37.3 per thousand in 1944 to 51.8 per thousand in 1945.

The alert Wisconsin Department of Agriculture immediately made a thorough investigation of the entire situation in Knoxville. The results of that investigation are astounding.

Not only did the special investigating committee find that there was absolutely no basis for the charge that Wisconsin milk was even remotely responsible for any increase in infant mortality, not only did the committee find that Wisconsin milk shipped to the Knoxville area met all standards for cleanliness and purity, it also discovered that behind the whole ugly story lay the machinations of another Federal agency—this time the United States Public Health Service—using the threat of withdrawal of Federal funds to promote its own expansion.

Because of the importance of removing from any suspicion whatsoever the purity of the products of the great Wisconsin dairy industry and because of the importance of bringing the attention of the Members of this House to another attempt of a Federal agency to undermine competing State services, I ask unanimous consent that the complete report on the Knoxville milk situation, issued by Milton H. Button, director of the Wisconsin Department of Agriculture, be inserted in the RECORD.

THE DEVELOPMENTS IN THE KNOXVILLE MILK SITUATION

THE CHARGE

On Sunday, July 7, 1946, Wisconsin agriculture was astounded by newspaper headlines to the effect that Knoxville, Tenn., had banned the sale of Wisconsin milk in that city. The press reported that Dr. W. H. Enneis, Knoxville health officer, took such action because the milk came from dirty and other unsanitary sources. That official was also quoted as saying that the infant death rate had risen from 37.3 deaths per thousand live births the previous year to 51.8 deaths per thousand live births in 1945. Although admitting that the increase in infant mortality could not be traced directly to Wisconsin milk, he is reported as saying "the child deaths have resulted from diseases which are frequently milk-borne."

The city of Knoxville had not previously asked Wisconsin officials for information about the sources of suitable milk for fluid use. Neither did the Tennessee officials discuss with or otherwise inform the Wisconsin Department of Agriculture officers about the milk received before releasing such information to the press.

DEPARTMENT INVESTIGATION

The Wisconsin Department of Agriculture immediately took steps to prepare to meet the situation. Investigation disclosed that this milk referred to originated at two plants—one in Hartford, Wis., and the other in Antigo, Wis. Neither source was inspected or graded by the United States Public Health Service officials, but both sources were subject to the inspection of the Pennsylvania State health officers, by Wisconsin Department of Agriculture inspectors, and by field men employed by the respective dairy plants. Further investigation disclosed that instead of importing milk from Wisconsin the Tennessee city ordered and received heavy (40 percent butterfat) cream and concentrated (35 percent milk solids) skim milk. These products were thoroughly pasteurized in the Wisconsin plants and shipped by express in iced cars to Knoxville, where they arrived within 48 hours. Checking the reports of the bacteria count on these products, it was learned that they tested well within the low limitations of the USPHS and compared most favorably with the records of the bacteria counts on milk and cream subject to USPHS inspection.

It was learned that for distribution as fluid milk in Tennessee these Wisconsin dairy products were reconstituted (or "recombined," as they say in Tennessee) with Knoxville water.

COMMITTEE APPOINTED

Convinced that the increase, if any, in the infant-mortality rate in Knoxville was attributable to other causes, Mr. Milton H. Button, director of the Wisconsin Department of Agriculture, appointed a committee to go to Knoxville to get the facts. This committee consisted of Dr. Henry T. Scott, reesarch director of the Wisconsin Alumni Research Foundation; Mr. Harvey J. Weavers, chief of the dairy division of the department; and Mr. Anthony E. Madler, assistant attorney general and counsel for the department.

Before going to Knoxville this committee, in company with representatives of the press, made an inspection of one of the dairy plants which shipped such products to Knoxville. It was found to be a clean, modern, and well-equipped dairy plant with two intakes and two complete sets of processing facilities, one for USPHS grade A milk and one for its regular supply. From the inspection which was made on that day it appeared that the equipment in the two sides of the plant was identical. Characteristic of the all-inclusive control over its processing technique and the quality of its final product were the records of the complete analysis of the water used in its boilers. Such analysis was made every 8 hours.

THE CONDITIONS AT KNOXVILLE

The Wisconsin committee arrived in Knoxville, Tenn., Wednesday evening, July 17. Thursday morning the members made a preliminary survey of the local conditions in preparation for the afternoon conference.

Knoxville was found to be a city which had grown in population from 111,000 in 1940 to approximately 200,000 in 1946. Oak Ridge is the nearby "atomic bomb city" with a population of about 40,000, receiving its milk from the Knoxville dairy plants. The local grade A milk supply is furnished by about 375 producers with average herds of 25 cows each. This production falls short of meeting the city's needs of approximately 17,800 gallons daily in the fall and winter months.

The TVA project has had an economic effect on Knoxville and other Tennessee cities. Some of the valley pasture lands have been flooded and the number of dairy farms reduced. The dams have raised the water level in the Tennessee River something over 10 feet and have substantially reduced its rate of flow. This stream and the French Broad and Holston Rivers, which converge just above Knoxville, are the outlets for municipal sewage and industrial wastes. It is also the source of Knoxville's municipal water supply after filtration and heavy chlorination.

The city of Knoxville has had three different city managers since the fall of 1945. Recall proceedings are pending against a number of the city council members.

Until the fall of 1945 local farmers were permitted to sell raw buttermilk poured from open milk cans brought to its market street. It was this situation which gave rise to the recent agitation concerning the city's milk supply. Local civic groups demanded that this sale of buttermilk be discontinued. One thing led to another until the whole fluid-milk distribution matter was brought into the picture.

It was also learned that the 1945 infant mortality rate of 51.8 deaths per thousand live births in Knoxville was not at all extraordinary. Since 1940 the death rate in Knoxville has been, 1940, 52.0 deaths per thousand live births; 1941, 52.0 deaths per thousand live births; 1942, 53.3 deaths per thousand live births; 1943, 43.8 deaths per thousand live births; 1944, 39.0 deaths per thousand live births; 1945, 51.8 deaths per thousand live births.

It thus appears that the infant death rates in 1943 and 1944 were unaccountably low and that the 1945 death rate was but a return to approximately the normal average.

All of the Wisconsin milk sent to Knoxville during the year 1945 up to the month of October was USPHS grade A inspected milk. In October, when it was made to appear that the Wisconsin supply of such milk would be inadequate to fill the city's needs, the council adopted a waiver of the ordinance provisions and agreed to accept the milk from the two plants in question because they had passed Pennsylvania inspection. Apparently therefore Wisconsin milk furnished during only the last 3 months of 1945 was being blamed for the infant mortality rate increase computed for the entire year.

THE CONFERENCE

By appointment the committee met the Tennessee officials at Knoxville in the city hall Thursday, July 18, 1946, at 1:30 p. m. The Tennessee officials present were: W. B. Lockwood, city manager of Knoxville; Dr. W. H. Enneis, city health officer of Knoxville; D. M. Hayes, chief milk sanitarian of Knoxville; Leon Blankenship, health officer, Oak Ridge; Roy Leonard, milk sanitarian, Oak Ridge; Mr. Quillen, milk sanitarian, Oak Ridge.

When informed by the committee that its purpose in coming to Knoxville was to learn the basis for the charge that Wisconsin milk had caused an increase in the city's infant mortality rate, both Dr. Enneis and City Manager Lockwood stated that they had never made such a statement. They assured the committee that if the press stories carried any such implication, then the reports were erroneous.

Pressed by questions from the committee, Dr. Enneis stated:

1. That he made no investigation into the causes of deaths to learn which of the diseases causing death might be milk-borne.

2. That the causes of death had not been tabulated in any manner from which the press could have inferred that milk-borne diseases caused an increase in the infant death rate.

3. That the "recombined Wisconsin milk" was blended with the natural Tennessee milk and that, therefore, no laboratory analysis of the milk could be used as a basis for the charge.

4. That the Wisconsin milk products had a low bacteria count, within the USPHS limitations.

5. That the Knoxville municipal water had been inspected by the USPHS and was "the best in the country."

6. That the infant mortality rate as computed includes children up to 1 year of age.

7. That he did not know the percentage division or ratio of deaths as between white and colored children.

8. That he did not know the number of deaths which occurred while being attended or unattended, respectively, by pediatricians or competent doctors.

9. That he did not know the percentage of children being fed evaporated milk or infant feeding formulas as distinguished from bottled milk.

10. That he did not know if molasses or other ingredients inferior to high-grade sugar were being used as additions to milk concentrates for infant feeding.

11. That an epidemiological survey at this time into the causes of death, the types of milk employed, the general economic conditions, the intelligence of the mothers, etc., would be of little value.

12. That the city of Knoxville had no funds with which to conduct such a survey.

13. That he had no objections to Wisconsin conducting such a survey in Knoxville but that the Tennessee law prohibited him "from giving out the names of the families in which such deaths occurred."

14. That some of the Wisconsin farms supplying milk to the plants in question had been rated by USPHS and had averaged only 65.

15. That the methylene blue test, acidity test, sediment test, microscope plate test, and other examinations of the milk were of value only as "follow-up work," and that unless the farms where the milk is produced are rated at least 90 by USPHS the milk was not acceptable in Knoxville.

16. That he knew that the milk in question had not been labeled as USPHS grade A and the farms where it was produced had not represented themselves as being grade A inspected.

17. That unless milk has been produced on USPHS inspected farms and processed in USPHS inspected plants it must be classed as "substandard."

The committee assured the Tennessee officials that they were getting a good, clean, sanitary and healthy product. The committee vigorously opposed the application of the term "substandard" to all milk which had been produced without USPHS inspection. They pointed out that on that basis the milk sold in Milwaukee and other large Wisconsin cities was "substandard" even though it was subject to the most rigid local inspection. They were emphatic in their contention that such milk was equally as good as any milk produced under USPHS inspection and far excelled some of the milk sold under the USPHS grade A label.

The Oak Ridge officials stated that Wisconsin milk was being used there, but when asked about the infant mortality rate in that city replied "No comment."

City Manager Lockwood then disclosed the crux of the situation. He stated that the city was receiving substantial financial assistance from the State of Tennessee, allocated from Federal funds, and that they have been informed by the State health officer, Dr. Hutcheson, that unless Knoxville complied with the USPHS model ordinance which requires USPHS inspection, this grant of public funds "might be jeopardized." The amount of such public grant was not disclosed at the conference. The committee later learned that the allocation is approximately $75,800 annually.

City Manager Lockwood also stated that a conference was being arranged for the next week at Nashville where he and Dr. Enneis proposed to discuss with State officials and an authority from the USPHS some modification of its ordinance which would provide a means of meeting the fluid-milk demand in the city and adjacent territory in a manner that would meet the approval of USPHS. Upon request by the committee he stated that Wisconsin would be invited to have a representative attend such conference.

FURTHER RESEARCH

Research by Dr. Scott among leading pediatricians disclosed that at least 98 percent of the bottle-fed infants under their supervision receive evaporated milk or other infant-feeding formulas as distinguished from bottled milk, and that practice continues until the children are at least 1 year of age. The fact that evaporated milk is cheaper and of more constant composition than would be the blended variety of milk sold in Knoxville leads to the conclusion that little, if any, bottled milk is used there for infant feeding.

Mr. Weavers inspected some of the dairy plants and some of the producing farms. He reports that while they appear to have made tremendous progress they have not as yet attained the efficiency and the sanitary standards prevailing in Wisconsin.

THE PROBLEM TO BE MET

It would appear that the Nation thus faces a situation where a Federal agency, the United States Public Health Service, is using public funds to promote the expansion of that agency. By holding out the bait of huge grants of Federal funds it is attempting to force municipalities to demand its inspection service and thereby create an increase in the work demand upon its personnel.

The fluid-milk markets is not alone affected. The Wisconsin Department of Agriculture is aware of the attempts of that agency to insist upon its inspection service on milk being used in the preparation of manufactured dairy products such as dry ice-cream mix.

Another Federal agency, the War Food Administration, has volunteered to render the same type of service so that Wisconsin dairy products might find it easier to move in interstate commerce. Although it does not have funds to hold out as an inducement to municipal officers to demand its service, it too, is interested in creating a call on its personnel for the purpose of expansion.

These Federal agencies apparently are attempting to create the impression that the State inspection service being offered by the exporting dairy States is of little or no value.

Wisconsin and other dairy exporting States must therefore prepare to meet the challenge. This State produces 14 percent of the Nation's total milk supply, more than fifteen and one-half billion pounds of milk annually. It exports, for fluid purposes, the equivalent of 10 percent of that production or one and one-half billion pounds a year. Conscious always of the need for quality in its dairy products, the dairy division of the State department of agriculture maintains a staff of 27 competent and qualified dairy inspectors and an adequate number of cheese graders. It has encouraged the larger dairy plants and combinations of the smaller dairy plants to engage the services of trained field men to assist dairy farmers in meeting their quality problems. These field men work under the supervision of the State inspectors and are given authority to demand compliance with quality standards.

Other States have their own quality inspection service. We know that some are doing an excellent job.

If the United States Public Health Service is permitted to use public funds as bait to create a demand for its inspection service, it will soon make State inspection meaningless.

We have learned that the agency has allocated and contributed to Wisconsin approximately $325,000 annually. It has insisted upon the appointment of at least one milk sanitarian in the State board of health, which position is now held by Clarence Luchterhand. Mr. Luchterhand collaborated with the USPHS officials in making the inspection for Knoxville. Mr. Luchterhand was trained in the State department of agriculture. He is a director of the Wisconsin Milk Sanitarians Association, a professional group consisting of State and municipal officials engaged in milk sanitation work to promote improvement in their technique and the general advancement of their work. He knows the standards of quality as judged by the Wisconsin dairy officials and by milk sanitarians generally. The report of the investigation, a copy of which is now in our hands, discloses that these accepted test methods were totally ignored and that the conclusion was based on the absence of the "window dressing" of equipment and facilities. The Wisconsin Department of Agriculture was not informed of the request for inspection of the Knoxville milk supply, nor was it informed of the result of the inspection tour.

The USPHS is thus employing the old technique of "divide and conquer." In Wisconsin we now find a division of duty and a division of responsibility. Ostensibly the duties of the milk sanitarian in the State board of health, are advisory rather than supervisory, but it becomes increasingly difficult to draw the line of distinction between such duties.

The Wisconsin Department of Agriculture has enjoyed a friendly and cooperative relationship with the Wisconsin State Board of Health. We know of no reason why this cooperative relationship should not continue. We know of no reason why the inspection service of the State department of agriculture should not be employed by the USPHS.

No instance in this State has been called to our attention where the lure of a Federal grant was made conditional upon the requirement of USPHS inspection as it was in Tennessee. We look upon the Knoxville situation as evidence of the trend—a sign of the times.

Because we believe in State rights, because we maintain an inspection service which we believe to be one of the best in the Nation, and because we object to the use of Federal funds for bureaucratic enlargement, we are rendering this report to the Honorable Walter S. Goodland, Governor of the State of Wisconsin. Copies are being sent to our elected Representatives in Congress and to all our State legislators.

Copies are also being sent to the directors, secretaries, and commissioners of agriculture of the other States. I know that they are confronted with the same problem because the issue was discussed by them at a recent conference. I want them to know the position in which Wisconsin finds itself and the attitude we have taken.

Respectfully submitted.

STATE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
MILTON H. BUTTON, Director.

No Vacancies, the Shame of the Nation—Article in September Issue of Magazine Salute Recommended as Required Reading for Those Sincerely Interested in Veterans and Their Housing Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WRIGHT PATMAN
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, there are times when I feel it would be an excellent idea if arrangements could be made to reproduce photographs, drawings, and other pictorial material in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

If this were possible today, I should seek permission to insert the full text of an article and its accompanying pictures and a cartoon which appear in the September issue of the new monthly magazine Salute.

The article in question is entitled "No Vacancies, the Shame of the Nation." Its author is Mr. James Dugan. The subject, of course, is the plight of our 3,000,000 returned veterans who are still doubled up with relatives or walking the streets seeking some form of decent shelter for themselves and their families.

With your permission I append below certain pertinent quotations from this excellent article and commend reading of the entire text and a careful perusal of the accompanying photographs and an excellent cartoon by Mr. Rollin Kirby to all who have more than a perfunctory interest in this vital subject. The portions of the article which have particularly commanded my attention are as follows:

CAN THIS BE AMERICA?

Three million homeless veterans walking the streets can watch nonresidential building going up—$50,000,000 worth each week. They can watch the result of the Government's lifting of construction controls last fall—a 12,000-seat steel-and-concrete racetrack at Asbury Park, N. J., superhighways which destroy homes in the right-of-way, new theaters, roadhouses, stores, skyscrapers, and luxury apartment houses. They can watch $25,000 homes being built. They can look at the now-empty, 1,200-seat stadium in New Jersey, which was built in the spring so that people could watch Billy Conn train for the big fight. They can see things like the sight in Ramsay, N. J., when a property owner burned down a family house to demonstrate a new fire engine he was trying to sell. They can stand beside the evicted tenants, Sophia and Josiah Mann, and their two evicted sons, Josiah, Jr., Navy Purple Heart, and Christopher, Infantry Purple Heart. They can watch the papers, where the statistical termites are eating away at the big boom (the Department of Labor says that eviction rates have tripled in the last 3 years, despite OPA). They can hear the Department of Commerce saying that the Nation has reached its all-time high in total rent payments—$12,800,000,000 in 1944. (The previous high was $11,000,000,000 and the year was 1929). They can read the new agony columns: "Apartments wanted: 'Maid's room: furn or unfurn, vicinity Park Av. and 75th St.' or 'Housing shortage? Have 3 genuine Indian chiefs tepees, heavy canvas, 12-foot spread, take 14-foot poles. $100 each.'" They can read in the back pages of the press statements like that of Edward J. Crawford, president of the New York State Society of Real Estate Appraisers: "Properties are being sold at higher and higher prices each week, and opinion among the best-posted men in the real estate field is that prices will go still higher and that this condition will prevail for at least 7 years." ("There is a Florida real estate boom in American Homes"—Representative MIKE MONRONEY, of Oklahoma.) They can remember the million home foreclosures after 1929. They can hear Edward Benscoe, of the Greater Detroit Property Owners Association, telling veterans why he wants a 40-percent rent boost: "We are exercising the right to strike that you veterans went overseas to fight for." They can hear Dr. Marcus Nadler, economist, saying to 500 bankers at the Astor, "Veterans are, under the GI bill of rights, buying homes at prices considerably beyond their intrinsic or economic value," and advising the bankers to "insist on high amortization during the next 3 or 4 years thereby materially increasing the equity of the buyer." They can hear a bitter veteran of both wars saying, "Puts me in mind of Florida. When I was there in 1924 they had a button showing Florida fruit. When one of the robbers sold you some land he put the button on your lapel. You wore it all innocent. What it said was to the next real estate man, 'This sucker's been hooked.' Looks to me like this time the discharge button stands for Florida fruit." The veterans can listen and look around as these things happen and wonder, "Is this the America I knew?"

One year after VJ-day this is America.

WHY YOUR HOUSE COSTS YOU DOUBLE

Land

The biggest price rise in homes comes from land speculators. Homes which cost $5,000 in 1939 are now up to $10,000 and over. A Federal housing survey a few months ago showed that land prices in big city areas had increased 100 percent in 6 years. In smaller cities prices of plots are up 200 percent. Since VJ-day the hike has been 29 percent. Not figured in the over-all cost of a new house is home furnishings, which most veterans have to buy in full before a new home can be occupied. Home furnishings have risen 19 percent since 1942. After the first World War there were no price controls and home furnishings went up 179 percent. There are no price controls hampering greedy land speculators from gouging the home buyer. any snobbish suburbs require the home-builder to buy large plots and build expensive homes to keep the character of the neighborhood. Veteran houses are impeded by local zoning codes and building ordnances, as well as costs.

Materials

Material costs are up about 50 percent, due to scarcity and widespread black marketeering, in part to legal increases permitted by OPA. There is a serious shortage of 11 strategic materials: brick, clay sewer pipe, structural clay tile, gypsum board, gypsum lathe, soil pipe and fittings, cast iron radiation, bathtubs, lumber, millwork, and concrete blocks. Brick plants have been working at 20 percent capacity; lumber output is only one-third of the need. The Department of Justice has promised action against the lumber racketeers, who threaten to hamstring the veteran housing program. Material production is offbeat because of labor shortage, aggravated by low wages and seasonal work. The main trouble is the poor patriotism of manufacturers, who would rather make a big killing on scarcity, than produce to house the Nation at fair profits over a long period of time. All materials are now prioritied for vet houses, but production of the things that make a home lags.

Labor

Labor costs in home construction have increased about 30 percent in 6 years. Although part of the increase has been in wages, most of the increased labor costs result from lowered productivity. The 19 AFL building trades unions suffered the full brunt of the building collapse during the depression, so that they shrank into defensive organizations. Long lay-offs, work limited to the warm seasons, and loss of skills during unemployment has left the Nation with a building force inferior in quantity and quality to the job ahead. AFL building chiefs share the narrow view of the contractors, and have not prepared to open union membership to GI's and set up the apprentice-training program that will be needed to mobilize the 4,000,000 builders called for in the Wyatt program. Labor can be more efficient if it gets year-round work at a decent wage under a national program of low-cost housing, rather than the present boom-and-bust cycle which has lowered efficiency.

Inflation

The last uncontrolled factor in the doubled cost of a new home is the increase in the profit and overhead item in the building bill. In 1939 contractors worked on 13 percent for profit and overhead. Today the figure is up to 25 percent and still going up. The Wyatt vet housing program would control these runaway figures by allowing costs to go up only on building materials and by rigidly controlling costs of construction. Wyatt got $400,000,000 to prime the building materials manufacturers on a cost-plus basis. This is the same financial subsidy plan that expedited the vast war production victory. Wyatt's kitty is one-eighth of 1 percent of the cost of the war. The real estate lobby fought the subsidy plan tooth and nail, preferring uncontrolled inflation and the building of houses far too expensive for the average GI. Now the builders have a clear order from the people to build vet houses only. Will they build and sell at fair prices? Or will they try to keep business as usual?

Soaking the Poor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I should like to include an editorial, Soaking the Poor, which appeared in the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel of July 6, 1946:

SOAKING THE POOR

It is doubtful if one person in 100—and probably not more than one in 500—knows what is meant by "Regulation W."

Even so, every person who has negotiated a little personal loan at his bank or individual loan company in the last 5 years or so, has run smack into this device, even though he didn't know the name of it.

Regulation W is a dictum which was drawn up by the Federal Reserve System, under a Presidential Executive order, to tighten up credit and thus prevent the pressure of high-wartime incomes on a dwindling supply of goods.

You could borrow money for certain specific things—paying the doctor or dentist, paying funeral expenses, paying taxes, etc. You could not legally, however, borrow money to buy what was called listed articles. This roster of listed articles included most of the consumer goods normally on the market.

The regulation also shortened the period of time payments permissible on certain items purchased on the instalment plan.

To some extent, credit was tightened up and a certain number of persons were discouraged from borrowing to purchase new washing machines, ironers, refrigerators, et cetera.

Now that the war is long over, and when a reasonable expansion of credit, along with increased production of goods would be of inestimable help to millions, the Federal System has amended regulation W—not to loosen up credit, but to make it tighter!

For one thing, the amendment removes the restrictions from instalment sales of listed articles, when the amount of the credit is in excess of $1,500. This means simply that the wealthy man doesn't need to worry about regulation W. He may buy an expensive car without restrictions on the extension of credit. But the average man still is hamstrung by the wartime regulation.

The amendment further removes some luxury items, such as attic ventilating fans, from the list subject to regulation, and adds on some which people of the middle economic class are thinking of buying—such as kitchen units incorporating dishwashers, ironers, refrigerators, or washing machines.

Also, the amendment requires the person borrowing money for educational, medical, hospital, dental, or funeral expenses to tell how much he is to pay on such bills, and requires him to give the names and addresses of the persons to whom the payments are to be made. Moreover, he must pay the amounts he specifies in his loan.

This latter provision, of course, came about because John Doe, when he went to borrow money, discovered he could buy things with money borrowed for doctor expenses. There was no way of checking up to see if he used it for the purpose listed on his application.

The reasons for the Federal Reserve System's move in loosening credit restrictions on luxury items and keeping them tight on consumer goods are simple enough to see through.

The market is flooded with luxury items of all kinds, but the New Deal planners have succeeded in removing most consumer goods from the market. The Federal Reserve, if it now loosened the reins on consumer credit, would simply create that much more money pressure on a dribble of goods, and call the attention of more and more people to the fact that governmental policies have created unprecedented scarcities of the things people need and want.

As a matter of fact, until the supply of available goods is increased enormously over what it now is, the restrictions on credit won't work much hardship on anyone.

The vicious thing about the new amendment to regulation W is that it completely removes restrictions on costly goods to be purchased by the wealthy, while discriminating against the man of moderate income. The rich man can now buy a $2,000 car, without restrictions on credit, but the middle-class man still must hew to the line with payments financed only for 1 year on his moderate-price car—and his note can't be "ballooned" at the end of that time, either.

The wealthy man can buy his attic ventilating fan. Mr. Average Man can't buy his wife a washer or ironer without paying one-third down and the remainder in a year's time.

Right now, with the supply of consumer goods practically nil, the amendment to regulation W won't be so noticeable. But the Federal Reserve said nothing about its being a temporary expedient, and it is safe to assume the amendment is intended to be a permanent one, unless pressure forces a retraction. As soon as the supply of things people want becomes near normal, every person who needs credit, and every banker who wants to extend credit, ought to send up an incessant howl of protest until the unfair and discriminatory amendment to regulation W is thrown out.

Merchant Ships and Sea Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include an editorial entitled "Merchant Ships and Sea Power," which appeared in the May–June 1946 issue of the Grace Log. The article follows:

MERCHANT SHIPS AND SEA POWER

Unification of the War and Navy Departments or better coordination of their functions is by no means the complete answer to this country's need for an effective defense system.

The permanent professional combat forces are necessarily too small for modern total war. The issue in any future war will depend on how quickly and effectively our material resources and facilities can be channeled into the combat.

The United States will always have a vast industrial production. The pattern for ready conversion of such part as may be necessary for war needs has been effectively set, and—barring criminal neglect—will work. For the production—materials, workers, management—will exist, an enormous, diversified, going force.

Transportation services are an equally important war need and here again the Nation is well heeled in its railroads. They will be running as long as the country is a going business; and so will the busses, trucks, and the commercial aircraft.

But when it comes to ocean transportation, the task is not so easy. Before World War II less than 30 percent of our foreign commerce was being carried in American ships. The balance was borne in foreign vessels, controlled by foreign governments. When war broke out in 1939 most of them had urgent business elsewhere. We had too few for our commerce. We had too few to bring in the strategic materials when, belatedly, we began to build up our forces. For lack of manganese, chromium ore, and the like, our Army maneuvers were conducted in part with wooden weapons, stovepipes representing artillery we didn't have, and make-believe tanks stimulating those still in the blueprint stage. As we became the arsenal of democracy we still lacked the ships to bring in the desired quantities of raw materials and to deliver overseas the finished munitions. Remember "Too little and too late"?

And when we finally entered the war, our impact on the fields of combat lagged. Page after page of the reports of General Marshall and Admiral King testify to this.

If public, and often official memory were not so short, it would be superfluous to repeat that not until a vast fleet of American merchant vessels began to take to the water were the African, Italian, and French invasions and MacArthur's return to the Philippines possible. Japan fell as she lost her merchant marine to our Navy with its submarines and aircraft, and to the Army Air Force. Well, in another war, what with aircraft, jet, and otherwise, there will just be no time to improvise and to build another merchant fleet.

So if our country is promptly to have the means of delivering our attack overseas instead of having to fight a war here at home there must be more American ships and personnel in peace. Admiral King and others have warned against a return to prewar maritime inadequacy and excessive dependence on foreign ships. Unless this warning is to be ignored, it is necessary now to arrest all hesitation in policy, any failure vigorously to carry out and to attain the objectives of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, namely, to possess an efficient merchant marine to serve as an auxiliary to the armed forces, and to carry all of our domestic water-borne commerce and a substantial part of our foreign trade. This the merchant marine was not doing before World War II, although it had made a good beginning. Now the ships exist, a trained personnel exists, competent management exists. And foreign dangers exist.

The policy exists, clearly defined in the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, but it needs unfaltering, farsighted administration supported at the highest level.

Senate Bill 191

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE M. GRANT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. GRANT of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to support this bill which authorizes grants to the States for surveying their hospitals and public-health centers, and for planning construction of additional facilities and authorizing grants to assist in such construction.

There is a real need for additional hospital facilities. This bill recognizes that there is a greater need for hospital facilities in rural areas than in metropolitan centers. We find that there is a crying need for more doctors in the rural sections of our country. Many young doctors who came from these areas are not returning because they do not have adequate facilities to practice their profession. If we can provide more adequate hospital facilities, we will have a greater supply of doctors. It does not require a survey to establish the fact that there is an acute need for more hospitals. Anyone from a rural area knows this to be true.

I trust that the House will supend the rules and overwhelmingly pass this measure.

Stateless Persons

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, on December 11, 1945, I introduced a resolution (H. Con. Res. 109) to favor a prompt inquiry by the United States Department of State into the question of affording stateless persons immediate relief by legitimatizing their civil status and their right to become self-sustaining citizens.

At that time, in our occupied areas of Europe, we had already repatriated over 3,000,000 displaced persons, but the number of those who, in General Eisenhower's words "did not want to return to their former areas through certainty of persecution," was still high in the hundreds of thousands.

Since then the forcible evacuation of families from eastern Germany, from Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Austria, has added nearly 2,000,000 additional displaced individuals who are, in the fullest meaning of the term, stateless.

For the RECORD, I want to report to the American citizens of foreign descent who favored an immediate passage of House Concurrent Resolution 109, that in spite of the more than 500 letters sent urging its adoption—letters from individuals and from societies and groups representing several millions of voters—that no action whatsoever was taken by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to which it was referred.

Concurrently with the introduction of House Concurrent Resolution 109 before this House, an identical measure, Senate Concurrent Resolution 42, was presented to the Senate by the Senator from Michigan, the Honorable ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG. This was referred to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, which has held no hearing on it.

The problem presented by the stateless persons not only continues to exist; it increases in gravity with every passing month. It is now of such complexity that only a properly administered and authorized office within the framework of the United Nations can be equipped to handle it with the consideration for the rights of individual human beings which is consonant with civilized tradition. Such an office was contemplated in the introduction of House Concurrent Resolution 109. Failure to institute such an office will remain as a reproach to any government, or confederation of governments, until such time as an aroused public opinion of international scope shall demand its institution.

The Big Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Bristol (Pa.) Courier of July 26, 1946:

THE BIG ISSUE

Who is going to run Pennsylvania—the Pennsylvania voters or the CIO?

That has become the big issue of the coming campaign.

The Democrats have signed up. They have turned the main part of their campaign over to the political arm of the CIO—the "Political Action Committees." The Democratic headquarters will go through the motions—but the PAC will do the dirty work.

And if the PAC wins for the Democratic ticket, what will the pay-off be?

Just the same at Harrisburg as it is now in Washington, where a CIO-handpicked President continues to jump everytime the CIO pulls the strings.

When the CIO said "Veto the Compromise OPA Bill," President Truman obediently vetoed it, disregarding the pleas of all his outstanding Democratic leaders in Congress.

When the CIO said veto the Case bill the President vetoed it, although this attempt to correct labor-union abuses had been worked and supported again by outstanding leaders of his own party.

The subservience of the President to the CIO is to blame for most of the confusion, scarcities, high prices, and lack of production in the United States today. When the CIO "put the arm on him" to back them up in large wage demands after the war ended he was quick to promise that wages would be allowed to rise substantially, but prices held level. That economic nightmare, which never had a ghost of a chance to work, has thrown the United States many months behind in reconversion.

But that's the sort of demand the CIO makes on those rash enough to give them a blank check for their political support.

They figure they are paying the fiddler, so they call the tunes.

If the Democratic slate were to be elected in Pennsylvania this fall, both the Republicans and the Democrats would lose. Nobody would win but the high command of the CIO—most of it nonresident in Pennsylvania.

They would lay their demands on the Democratic Governor's desk, and he would pass them along to the Democratic legislature, and no one would dare oppose them. A Democratic victory at the polls would mean 4 years of Democratic slavery to the CIO on Capitol Hill in Harrisburg.

The CIO program for State and Nation has certain characteristics. The CIO believes in centralized and all-powerful Federal control over everything (except the CIO). They favor bigger and bigger Federal pay rolls; meddling in everybody's affairs. Already they have demanded, as a Federal project, nationalization of health, employment, and a variety of other matters which the American plan has left largely to free initiative.

The CIO favors all the further measures implied by strong centralized power over the economic and social set-up of the Nation. Deficit financing, growing national debts, continued currency inflation, further regimentation of personal affairs—these are all part of the hide which goes with the hog of collectivism.

But mostly the CIO's program boils down to letting the CIO have whatever it wants.

The real Democratic platform could be put in three words: "Everything CIO asks."

The men back of the CIO want a labor dictatorship, and they aren't particular how they get it. They are willing to run the Nation so far in debt that it can never get out. They are willing for the American dollar to be debased as badly as the old-time German mark. They are willing to bankrupt the country piling up Federal pay rolls with nothing to do but keep in power a political party which will pull CIO's chestnuts from the fire.

Back of CIO, and in control of its policies, are pro-Communists who see no good in any system of government except the Russian.

Why be misled about this? John L. Lewis, who helped found CIO, says the Communists are in control. Philip Murray admitted as much when he promised to purge them—when he got around to it. Congressional committees have searched out the Communists who are running the CIO, identified them, and tried to have something done about it. Dozens of competent investigators have confirmed all this.

Do you want the fate of Pennsylvania placed in the hands of a group like this—of a mysterious handful of men who don't live in Pennsylvania, don't care what happens to the State, and are openly trying to collectivize America into a "welfare" dictatorship?

That's what the sell-out of the Democratic ticket to the "nonpolitical" Political Action Committees means.

The CIO-PAC organization is a tightly knit political machine, in which the union membership has nothing whatsoever to say about how much they contribute to political campaigns, who they vote for, what deals are made by their bosses, and the program which the organization is seeking to force down Uncle Sam's throat.

The dictatorship of the CIO bosses over their members is absolute. The average workingman in this union (who probably joined only because the Government said he had to in order to get a war job) has lost his political freedom of voting as he chooses; his right of freedom of speech; his right to help determine policies of organizations to which he belongs; and the economic freedom of keeping his job regardless of his politics.

A Democratic victory this fall would be the means of extending the CIO's dictatorial grip from its own membership to all the rest of the American people.

Are you for it?

Why Farmers Cannot Get Farm Machinery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the Farm Journal for August 1946 has an interesting article on the problem of farm machinery. At a time when farmers are in the middle of the food producing season the writer points out some of the facts in connection with strike-bound farm-machinery plants and just why the farmer is unable to secure the implements he needs in his work. I include as part of my remarks the article in question:

WHAT'S BEHIND FARM-MACHINERY STRIKES?—FARMERS' INABILITY TO BUY ENOUGH NEW EQUIPMENT HAS BEEN EXASPERATING ENOUGH, BUT SOMETHING MUCH BIGGER MAY BE INVOLVED

If you're struggling and sweating to get your crops harvested with worn-out machinery, and you wonder why in Sam Hill you can't get more new stuff, the answer is simple and easy: strikes have crippled 26 farm-equipment plants since VJ-day.

Two J. I. Case plants have been idle since last December. Several Deere plants were closed for 2 months, International Harvester for 3 months, Caterpillar Tractor for 2 months, New Idea for more than 2 months, Oliver for 2 months, Minneapolis-Moline for more than a month, Allis-Chalmers for more than 2 months.

Some of these companies are now making machinery again. But thousands of combines, corn pickers, tractors, and other machines needed this fall will not be ready—not only because of strikes in the big machinery plants, but because of a shortage of parts from other strike-bound companies.

Serious as all this is, something much bigger, much more far reaching, may be involved.

Have we been witnessing, in some of these strikes, the newest attempt of Communists and their liberal confederates to throw a monkey wrench into the American way of doing business? It's not so much the strikes as the pattern of some of them that seems significant. It's not wages and hours, but free enterprise itself that is at stake.

Let's look at the Allis-Chalmers situation, for one. To understand it, you have to go back a little.

Harold Christoffel was reputed to be a member of the Socialist Party, who was so much of an extremist that he resigned in 1938 when the old-line Socialists threatened to read him out of the party. He got a minor job at Allis-Chalmers, soon became the big shot of Local 248, CIO-UAW, then got a 5-year leave of absence to handle union affairs. Until then, Allis-Chalmers had always had rather quiet labor relations, but after Christoffel got control, there was continual trouble.

The climax came in 1941 before the American declaration of war, when Allis-Chalmers was tied up by a 76-day strike that the Government said set the Navy back a full 6 months in its defense program.

When the strike vote was taken, at that time, 4,547 men were counted going in to vote, and 6,759 ballots were cast. The union itself finally admitted a fraudulent election, but to this day no charges have been lodged against anybody.

The union talked of another election, but President Roosevelt stepped in and with a sweep of the hand settled the strike, then provided an Army airplane to take Christoffel back to Milwaukee—quite the fair-haired boy.

For several months Christoffel struggled successfully to stay out of the Army, but finally he was classfied 1-A and taken. His own candidate for president succeeded him—Robert Buse. More trouble followed.

The union at Allis-Chalmers shifted its policy from antiwar to prowar the day Germany attacked Russia—an action which has caused left-wing members to be dubbed "June 22 patriots" ever since.

Even Walter Reuther, now national president of UAW, was quoted in the Buffalo Courier-Express as saying that the Allis-Chalmers local was dominated by political racketeers of the Communist stripe.

Now comes the present strike. The company offered wage increases of 18½ cents an hour to match the national pattern, and has met the worker's demands on hours, and working conditions. But early in July the union revised its wage demands, seeking 40 to 49½ cents more an hour.

This and earlier evidences of a determination not to let the strike end short of Government control caused the Milwaukee Sentinel, daily newspaper, to charge that "the strike is an attempt of Communist labor agitators to use the Government as a cat's paw in an act of arbitrary confiscation."

Allis-Chalmers officials claim that leaders of Local 248 are determined that no concession shall end the strike—not until Government takes over. The issue, they say, is simply whether private enterprise shall run business or whether Government will do it.

General unrest, bewilderment, discord, and confusion, leading to Government seizure, has long been an aim of Communists. As recently as January 15, 1946, William Z. Foster, head of the Communist Party in the United States, declared that "it is high time that the labor movement of this country take up seriously the question of nationalization."

Very typically, the Farmers Union jumped promptly into the fray, taking this same Communist line and crying loudly for Government seizure of Allis-Chalmers.

The Daily Worker, Communist organ which seems fully informed on Farmers' Union Affairs, announced that Farmers' Union leaders and auto workers would call 30 farmer meetings. And the Wisconsin CIO News shouted: "More than 10,000 farmers * * * have called upon the President and Agriculture Secretary Anderson to seize and operate the Allis-Chalmers and J. I. Case plants and bargain with the unions * * * They are fighting mad."

A Farm Journal correspondent attended some of these Farmers' Union meetings, found that of the "10,000 farmers" supposedly "fighting mad" at Allis-Chalmers and Case, only a few bothered to come at all, and that most of these were indifferent to the prepared telegrams they were supposed to send to Washington. Evidently they didn't fall for the Communist line.

Almost the same things have occurred at the J. I. Case Co., still strike-bound. In fact, the pattern of strikes throughout the farm equipment industry has been fairly consistent. It's the pattern that suggests that there's more to these strikes than meets the eye.

Most of the union members are not red. Many are helpless pawns of radical leaders. But perhaps it's time for all of us to wake up to what some of the union leaders seem to be trying to do to union members, and to privately owned business, in this country.

Our Role in China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of July 24, 1946:

OUR ROLE IN CHINA

As the shadows of civil strife become darker over China, there is growing clamor in certain quarters that American and Chinese reactionaries are conspiring to plunge that country and the world into a new war, and that the only way to stop it is for the United States to get out of China immediately—withdraw its troops, withhold all further aid to the Chinese Government, and abandon its traditional policy of the open door.

The latest recruit in that campaign is no less a person than Mme. Sun Yat-sen, widow of the founder of the Chinese Republic, sister-in-law of President Chiang Kai-shek, and sister of Premier Soong. Mme. Sun enjoys a special kind of veneration among many Chinese people. But the same charge is made by others, including a group of 56 Chinese educators, industrialists, and professionals. And it comes most loudly out of Moscow, where the press and the radio accuse capitalist America of preparing a new war for the purpose of bringing China within its "economic frontiers."

There can be little doubt that the danger of large-scale civil war in China is growing, and that such a war would present a grave peril to peace in general. But it takes two to make war, and since the National Government of President Chiang Kai-shek is not only the recognized Government of China but has a pledge of aid from the United States as a wartime ally, and quite specific pledges of exclusive moral and military support from the Russian Government under the Russo-Chinese Treaty, it would seem that any protest should be directed, not against that Government and those who assist it, but against those who oppose it and divide China.

As for the specific Russian charge of American economic ambitions, it is made ludicrous by the contrast between the Russian practice of imposing monopoly control on the economies of other countries and the traditional American doctrine of the open door, which sees in freedom of trade the best assurance for peace and demands equal opportunities for all. It is not China, but Russia, that has sought, and achieved, monopoly privileges in Manchuria, the richest province of China.

Bretton Woods Salaries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I trust that my colleagues will examine the salary phases of the Bretton Woods International Spending and Loaning Agency. This super set-up to furnish soft jobs for the faithful is just one more burden upon the backs of the taxpayers. Under leave to extend, I am inserting an article by Herbert M. Bratter which appeared in the Commercial and Financial Chronicle, July 11, 1946:

WASHINGTON PONDERS BRETTON WOODS SALARIES

(By Herbert M. Bratter)

(Observer comments on question of adequacy of Government officials' salaries and calls attention to transfer of several members of Treasury and State Department staffs, as well as appointment of former Budget Director Harold D. Smith to much higher-paid positions with International Fund and World Bank. Notes British and American official criticism of high salaries paid by Bretton Woods institutions, and makes comparison with salaries paid here and abroad to regular Government executives.)

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Several times recently the question of the adequacy of the pay of Government officials and other workers has been raised in Washington, and various news columnists have reechoed the subject. When Under Secretary of the Treasury Daniel W. Bell resigned his post several months ago to accept a bank position paying more than twice as much as the Government paid him, the Secretary in response to a correspondent's question expressed regret that the Government pay scale was so limited in the top ranges. President Truman only recently has attributed to the same cause his difficulty in filling several top-rank positions—although some observers have ascribed the President's difficult in those instances to other causes. In fulfillment of the Administration's general policies as to the wages of labor a measure was recently enacted increasing as of July 1 all Government pay of less than $10,000 a year by an average of 14 percent, with $10,000 remaining the ceiling.

The resignation last month of Budget Director Harold D. Smith for the sake of a position with the World Bank, paying him $22,500 after taxes, was another occasion for comment on the growing lack of attraction of Government salaries to officials in the higher ranks. The fact that all officers and employees of the World Fund and World Bank have their income taxes paid for them by these institutions has made employment with those two bodies very alluring to foreigners and Americans in and out of Government service. Several thousand applications for employment have been received by each of these international organizations to date, while in Washington there has been a good deal of wire pulling to get berths there. Under the arrangements concluded at Savannah in March, 12 executive directors and 12 alternate executive directors have a place on the Fund and an equal number on the Bank. Executive directors receive $17,500 a year after taxes and alternates $11,500 after taxes. The managing director of the Fund gets $30,000 after taxes and the president of the Bank the same. Thus, counting taxes, the services of the top 51 officials of Fund and Bank cost a potential $1,000,000 a year. This does not allow for the permissible entertainment expenses of managing directors and president.

Under these 51 officials there is commencing to be built a staff of lawyers, economists, engineers, administrative, and clerical personnel, all paid on an after-taxes basis. The salary arrangements thus far made reveal that these positions are on a similarly attractive basis. Thus far most of those employed have been Americans, and of these, all who have come to this writer's attention are former Government employees. A number of former members of the Treasury Department's division of monetary research, once headed by the present American executive director of the Fund, Harry D. White, have gone to Fund or Bank. These are men who worked on the Bretton Woods program at the Treasury. A few have gone to Fund or Bank from the State Department, after having worked on BW there. The Federal Reserve Board staff has commenced to contribute research personnel.

In other Government departments, and even in some of those most concerned with the fund and bank, the writer has heard criticism of the numerous and high-paying positions and of the manner in which they are being awarded to "insiders." Apparently no one has moved from a Government job in Washington to the fund or bank without a very appreciable increase in his or her salary. This seemingly applies to the clerical help as well, most of the research officials having taken along from the Government at least one secretary.

THE PROPOSED SALARIES

As reported earlier in these columns, Harry White and E. G. Collado, the American executive directors on fund and bank, moved from pretax salaries of less than $10,000 to post-tax salaries of $17,500, or the approximate equivalent of $25,000 for a married man with dependents. One young civil servant long associated with the development of Bretton Woods moved out from under the Government $10,000-before-taxes salary ceiling to $14,000 after taxes, or approximately the equivalent of $20,000, which is twice as much as a Senator gets paid in this country.

The Bretton Woods agreements provide that personnel of fund and bank shall be selected with due consideration of geographical considerations, and undoubtedly a number of the higher-paid posts are being reserved for non-Americans. It has been reported to the writer that the fund and bank will find it hard to get people to come here from abroad "because the salaries are not sufficiently attractive." This may be true in a few special circumstances, as where a country because of its past history or other circumstances has only a relatively few skilled financial technicians. But it is hardly likely that the posts reserved for non-Americans will long remain unfilled if there is need to fill them. As one European director put it in conversation with the writer, "No one who has lived in western Europe in recent war and postwar years would not jump at the chance of coming to Washington, especially at the salary scale in force in fund and bank."

Since there will be in all only a few hundred positions on fund and bank, the great majority of those who have applied must be disappointed. Recently a man seeking employment in the bank was advised to get the endorsement of Mr. Harold Smith, its vice president. A call at Mr. Smith's office disclosed that he was out but elicited from a secretary the information that, insofar as concerned any vacancies to be filled by Americans, Mr. Collado had reserved them for persons of his acquaintance. It may be an indication of the dominant role of the State Department in the Government's foreign financial policies, including the NAC, that of the American executive directors and alternates on fund and bank, the Treasury Department contributed one (White) and State, three (Collado, Hooker, and Luthringer). That the Treasury has supplied more personnel for research and other technical work than has State may be explained by the fact that the Treasury had more such trained people to start with.

SALARY COMPARISONS

How well paid the fund and bank directorships are may be seen by a few comparisons. Not only do the executive directors receive, with taxes taken into account, about 60 percent more than the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board and 2½ times as much as a Cabinet member or Member of Congress; they are paid more than any American Government official outside of the President. Such a high salary scale was vigorously opposed at Savannah last March by the British delegation, supported by the Canadians and others. However, they were overruled by the greater voting power of the United States delegation, embellished with copious arguments by Mr. Harry White in committee meeting, aided by the State Department representatives there.
